Mr. Nixon: But it would not be unfair to say that it was done without their specific recommendation, it was not based on this?

Hon. Mr. Auld: Oh, no.

Mr. Nixon: I would like to say something about archaeological and historical sites in general. In driving through the province we see, year by year, development of this programme and whenever time permits we stop at the sites that are designated. But it seems to me that a large number of these sites would benefit from some development. Certainly just the placing of the impressive plaque does little towards retaining the site in any of its historic naturalness. I would like the hon. Minister to comment on the possibility of setting aside some money in the future to allow the historic sites board to select some of these better sites and assist in their development.

Hon. Mr. Auld: Mr. Chairman, first of all let me say that I would agree with my hon.

friend that there are a number of interesting and important structures, or remnants of structures, throughout the province, many of which have already been commemorated by plaques erected by the board. Here again it is strictly a question of funds to do it and then funds to maintain them afterwards. One thing that we have done in the department to advance this kind of thing is to encourage work along these lines under the centennial grants programme, because I must say that I feel that this is a golden opportunity to preserve a great many of these structures around the province. But while I think it would be excellent if the funds were available; and of course the federal government has certain authority under their board, which operates under Northern Affairs and Natural Resources, to do this kind of thing, and in fact have done so on one or two occasions, it is again strictly a question of the funds being available.

I think that we have made a good start and our board, as I mentioned in my remarks when I presented the estimates on March 19, is made up of a very capable and dedicated group of people who have given a great deal of time in their work and are pressing forward.

We are putting up about 40 plaques per year. Now, there is a great deal of research involved in doing this and we have made available to local historical societies and municipalities, and so on, the facilities of the archives and the historical branch and museum advisors—the historians on the staff of the branch—to give them assistance.

We are now prepared, although I do not suppose we could look after 100 requests at once, to give technical assistance through the staff that we trained when we were doing the reconstruction and restoration work at Upper Canada Village. In fact we have done this on a couple of occasions so far and are in the process of so doing.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, when the hon. Minister speaks of the money being available he of course must bear in mind that he is spending more than $1 million in the restoration of this one site at Fort Ste. Marie, and it might be advisable in the future to examine the possibilities of even setting aside a relatively small amount, so that year by year some of the more important sites could be purchased, or at least the local municipality or some other responsible group could be assisted in the development. I would like to ask him what happens if a designated site is sold and perhaps earmarked for destruction or changing into some redevelopment of some sort? Has he got any power to maintain it as an historic site?

Hon. Mr. Auld: Here again I would just say, Mr. Chairman, it is really a question of funds. If there were a site which we wanted to preserve, it could be purchased. In the final analysis this would be the action that would have to be taken. Even if there were authority—I think the federal government has authority to take historic sites—people still have to be compensated for them, so that really the authority, unless there is a statutory fund or a large vote of money set aside with it, would mean very little. We obviously could not tell people that they could not do anything with their house, they could not change it, they could not sell it, they were not allowed to tear it down, if we were not prepared to compensate them for any loss that might be incurred.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the hon. Minister one question with regard to research that he has done in connection with these historical facts. I have been informed that in one particular circumstance—I think it was the plaque commemorating the birthplace of Sir William Hearst—the plaque had to be completely torn down as the information on it was not correct at all. Furthermore, I was informed that the sons of Sir William Hearst were not invited to the occasion when the plaque was presented to the municipality that he came from. The only way the sons happened to know about it was by reading about it in the papers. If these facts are correct, I am wondering just how much research was done in this particular instance.

Hon. Mr. Auld: The two things that my hon. friend mentioned—one, actually I presume it was the lettering that was on the plaque—

Mr. Whicher: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Auld: It may be that a change was made because of something that came to light after the original inscription was prepared. While there is very thorough research done by the historical branch in the archives and elsewhere I would be the last to say that we might not make a mistake sometime or that it is not possible. This is one of the problems which the board has in setting out the inscriptions—that the interpretation of some word is obnoxious to somebody, or unacceptable to somebody such as a relative or historian, and that a change must be made.

I may say, Mr. Chairman, that there is room for approximately 110 words, I think, on the plaque and this sometimes requires a great deal of discussion to get on the relevant important points or aspects of the person or event being commemorated.

Regarding the second point, generally the request for a plaque is generated from a local historical society, council, or local group. It is generally the policy of the historical branch, which is actually responsible for carrying out the decision of the archaeological and historic sites board, to leave the arrangements for the ceremonies in the hands of the local body because normally the local body would be more closely in touch with those people in the community who should be invited. If someone was overlooked in receiving an invitation to one of these ceremonies, it is certainly most regrettable but it would be primarily, I would expect, the responsibility of the local body which was sponsoring the unveiling, rather than the historical branch itself. I am sure the hon. members would agree that it would be very difficult for a member of our staff to be able to go into a community, without a great deal of time being involved, to organize such a ceremony, and it is more desirable that the originating body should be in charge of that.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to belabour this but I understand in this particular instance it was not a word or two that had to be changed on the plaque, but the whole message. I suggest that the hon. Minister inform the committee, whoever they may be, that from now on their research of this material be a little more efficient.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Mr. Chairman, commending the hon. Minister and his department on their policy in regional development—giving the autonomy to a local region in areas for development—I think it is an excellent policy and also their move on historic sites has been commendable in that area.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister under this Section 7, 2107, about an amount of $37,000 in 1963 for museums to sundry municipalities. We have been building our own museum there, 100 per cent local funds. I am wondering if the hon. Minister could tell me the yardstick to qualify for a grant titled "museum."

Hon. Mr. Auld: In the first place, Mr. Chairman, the museum must be owned by the municipality. A grant is paid on a percentage of the maintenance costs—it is not a capital grant but a percentage of the maintenance costs, in other words, a proportion of the salary of the curator. If my memory serves me correctly most of the grants would go up to about $1,000. Owen Sound, I would tell the hon. member, received two years ago $966.66, and last year $1,000, which would be this maintenance grant that I mentioned.

Mr. Sargent: Thank you, Mr. Minister. On a different note on tourism, our hon. leader (Mr. Oliver) developed at some length the very poor job done by your advertising agency last year in tourism. May I ask the hon. Minister, has he retained the same agency this year?

Hon. Mr. Auld: Mr. Chairman, I am happy to say that that was on a vote that we have already passed and agreed to.

Mr. Sargent: I think I am entitled to an answer on that question, Mr. Minister.

Hon. Mr. Auld: Not on this vote.

Mr. Sargent: I am entitled as a taxpayer to know if you are retaining the same agency.

Hon. Mr. Auld: I would suggest that the hon. member put it on the order paper if he wants an answer, but to save him a little trouble I would say it is a different one.

Mr. Sargent: Thank you very much.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, I support strongly the suggestions of my friend, the hon. member for Brant. As the hon. Minister very well knows, passing through my area is the original trans-Canada route. The first business in Ontario was established on Lake Nipissing. If at all possible, if there were grants to assist municipalities, not in building but in keeping alive an historic route, then they would be most advisable there.

Vote 2107 agreed to.

On vote 2108:

Mr. Troy: Well now, comes around this vote and I suppose some of us are batting our heads against a stone wall. But still, like Horatius at the bridge, we are undaunted. I want to ask the hon. Minister a couple of questions. First of all, what is the age qualifying an adult under The Theatres Act?

Hon. Mr. Auld: Eighteen.

Mr. Troy: Eighteen? For adult entertainment, the age limit is 18? What is the difference between adult and restricted?

Hon. Mr. Auld: Mr. Chairman, there are three categories. We operate on a classification system. One category is the adult classification, which is a guide. People of all ages can go but it is a guide to parents that this film is deemed to be more suitable for adults. Then there is what is called in England the universal class, which is suitable for everybody. Then there is the restricted classification, which I think is the one the hon. member refers to; and admittance is only given to those 18 years of age and over.

Mr. Troy: Is there any identification form they have to carry?

Hon. Mr. Auld: No.

Mr. Troy: Are there any women on the censorship board of the department?

Hon. Mr. Auld: Yes.

Mr. Troy: Fine.

Now, I want to read a letter I got from a constituent of mine. He is a little premature; he calls me the Honourable Leo Troy, but those things come in time:

I am taking the opportunity of expressing to you, our elected representative, my deepest disgust at what is perpetuated upon the public in the guise of entertainment and under the all-protecting mantle of free enterprise.

My wife and I attended a movie last Saturday night, a movie entitled for your information "Four for Texas". It was passable as far as we were concerned and we enjoyed it. However, the movie was on the restricted list due to a little more of Anita, the actress, being on view than usual. As far as I am concerned what was shown was not particularly suggestive or really objectionable in any way. Then came the preview of coming attractions and one of the little gems was an endearing little number called "Dementia 13".

This is a sick movie in the same class as "Psycho", "The Birds" and other trash, calculated to shock and frighten audiences to its core. It did me.

The preview started off with a man purporting to be a psychiatrist, who very sternly tells the audience that after seeing "Psycho" some poor sick person had gone out and committed three murders. This, of course, is an achievement no doubt Mr. Hitchcock is proud of, if it is all true, that is.

Then they proceeded to show signs of violence, various murders, etc. being committed and the pièce de résistance came at the end. A nearly nude young girl was shown in a pool of water, then she screamed out, a camera shows an axe descending, the screaming stops, the scene shifts to a dark room and a pair of very bloody feet and then the camera travels up the girl's corpse showing every gash and slash and I mean deep gashes and blood all over everything. The last scene is a blood-stained axe.

I do not possess a weak stomach having seen several nasty auto accidents, but this shook me. In fact, the radio commercial brayed over the local radio station in the usual sickening style claims that the picture shows us an authentic portrayal of as beautiful an axe slaying as is allowed.

The other little offering was with Boris Karloff, I guess it is. And "Blood in living colour". I forgot to mention that the usual dope about a psychiatric test before being allowed to view "Dementia 13" was included.

Now this is the type of advertising we get; and although it has nothing to do with television certainly the censorship board must have seen that stuff, and they allowed it to be presented. Then we have the advertisements in the newspapers; and, of course, you have to be awfully careful what you say because I notice one of our Metropolitan newspapers will not put in the advertising about the demon liquor, but they certainly accept every day the filthy lucre for the advertisement of pictures.

This is a copy of a—well, it is partly an editorial in a northern Ontario newspaper. It points out that in the days of Barnum and Bailey, when Mr. Barnum was mulcting the public, he had in one of his sideshows the words, "To the Egress", and nothing else. So the public in their numbers flowed along this passageway and you know where they went—outside. But they thought they were going to see something else altogether; they thought they were going to get into one of those special shows, but it was just an exit.

So it says the same thing with the newspaper business in the advertising of their films.

As Barnum used to watch the people go out, he would say, "Of course, there is a sucker born every minute". In this editorial:

The come-ons I am talking about this week are the ones you find in your daily newspapers on the entertainment page. The enticing, seductive, persuasive advertisements announcing the bill of fare at the local movie houses are becoming bigger and bolder every day.

For example, in the three northern Ontario newspapers which are mentioned here—the Sault Ste. Marie Star, the Sudbury Star, and the North Bay Nugget—all of these newspapers carry movie advertisements because they are, of course, paid for the space.

In carrying out a little experiment, this editorial writer clipped the entertainment pages from all three daily newspapers on Saturday, March 14. He laid them out on a large table and compared them. The Sault Ste. Marie Star—here are some of the titillating bits from it: “Love With the Proper Stranger”—in the advertisement copy it said that this is “their second meeting. Their first meeting was casual and yet there came a moment when everything was risked with the proper stranger.”

Another was entitled: “Nude in His Pocket.” The copy read: “Sexy, saucy, compelling. You name it. That has it.”

Well, that would bring on the suckers. It is very neat copy and very compelling.

The next was a movie advertised, which was so bad they censored its title. The copy read like this: “At last a film that dares to shock you with a new kind of raw, naked power and realism. The daring movie that people are talking about, the kind of adult drama that audiences have been waiting for.”

And so on. “Too Young to Love” is another one: “Fifteen-year-old party girl. The picture that exposes the modern madness called young love.”

The other, “The West End Jungle” was about “the girls that tamed London,” and so on.

And then we have, of course, the one that the Harvard Lampoon considers the worst picture of the year, “Cleopatra”, which was shown here and it is the biggest bathroom in history.

“Every ticket holder guaranteed a seat,” the advertisement said, “this is the closest you can get to a bath tub without a bath.”

Now, sir, I know you have your censor board, but certainly I do not know that they do much censoring about the advertisements. Some of them are very lurid and in most cases they are come-ons to bring the public out just the same as when you go to the news-stands and find these books with very intriguing pictures on the cover but if you read through the book you wonder where the dickens that incident happened.

Again seriously, sir, I think that possibly it may be just as I have read about these people that are on the hon. Attorney General's committee with regard to obscene literature.

After reading that trash and looking at things for years and years they certainly get fed up, so possibly it might be a good idea to do something, possibly change the people on the censorship board and bring in some new blood and see what their ideas are.

I certainly think that we are getting a little out of hand. If these things were as they are supposed to be, then something might be done about it. But as I say again, suckers are born every minute, and you get them still at the movies.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Mr. Chairman, I notice that there seems to have been a broader approach to film censorship, an easing in some restrictions; not particularly in Ontario but across the western world. Would the hon. Minister agree that this is the situation?

Hon. Mr. Auld: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could sum it up this way. What we are doing in Ontario and have been doing for some time, is to establish a system of classification. I think every hon. member would agree that what is one's man sweet is another man's poison—I am afraid that the exact expression escapes me—and it would appear—

Some hon. members: One man's meat is another man's poison.

Hon. Mr. Auld: One man's meat is another man's poison; and there has never been any unanimity in society on what people should read or see or in fact what they like to eat or what they like to look at in terms of paintings.

I think that to give one example, at the moment the film which won the academy award, “Tom Jones”, a couple of nights ago, I understand is still banned from one of the western provinces. Now that gives a pretty good indication of the extremes there might be.

I would say that the system which has been in operation in Ontario for some time, and which is being studied, I may say, by some of the other jurisdictions and being implemented by other jurisdictions, is the one which has probably worked out most satisfactorily. I will not comment on the reading of the editorial by my friend the hon. member for Nipissing. I have had one letter which I shall mention which was from a lady who said that she had been to a film and thought it was shocking, but just to make sure, she went back three times.

There will always be a difference of opinion, and I think that the system of classification whereby the viewer or the patron can get a fairly good idea of what kind of a film it is before they go in, is probably the best one that we will reach. I do not think that we will ever have perfection.

This system does have some benefit in connection with the come-on type of thing which the hon. member mentioned. I just say this too in that connection, that there are only two kinds of advertising to my knowledge which are restricted in any way. One is film advertising and the other is liquor advertising, but there is nothing to prevent an advertiser for any other product in using almost any kind of photograph or word or phrase to encourage people to use or to buy his products.

Mr. Troy: There is The Pure Foods Act.

Hon. Mr. Auld: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Troy: Under The Pure Foods Act what you say must be factual.

Hon. Mr. Auld: There is nothing to prevent you having a pretty girl selling cornflakes. I think this is one of the points my hon. friend was making a moment ago.

Mr. Chairman, I would simply say I think that our board has done an excellent job in establishing and carrying out this classification system and I think in all fairness that it is probably working as well as any other system in North America; and better than in many other jurisdictions where there may be in effect no control and simply a number of court cases on some sort of an obscenity law, so neither the public nor the trade have any idea as to what they can probably do, and the public has no idea of what kind of films are being shown as far as they and their own children are concerned.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, on this I am interested in two points that the hon. Minister raised. First of all, I am thinking of the remark in which the hon. Minister mentioned that there was no unanimity in connection with what one person likes and another dislikes and which was referred to as one man's meat and another man's poison.

On the other hand, by the very fact of having established the provincial censor and a provincial censorship board he is suggesting that there must be standards of poison for some people and meat for others. I think this must be clear to the hon. Minister that he is describing certain standards for our community. I am not saying whether this is good or bad. I am asking the hon. Minister—he has given three standards—I am sorry, I am thinking of the three categories that there are.

Hon. Mr. Auld: Yes, three classifications.

Mr. Thompson: Now my question is that I am not sure that a Legislature should judge morality, but apparently there is a set-up for this purpose and we are discussing a man who judges moral influences and we are going to pass on his salary. Could the hon. Minister tell us what are the categories and has there been a change? What is the first category of film and why would this type of film be dangerous except to the very adult and mature person? Then you have the second-class category of film which a general group can see, and I think your third category is for a family group.

I do not go to the films very much, so I am not sure, but I understand the third category means that young children would not be endangered by the kind of thing that is depicted. Tell us what kind of things are you looking for in the first test that make you think they are very dangerous; and when you are answering I wonder could you say, has there been a modifying of the standards in the past four years; has there been a change in the past four years?

Hon. Mr. Auld: As I thought I mentioned at the outset on this vote, there are three classifications. You might say the unclassified which seem to be suitable for all ages; the adult which the board regards as perhaps unsuitable for children or of not too much interest to children—that classification was first adopted in 1946; and then the restricted classification which prohibits anyone under 18 years from viewing the film—that was instituted in July, 1953. Now I think it is obvious that if it is classified as restricted, then it is felt that this is totally unsuitable for persons under 18 years of age.

Mr. Thompson: Could I ask: what are the standards which we are safeguarding? Is it murder and sex that are the deep concern, that children should not be exposed to this? What is the censor watching to cut out in this classification?

Hon. Mr. Auld: I would think that it could be many things, Mr. Chairman. It could be a great deal of violence. There could be no particular sex to it. Or it could be some sort of perversion, for instance. In filming some of the novels which have been published over the years and which have received wide critical acclaim. Perhaps some of the things that were described in those novels are quite proper for adults to read and to see, but adults would not want their children to see them. It would be very difficult for me, Mr. Chairman, to run down a list and even then it could not be accurate, because under certain circumstances one thing might be acceptable and under another it would not. I would refer my hon. friend to films that he has seen in which perhaps some of the words used, if they were used in another context, would not be in very good taste or perhaps it might be considered that they should be deleted, but in a certain context in a certain historical period they might be quite proper. I hope that will satisfy my hon. friend.

Mr. Thompson: I gather, sir, this really becomes a subjective decision by the censor rather than an objective criterion that he has to go by. By that I mean, he does not have a set of rules saying that if a man or woman is hit over the head eight times instead of four, then this comes under one restrictive class or another. We rely on the good taste of the censor and on his personal decision on this. Am I right in this, sir?

Hon. Mr. Auld: I would say, Mr. Chairman, it would be a combination of both objective and subjective.

Mr. Thompson: I have seen a film which was shown in Europe and then I have seen the film which has been censored by him and I could see the reason why he deleted the certain part, but many of us are not able to assess whether he has good taste or not because we do not see what he has done. How, sir, would it not be a situation of relying on his subjective decision?

Hon. Mr. Auld: Of course, what my hon. friend says holds true in any operation where deletions are made, whether it would be in the field of films or books, where a book may well be censored by the publisher simply because he feels this is either not in good taste or it is not good business. I do not know how we could ever define a field as nebulous and as changing as the classification of films. As I say, it is a changing field and things that are acceptable today perhaps may not have been 50 years ago and vice versa. I think it is a question of having a body of people whose judgment is generally accepted by the public, which indicates that they are in tune with the times. I would simply say, Mr. Chairman, that it would appear to me, from my observations of the scene in Ontario insofar as films are concerned, that this is exactly what we have at the present time.

Mr. Thompson: In view of this, I have a feeling that the hon. Minister has a certain reluctance about censorship by government and yet I think also he feels that there is a necessity for some kind of control so that there is not open license with respect to films being shown. But he is suggesting that there are changing moral attitudes and I would agree with him on that. Do you have a change in your board that reflects the new thinking of people? What is the composition of the censorship board and the background of the censor?

Hon. Mr. Auld: I could give my hon. friend the basic details of the members of the board. Mr. Silverthorn, who is the chairman, has been in the public service since August 27, 1934. He worked in the business college field and completed public school, high school and business college. Mr. McFee, the vice-chairman, has primary and secondary education and was in professional sports for a number of years. He entered the public service in 1935. Mr. Knowles took primary and secondary education here in Toronto, worked for the Evening Telegram for a number of years and British and Colonial Press Limited, and entered the public service in 1950. Mrs. Dunlop, who had primary and secondary and business education, was a member of the school board in Toronto for a number of years. She entered the public service in 1963. Mr. Scholes, who was educated here in Toronto in primary and secondary education, has been on the board since 1945.

Mr. Thompson: Sir, with no reflection on the present persons of this board, it might be helpful to complement the board with people who have other areas of criteria of taste. I am thinking of such people who are actually in the creative field. I understand from what you are listing that most of the people have academic accomplishments in business school and so on. I am thinking that after all, this board is the group that is establishing the tastes of not only our young people but of our adults as well in the field of theatre. I would think that perhaps we could broaden it to reflect others as well as the interest of a few.

Hon. Mr. Auld: I would not quite agree with my hon. friend that the board is establishing the tastes of the young people. I would think that it is keeping current with the pace of the young people's parents and the people at large in the province. But of course, it is always well to ensure that we are keeping up with the times. I think that the board has done this up until now but my hon. friend's suggestion is a good one.

I might just say that from what I am told by the board, probably there is less difficulty in dealing with the films produced by the major permanent producers in this country, and in other countries, than there is with those films which are made by independents—I would not call them fly-by-nights—some from many parts of the globe including North America. In these latter cases there is no continuing organization which wants to stay in business and wants to please the public, to perhaps educate the public but not just to try to shock the public. It would appear that more and more there is responsibility in the industry. There will always be the fellow who comes along with something that he wants to make a fast buck on and which would cause a great deal of concern if it were perhaps shown without being classified, but that appears to be less of a problem now than it was a few years ago.

Mr. Thompson: Sir, I would just end with this, that I have talked with several producers—I am not acquainted with many producers of films but I have talked with several—and on the whole they feel that there is an understanding of their work by the board. However, they have mentioned to me, and I am not going into this in the House, two situations of censorship where it seems that the censor, probably with a very genuine interest in safeguarding the morality of the people, cut out a particular situation that was not really an immoral situation. It was something like cutting, according to the producer, a soliloquy out of Hamlet, and to him it destroyed the whole dramatic effect of the film.

I felt surely this would not be the situation but I am not sure whether we have people who have been in the artistic field on the board, and for this reason I suggest that we might complement it.

Mr. Troy: There may be, Mr. Minister, changes certainly in our morals but nevertheless, as far as I am concerned, adultery is adultery just the same as it was 2,000 years ago; lust is still lust.

But I was going to ask you: What about this? Can the censor board—as pointed out in this letter the psychiatrist sternly tells the audience that some poor sick person, after seeing this film "Psycho," goes out and commits three murders. Now how does the censor board know that there may not be some sick person in the audience? Just because you say "adult entertainment" it does not mean that the people there, of 21 or 31 or any age, are adults in mentality.

You talk about mature persons. Some people I know are well beyond the age of voting and they are no more mature than a little babe in arms. And I think, sir, that this man has a very good point here about these films of violence; because if you publish things or show things you may induce a person, who is sick in his mind, to go and do it.

I remember in London during the war years, when I was on leave, some girl jumped out of an apartment building and was impaled on those iron fences you find around these apartments. In a week there were two more of the same type just because, I suppose, they brooded on it.

Then we find a double bill advertised. One may be for adult entertainment, the other is general entertainment. If the adult entertainment comes first then what happens to the youngsters who may be there? No, the family film may come first and what do they do then? Does the theatre manager say, "Now all you youngsters have to get out of here. There is a film you are not supposed to see"?

Hon. Mr. Auld: Mr. Chairman, just to interrupt and explain to the hon. member, perhaps I did not make clear that "adult entertainment" is simply a guide. There is no restriction. The only classification which carries with it a restriction, as far as children are concerned, is the restricted classification. "Adult entertainment" is simply a guide to the parents as to whether they want to let their children go to the theatre to see the film in question or not; or whether they want to take them.

Mr. Troy: Are they allowed to go in without their parents? Under eighteen, is it restricted? They are not allowed, eh? So there is no age limit any more so far as an adult entertainment film is concerned?

Hon. Mr. Auld: Never has been.

Mr. Troy: Never has been? Oh, what do you mean? I think you had better look back to your regulations.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Chairman, I agree with the hon. member for Nipissing that lust remains lust, licentiousness remains licentiousness, and adultery remains adultery. And I do not know how, sir, in the field of film censorship, we establish absolute standards. These things pervade society, and I am not at all sure that society need run from the evidence of them in the film industry.

The other aspect which interests me in this particular vote, and I follow here on a point raised by the hon. member for Dovercourt, is that I think there is a tendency to censor excessively in Ontario, a tendency which is reflected in the makeup of the board.

I, too, think that one would do well to have theatrical people on the board, artists of various kinds, academics from fields of higher education, teachers from fields of secondary education, people representative of the legal and jurisprudence community generally, who reflect in the course of everyday work changing social attitudes. I do not think we are bound by moral absolutes here; but we must try to reflect general changing social attitudes.

I am not sure that what the French see, the English see, the Germans see, and the Scandinavians see, should not be seen by the people of Ontario.

I have never been able to comprehend why certain slices of films are deleted. I have never been able to fully comprehend why we have such delicate moral sensibilities as compared with the others. I suspect that there is a sufficient degree of sophistication on this continent to comprehend certain films and to not be destroyed by them. I therefore simply rise to echo strongly the suggestion that the board might be broadened to reflect the maturity which has become evident in the postwar period in European censorship areas, and that might have a salutary effect here.

Let it be said to my hon. friend opposite that I am a little embarrassed by the western province which has seen fit to censor "Tom Jones," and it is totally beyond my understanding how this kind of thing can happen.

Vote 2108 agreed to.

On vote 2109:

Mr. Chairman: The member for Perth.

Mr. J. F. Edwards (Perth): Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether it comes under this vote or not, but I would like to say a few words regarding the tourist industry and how it affects the riding which I have the honour to represent.

Also, regarding the historical branch, it was my pleasure to take a part in the unveiling of a plaque honouring the late Timothy Eaton in the county of Perth in the village of Kirkton, where he had his first store. I would like to commend the department and the officials of that branch for the very fine arrangements they made on that occasion; and I want to assure them that the women's institute which brought about this study and made this presentation is very happy in the consummation of having this plaque placed there.

In connection with the tourist industry itself, I do not think there is any place in the province, other than Niagara Falls, which is possibly more interested in tourists. And the incentive is there in one of the greatest attractions this province, possibly all Canada, has—and I refer to the Stratford Shakespearean Festival which starts its 12th year this present year. This has received support from all over America. As a matter of fact, in the 12 years, attendance has gone from 68,000 to over 300,000. The box receipts have gone from $206,000 to approximately $1 million.

The shows themselves, which originally ran for six weeks, have been extended to 16 weeks. Including rehearsal times, the actors are now hired for a six-month period. So you can see the employment which has developed from what started as a small industry, you might put it, yet is now the biggest single tourist attraction there is, other than Niagara Falls, in this country, in my estimation.

I would like, with the hon. Minister's permission, with that of Mr. Chairman, to show a brochure of this festival; and if you have not already visited Stratford, it is a very beautiful city, try to come up to the festival this year.

Thank you.

Vote 2109 agreed to.

On vote 2110:

Mr. F. Guindon (Stormont): Mr. Chairman, I would like to take just a few minutes to give you some idea of the work of the Ontario-St. Lawrence Development Commission and to tell you of a few of the plans we have for it.

First, however, I feel that I must pay tribute to the memory of one of the men whose dreams and whose work made this entire project possible. On November 27, Dr. J. L. Carrol died in Brockville. Dr. Carrol had been associated with the commission since its earliest planning stages and, in the final years of his life, had devoted a great deal of time and effort to the commission. He was one of the first members and served as vice-chairman until his retirement in December, 1962. His death was a genuine loss to our commission. We feel that Upper Canada Village and the commission parks system will long stand as a memorial to this dedicated man. And, to commemorate the doctor's name, it has been decided that the museum of the river—a museum designed to show the importance of the St. Lawrence River in the development of Upper Canada—will be called the Dr. J. L. Carrol Memorial Museum.

This has been a year of considerable change for the commission. This change is best reflected in the proposal, now given Royal assent, to alter the name of the commission to the St. Lawrence Parks Commission. The dropping of the word "development" from the title reflects the end of one era of the commission's history and the beginning of another stage. After years of operations, we feel that the major phase of our work no longer is in the field of development. While we hope to continue to expand the parks and historic sites system in the years to come, the main role of the commission now is an operational one.

But the changes in the past year have been more than those of title and philosophy. In placing increasing emphasis on the operational aspect of the commission, its first general manager, Mr. O. R. Dalzell, was hired last year to direct the day-to-day work of the commission. Under his direction many new procedures and systems have been installed to give both added economy and added flexibility to the commission.

Another step, once again reflecting the commission's changing role, was its transfer to The Department of Tourism and Information from The Department of Economics and Development. Once again the thinking was that with the planning and development stages behind us, the commission was naturally suited to be a part of the department concerned most directly with tourism in Ontario. Although this change came about only last August, it already has begun to show results. We feel there is a great deal of scope here for co-ordination between the activities of the department and those of the commission. Already the organization and methods branch of The Provincial Treasurer's Department has undertaken a study to reduce overlapping in the administrative branches. This study, we believe, will lead to increased efficiency in the commission operation. Sharing services with the department, whenever possible, will lead to overall economies.

Last year's operating season was by far the most successful in the commission's history. During the five months that the parks, campsites and historic sites were open to the public there was a total of 2,016,000 admissions. It marked the first time that the total admissions passed the two million mark and was an increase of more than 250,000 over the previous year.

By far the largest increase was shown in the use of our parks and campsites. Last year, 1,337,000 persons visited these parks and campsites. This year the total was 1,600,000. Fort Henry also showed a significant increase in visitors, rising by 16,000 admissions to a total of 186,000 persons. In addition, it is estimated that another 18,000 were present for the joint sunset ceremonial performed by the Fort Henry Guard and the U.S. Marine Corps.

At some of our parks and campsites, overcrowding has been a major problem. The only way of meeting this problem is through enlargement of our facilities and last year saw the opening of two new parks and campsites.

The largest of these is Grenville Bay, just east of Prescott. It proved highly popular during its first season of operation and was visited by a total of nearly 20,000 people. The other new addition was the seven-acre Fairfield Park west of Kingston which had a total attendance for the season of just less than 46,000 people. Thus these two parks accounted for about a quarter of the overall increase in attendance at all the commission sites.

However, many of our parks, particularly those at the eastern end of the 170-mile system, still suffer from overcrowding and we anticipate in the years to come that this Legislature will be asked to approve funds for even further extensions of the commission properties and facilities.

To some extent, 1963 was the year of the Fort Henry Guard. On two separate occasions—and on two separate continents—the guard provided some of the most colourful highlights of the summer season. For two and a half weeks in June, the guard appeared twice daily at the highly regarded Royal Tournament in London, England. The Royal Tournament is considered one of the world's great military displays and the inclusion of the guard—which is, do not forget, a unit of summer soldiers—was a great honour to the unit and to the province of Ontario. As can be seen from the press clippings, it certainly is no exaggeration to say that it was the hit of the show.

The guard's invitation to the tournament, to appear with such illustrious company as the Royal Marines and the King's Troop of the Royal Horse Artillery, was its second appearance there. It marked the first time in the 73-year history of the tournament that any unit from outside the British Isles had ever been granted a second invitation to appear.

During its stay in England, the guard also had the honour of being inspected by the Honourable George Drew, then Canadian High Commissioner in London, and by Her Majesty the Queen. The inspection by the Queen, accompanied by the President of India, came at the official opening of a showing of Canadian art in London. But, if the guard as a whole was a hit at the Royal Tournament, the various members of the unit were equally popular outside the confines of Earls Court.

Londoners were extremely impressed by the appearance and manners of these young university students and they proved to be the finest possible ambassadors for this province.

The second highlight of the Fort Henry season came in late August. Approximately 18,000 people jammed Fort Henry to watch the guard perform a joint ceremonial with the Presidential Review Unit and Drum and Bugle Band of the United States Marine Corps. This marked the second visit of the Marine Corps to Fort Henry and symbolized the extremely close friendship between these two groups.

One other new departure this year involving the guard was the production of a recording of the weekly retreat ceremonial. The ceremonial was first performed on a weekly basis this year and the recording of the drill team, battle tactics and fife and drum corps has proved an extremely popular souvenir of the fort.

Plans have started for a recording featuring Upper Canada Village and it is hoped to have it produced in time for sale when this year's season opens May 15.

The year also saw other new attractions designed to publicize the commission and draw tourists to the area.

One of these was the first annual Upper Canada Village regatta held last June. More than 25 sailboats from all over Ontario and northern New York state took part in the two-day regatta held on the St. Lawrence river right opposite Upper Canada Village and Crysler Farm Battlefield Park. The regatta organizers were extremely pleased with the response and a second regatta has been scheduled for May 30 and May 31 of this year.

On January 18 a somewhat different race—although it once again used the St. Lawrence river—was held in the Long Sault Parkway area. This was a sports car race on ice sponsored by the Cornwall Light Car Association. And to those who might doubt the drawing power of such an event, I would like to mention that nearly 1,000 cars jammed the spectator parking area.

The commission is normally thought of as a summer operation. However, we have moved this year to add an early spring attraction in the parkland to the north of Upper Canada Village, an old-fashioned sugaring-off. In the midst of a stand of some 1,200 maple trees, the commission has reconstructed an old sugaring-off shanty. It is open to the public and can easily be reached by a trail running into the bush from the highway. It was in full operation a few weeks ago and a large number of spectators were on hand to watch the processing of the maple sugar and syrup. The produce of the sugaring-off was placed on sale at the shanty site and in the regular commission outlets at Upper Canada Village and Fort Henry.

A complaint often heard at the village was the lack of activities outside of a tour of the village itself. This year, we will be taking two major steps to overcome this problem.

In June we hope to open a nine-hole golf course on the park property immediately north of the village and Crysler park. This will be the first stage of an 18-hole tournament course and should prove very popular both with tourists and with residents of the area.

The second project is a miniature railway to carry visitors throughout the park. Proposals for the railway, a replica of those of the mid-nineteenth century, already have been called and it is hoped to have it in operation this summer. The first stage of the miniature railway will carry passengers from the store at the entrance gate to the village, along the river side of the Crysler Battlefield memorial mound and along to Crysler beach. The second stage, when completed, will be an extension to include the railway museum and the marina to the west of the park.

Visitors to Upper Canada Village this year will see several changes and additions. Besides the opening of the Dr. J. L. Carrol Memorial Museum to the public, Christ Church will be seen in its fully completed condition for the first time.

In conjunction with the cheese centennial committee, a reproduction of a 100-year-old cheese factory will be constructed between government house and the museum of agriculture. Opening of the cheese factory will commemorate the first production of cheddar cheese in Ontario in June, 1864.

Because of the extremely heavy demand for the bread produced in the village bake-ovens, a second bake house will be opened this year. The new bake house will double the quantity of bread produced in the village. The extra bread will be offered for sale at the village store and will be used in the restaurants and dining rooms of the village. A woodshed also has been added to the schoolmaster's house—after all, where else could the poor man do his caning of the pupils—and a drive shed has been built to house the doctor's gigs.

All of these, Mr. Chairman, are part of our continuing programme to make Upper Canada Village, Fort Henry and the parks and campsites of this system the best development of its kind in North America. I would like to thank the hon. members for their attention to this report. I trust I will have the support of all of them in voting for sums needed to carry on the work of the commission.

Mr. S. Apps (Kingston): Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few comments on vote 2110, but before doing so I thought it only right that I should congratulate the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Oliver) on his attire this afternoon, brightening up the rather sombre, and I might even say conservative-looking, men on the Opposition. I would like to congratulate him for giving us this little breath of spring on the other side of the House. I might say that he is second only to our own hon. member for Hamilton Centre (Mrs. Pritchard) who, from this particular row here, it is always a pleasure to see and to wonder at the very fine-looking hats that she invariably wears.

Now in commenting on vote 2110—

Mr. Sopha: What is the matter with the Leafs?

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): They needed the hon. member for Kingston last night.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. member should see if he can keep up his stick-handling now.

Mr. Apps: As I was saying, commenting on 2110, being the member for Kingston and the islands, I too would like to add my congratulations to the Ontario-St. Lawrence Development Commission for the wonderful work that they have done, particularly east of Kingston. I would also corroborate entirely the statements from the hon. member for Stormont, Mr. Chairman, that the sunset ceremony at Fort Henry is one thing that everybody in this country should see, because I think it is the finest spectacle of its kind in the world.

But I was rather abashed to hear him say that the planning and development work of the commission was now over and I would respectfully suggest to him that it is only half over. Granted, it could be all over on all that section east of Kingston, but I would submit to him, and through him to the commission, the fact that there is an area west of Kingston that can certainly stand a great deal of planning and development yet. I would hope that his commission in their future plans will not overlook this area, which sometimes is called the Quinte Parkway, because it is one of the most beautiful, and at the same time historic, drives in eastern Ontario. As I mentioned before, this is from Kingston west to Adolphustown.

I would like to pay tribute here to a group of very dedicated citizens of that area, and in Kingston, who in their efforts to preserve some of this shoreline, the historical value of this shoreline, have spent a great deal of their time in order to provide a plan for the overall development of this particular area. I would hope that the commission would very seriously consider the implementation of this plan in their development of this area.

I know there are certain difficulties in this. I know that it can be done. If the commission will take a look at it, use this plan as a guide and in co-operation with the municipalities concerned, lay out a plan for this area that will preserve this beautiful drive and also the historic possibilities of it. I would suggest if they will take the time to lay out this plan and gradually develop it over the next ten or 15 years, and promote it as they go, then they will have west of Kingston the same type of drive, historical areas, picnic grounds and parks that they have so successfully completed east of Kingston. I would hope that they will consider this very seriously. I would hope also that they will make up their minds and do it.

As I mentioned before, do it gradually. Pick up some land as it becomes available, promote those particular areas as they become available and so induce commercial activities to come in as well and in that way it will benefit the municipalities financially as well.

I realize, at the present time, many of these municipalities look on this plan with a little bit of disfavour because they feel they are going to lose assessment if some of this land is used for parks and picnic ground development. But I maintain that if this area is picked up gradually, promoted and developed, the commercial developments which will come in because of that will far outweigh any revenue the municipalities might lose through making this land into parks.

So at one time I am congratulating the commission on the wonderful job they have done, and it has truly been a wonderful job, from Kingston east, and I am also suggesting to them that their planning and development is only half over and that now is the time to start looking at the land from Kingston west, to do the same job there as they have done so capably east of Kingston. Thank you.

Mr. N. Whitney (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Chairman, I would also like to congratulate the commission on the fine job they have done throughout the area and particularly, of course, I want to refer to the Adolphustown Park and the new Fairfield Park, which are in the riding of Prince Edward-Lennox.

The Fairfield park is a new one which was opened last year. It is approximately four acres in area and, in its first year of operation, had an attendance of over 45,000 visitors. We owe a great debt of thanks to the Fairfield family. This property was originally acquired, and a fine frame house was constructed, by William Fairfield, who was a United Empire Loyalist, in the year 1792. It has been continuously maintained and inhabited by this family throughout the intervening years and, of course, just recently, they made available to the commission and to the people of Ontario, this beautiful historic property and its furnishings. Certainly the response of the general public is gratifying indeed.

I also understand that, in due course, a Mrs. Mabel Fairfield Gutzeit of Bath, who also has a very historical property and possessions, is going to donate this to the province, and I know that in future years the people of Ontario will greatly appreciate her generosity, also.

In regard to the Adolphustown park, we really ought to be very grateful for assistance we have received there. In the beginning there was the UEL burying ground with a memorial, and this was in a very sad state of repair. The United Empire Loyalists Association of Toronto, assisted by the late Mrs. R. S. McLaughlin of Oshawa, kindly restored this cemetery, made it a place of beauty, and then presented it to the province—on condition they acquired it as a park. The province acquired some 30 acres at that time and, later, 30 acres more. Originally the park was started under Lands and Forests.

Of course, when the Ontario-St. Lawrence Development Commission was established, they took over the provincial parks in Lennox and Addington county.

I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Kingston and in many ways I agree with what he has said. However, I will say that, in all honesty, I feel that association of Kingston which is promoting a parkway has perhaps a different viewpoint to what I have on a great many matters. I feel that one of their outstanding members thought that he would like to compare this area, and make it a second Niagara parkway; and others compare it with what has been done at Upper Canada Village, and along the St. Lawrence. My own feeling is that this location is unique in itself, and can stand on its own merits, providing it is developed in the proper way.

I do not think it should be called a parkway. I think that a better name suggestion might come forth. A name which has been in my mind is "Quinte Scenicway"—because it encompasses the beginning of the Bay of Quinte at the eastern end, in Lennox; and the end of the Bay of Quinte, near Trenton. A name should be provided which will describe the whole length of Highway 33 from Kingston to Trenton, most of which of course is entirely through my riding.

Only by so doing are people going to be invited to come in, both from the west and from the east; and there are certain assets which appeal very much to the travelling public. I know, even as far north as the Lakehead, on a northwestern Ontario tour several years ago, I met people who, when they saw the name of my riding on my coat lapel, said, "Oh, I have been down there and I have crossed over that free ferry. That is a magnificent drive." That is the kind of reputation that drive has.

Furthermore, a great many people do not know of the beautiful view which can be obtained from Lake on the Mountain, just on the Glenora side of the ferry crossing, and which is only approximately about two miles from the Adolphustown park. So I feel that all of the tourist advantages of the area could best be described, and brought to the attention of the people of Ontario and of our visiting tourists, by a name which would encompass the whole length of that section of highway.

I am going to say, and this has been intimated by the hon. member for Kingston, that certain local people have had a concern about what would happen if more parks were established, because certain things have not developed at the Adolphustown park, in connection therewith, as we might have expected. The park itself is beautiful and that is something of which we are very proud, but nevertheless there was a reduction of over 16,000 guests there last year.

Efforts have been made to operate a concession in the past but they were given up because there was not enough business forthcoming. I had rather expected that perhaps a motel or restaurant or some business might have located adjacent to the park and it would have been of benefit to local people. This has not occurred. What has happened though, is that 7,841 more vehicles passed by the gates of Adolphustown park, many of them Kingston people. I know that some of them went to the Outlet Beach Park in Prince Edward county because of its magnificent beach.

Well now, Adolphustown park and the parks along this area cannot compare in certain respects. They attempted to have an artificial beach. I think an improvement can be made on that and the swimming could be improved, but still it can never equal the natural beaches in Prince Edward county. Therefore, the development along this road should be in line with the unique assets we have. The number of people who camp there in tents is limited, and this is not overly productive as far as the local people are concerned. Consequently I feel that something more is needed there to make that park active and give it variety, which I am sure will make it unique among all the parks in the province of Ontario.

I might say that adjacent to that area there is perhaps one of the most famous muskellunge fishing grounds which can be found anywhere. A resident of Adolphustownship by the name of Herbert Punchard regularly catches 'lunge there every year. He has had his picture appear in the paper with 30-pound 'lunge and rare indeed is the year he is not successful. Sometimes he catches three or four.

Just around by Amherst Island I understand that there is some of the greatest bass fishing that can be located anywhere. A conservation officer invited me to go fishing with him one time. He said he was not a fisherman because he did not have the patience. But he said here was one place he liked to fish because he said he was really kept busy.

Just around the corner on the other side there is Hay Bay, which is famous for its pickerel fishing. A little farther along is the scene of the famous Harmsworth boat races.

I would suggest that the commission look very carefully into this whole situation. It might be able to interest a commercial fishing operator to take certain paying guests, visitors to the park or tourists, on fishing trips if there were enough indicating their willingness to go. Just let a few 'lunge be caught there and a few good bass, and people are going to want to fish those waters. There should certainly be landing docks at Adolphustown or at other property that can be acquired, and pretty soon the people will be fishing on their own.

Furthermore, this is often what happens: People talk about the highways being crowded on holidays. Sure it is crowded because the people say, "All we can do is go into the park, sit down at some picnic tables, there is some water there if there is not good swimming, and we can just go there and do that." They feel they might as well go out and sit along the highway because the park has not enough to offer to these people. After they have once visited it and seen its beauty and its historic sites, they realize they cannot even buy the children an ice cream cone or anything of that kind. Things have got to be done to improve that situation and I think that is where the start should be made rather than by the acquisition of land. I think it is all right for land to be acquired but I think that the land should be acquired with specific purposes in mind, not just to get land. Another thing that would be very useful would be a dock at which small boats could land. Perhaps there should be some playground equipment for children. There perhaps should be amusements available so that people can do something. It is not everybody who can enjoy lying around for three or four hours at a time and doing nothing.

I think that in our area we do have a situation that, as I have said, is unique. It is probably one of the most scenic views to be found anywhere. It is historic, and I agree with the statements that have been made by the hon. member for Kingston that it is certainly worth promoting. I would suggest that the commission look into this whole proposal, keeping in mind local assessment opinions and I would urge that an effort be made to see if steps can be taken that will result in local people securing a greater benefit than they have had until now.

We are grateful for the park but we feel it really has not attained the potential which it should. I am sure that with a little effort and a little thought, the commission will make it perhaps one of the very best parks in the St. Lawrence development.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister or the reporting member of the commission, if some young student who was going to major in history wanted to get a job at Upper Canada Village in the summertime, to whom would he write?

Mr. Guindon: Mr. Chairman, there would be no problem at all. The young student applies through our personnel officer. He gets an application form. I would suggest that he should apply early, in January, preferably.

Mr. Troy: Too late this year.

Mr. Guindon: As far as I can recall, I think we have about 75 vacancies for this coming season. We certainly had over 500 or 600 applications.

Mr. Troy: You are selective, though. You will take the best—

Mr. Guindon: No, the personnel officer does the selection.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I am quite impressed with what has been said about this park and commission. I am rather a dollar-and-cent man myself. How much money does it make or lose for the province of Ontario?

Mr. Guindon: Mr. Chairman, I think if you want to know as far as operation and maintenance is concerned, we cleared 75 per cent in the last year. I will get the exact amount.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I would like to phrase my question this way: How much was taken in and how much was spent?

Mr. Guindon: Mr. Chairman, does the hon. member mean how much money was spent since the beginning?

Mr. Whicher: No, in the one year.

Mr. Guindon: In the one year? The estimated operating cost was $982,000 for 1963-64 and the revenues were $750,000.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, in other words, this was a net cost to the taxpayers of roughly $232,000 last year?

Mr. Guindon: A deficit.

Mr. Whicher: I believe there is consideration that the cost to the people who use the parks might be increased so that the provincial parks, as far as operating expenses are concerned, would be put at a break-even point. Has this been investigated because—considering the fantastic costs of all departments of government—I would be very pleased if this would come to at least the break-even point.

Mr. Guindon: Mr. Chairman, as you know the commission has no jurisdiction in the fixing of admission fees. This is done by the Parks Integration Board, but as you are well aware, at the present rate of $3 for a season, this is mighty cheap to give a family the right to be in the parks all over the province, whether it is a park under The Department of Lands and Forests or the commission, so it is up to government policy whether or not it will be increased in the future.

Mr. Troy: I would like to ask the chairman of the commission, has your tavern in the village a licence?

Mr. Guindon: Mr. Chairman, we have no licence for the tavern, but there are places around Morrisburg and Cornwall which would certainly answer the hon. member's needs.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): What is served in the tavern? Not lemonade, I hope.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, would the commissioner explain what the $67,000 was spent on for Dalton K. Camp and Associates?

Hon. Mr. Auld: Mr. Chairman, the commission's advertising programme is handled by D. K. Camp and Associates and probably has been as big a part in making the operations of the commission successful from the outset as any other thing. The breakdown—

Mr. Whicher: Does this come under tender?

Hon. Mr. Auld: No.

Mr. Whicher: It is just given to them?

Hon. Mr. Auld: Actually, what the commission did was in 1960 to ask for proposals from, I think, six or seven advertising agencies. The Camp Associates proposal was the one that the commission felt was the best and that is the one that was adopted. The breakdown is $14,890 for newspaper advertising, $14,869 for billboards, $22,100 for the main folder, and then there were certain other folders on camping and so on; posters, $663; other services, press release forms, general publicity and so on, made up the balance.

Mr. Newman: Thanks, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Singer: He is not the man who produced the bilious canoes, is he?

Hon. Mr. Auld: Not for the commission.

Mr. Singer: Oh, not for the commission.

Mr. Newman: Would the hon. Minister tell me, does the department make any attempt to sell that whole complex to the schools by publicity sent throughout the schools of the province?

Hon. Mr. Auld: Not throughout the province. Indirectly the commission has had a programme of a prize—in fact, I think it was three prizes for different groups of grades—for an essay on the village or an essay on the period indicated by the village. This has been primarily through the eastern Ontario region and was worked in conjunction with school inspectors and so on.

Now material is of course available to the schools and a great deal is disseminated to teachers whose classes are going to be visiting the village. There have been, I am informed, about 50,000 students at the village during the month of June who came in their classes, and probably this is the most graphic way of getting the story across. But what the commission has had to do in the past, and it has been working more successfully as people get used to the system, is to ask the teacher to write in for material before the class comes so that they have some discussion about it, they have some knowledge of the things they are going to see and they organize their tour a little better. I can assure the hon. member—I do not suppose, being a teacher, he would need this assurance—but if you get 1,000 children in a village with 30-odd buildings and one teacher for 30 or 40, without organization there is a tendency to become chaotic.

Mr. Newman: May I suggest to the hon. Minister then that he have a showcard, probably 18 by 24 inches, sent to each one of the schools each week selling some portion of the province of Ontario, a nice colourful card, exactly the way tourist travel agencies do, like the various European companies? If this showcard, set up on a bulletin board, were changed each week, I think it would not only be a good geography lesson to the students in the schools, but also would attempt to sell the beauties of Ontario throughout the province by means of the schools.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I have just one more question to ask. I have noticed in the last few days on television, on one of the stations in Toronto, the province of New Brunswick is advertising extensively through the television media and I have been rather impressed with the manner in which they have done it. Has the hon. Minister seen this, and if so have we in his department any comparable advertising through this TV media?

Hon. Mr. Auld: Mr. Chairman, again I think we are a little out of order, but I would be glad to answer—

Mr. Whicher: Well, this advertising came up under Mr. Camp.

Hon. Mr. Auld: There is no TV in that amount, but there might be. Very briefly, because I want to give any information we can, The Department of Travel and Publicity, now The Department of Tourism and Information, has used TV to a limited extent in the past, generally for what you might call spot promotions, for something like the tulip festival, in a fairly limited area. We might possibly be doing that this year in connection with skiing in certain limited areas where it is within a day or two's drive of a specific skiing area. But to undertake a large programme on television, which is a very expensive medium to use, would require then a great reduction—that is operating within the same budget—a great reduction in the funds spent in newspapers, radio and magazines. It is a question of—perhaps if the hon. member looks into it, he will find out there is an agency acting for New Brunswick, I think he may know the agency—it is really a question of who you want to reach and for what purpose. It may well be that for certain kinds of programmes TV is more effective than some of the other media and this is one of the things that is being studied and one of the things which our research branch will be looking into.

Vote 2110 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This concludes the estimates of The Department of Tourism and Information.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY AND RESOURCES MANAGEMENT

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Chairman, before going into the detailed estimates of this department, I would like to take a moment to pay tribute to my predecessor in the department, the hon. member for Riverdale (Mr. Macaulay). I am sure that all hon. members of this House, as well as the people of Ontario, were sorry to learn of the hon. member's resignation as a Minister of the Crown because of ill health. As Minister of Energy Resources and Economics and Development the hon. member gave unsparingly of his time and energy for the benefit of the citizens of our province. And it is largely due to his untiring efforts as Minister of Energy Resources that I am able to present to you today a favourable report on the operations of this department.

I would also like to compliment my deputy Minister, Mr. Hilliard, and all members of the staff for their loyal support, co-operation and assistance since I took over The Department of Energy Resources last October.

In introducing the estimates of The Department of Energy and Resources Management I would like to make a few remarks first, regarding the energy industry.

It should not come as a surprise that energy consumption in Ontario in the past year reached an all-time high. In this province we consumed more natural gas, more oil, and more electric power than ever before. I will go into more detail on this later. It is a very important sign of the health of the economy in this prosperous province. About 37 per cent of all energy used in Canada was used in Ontario. We expect that, by 1975, energy consumption in Ontario will be nearly twice what it is today. The energy studies branch of the department estimates that at that time 25.7 per cent of all energy used in this province will come from coal, coke and manufactured gas; 47.1 per cent from petroleum; 20 per cent from natural gas; 5.9 per cent from water power; and 1.3 per cent from wood, liquefied petroleum gas and nuclear energy.

In the years to come one of the main tasks of the department will be to see that the energy from different sources will at all times be available in abundance and at the lowest possible cost. Without this we could not maintain the necessary economic and industrial growth of this province.

At this point I would like to review briefly each of our energy sources.

The first—oil. In 1963, we used nearly 120 million barrels of oil, that is 4,200 million gallons—an increase of nine per cent over the previous year. While part of this came from refineries in Quebec and western Canada the greatest part, about 80 per cent, was produced by refineries located in Ontario.

The Ontario refineries can process 306,200 barrels per day—an increase in capacity of ten per cent over 1962. Ontario refineries account for 30 per cent of the total Canadian refinery capacity. Some major companies plan substantial construction of additional capacity but no details have been released to date.

Ontario's own production of oil was 1,205,000 barrels in 1963, or about one per cent of our requirements. While this is a drop in the bucket it is, however, an important segment of industry in Ontario. The department encourages the development of the oil production in Ontario in a number of ways. For example, we provide well records and maps at cost. We give out reprints of Acts and regulations at no charge. The staff of the department give advice, information and supervision at no charge.

The interprovincial oil pipeline extension from Waterdown to Buffalo was completed in 1963 and crude oil from western Canada is now flowing to American refineries in Buffalo. The Imperial Oil Co. pipeline to the new Toronto International Airport, linking to existing lines from the Sarnia refinery, was completed in 1963 enabling direct delivery of aviation fuels. Part of the trans-northern pipeline, carrying Montreal-refined products to Toronto, was reversed in October 1963 resulting in Ontario-refined products displacing foreign oil eastwards to Kingston. The section of the line between Kilbrie near Kingston and Maitland near Brockville has been taken out of operation. This pipeline now supplies Montreal-refined products to the Ottawa Valley only.

I stated earlier that the department is vitally interested in encouraging oil production in Ontario. Continued exploration for oil resulted in the discovery of three new oil pools in 1963. They are located near Duart in Kent county, Verschoyle in Oxford county, and Brigden in Lambton county. Some drilling is still required to determine the commercial potential of these pools but all are most encouraging. Since the beginning of 1964, one additional pool has been discovered in Dunwich township in Elgin county.

Oil production, from those Ontario oil fields in which secondary recovery projects are in effect, forms an important part of the overall total.

There are presently 14 such secondary projects approved by permit or board order. In all cases water is the displacement fluid used or planned. The fields involved are Grand Bend, Warwick, Petrolia, Oil Springs, Shetland, Glencoe, Rodney and Becher. Eleven are in operation, one is under construction, and two are temporarily suspended for alterations.

The amount of additional oil which will be recovered by these projects cannot be accurately forecast, but a conservative estimate is five million barrels.

A more or less typical case is provided by the operation in the Glencoe Field. Here an experimental flood in 1956 to 1958 showed promise, and a full-scale flood was begun in 1958. Annual production in 1957 was about 14,000 barrels. In 1963, the total was about over 36,000 barrels and this rate should be maintained for some years. Total ultimate recovery is estimated at 350,000 barrels of oil from the portion of the field under flood, which will require the injection of about 2.5 million barrels of water.

Natural gas: During 1963 Ontario consumed 167 billion cubic feet of natural gas, an increase of 12.3 per cent over 1962. The increase is lower than we expected at the beginning of the year. This is mainly due to the unseasonably high temperatures in the last part of 1963.

It is expected that natural gas sales in Ontario in 1964 will reach the 200 billion cubic feet mark.

It is interesting to note that in 1963 there were 622,504 customers using natural gas in Ontario; 91.6 per cent of them were residential users consuming 37 per cent of the total. Only one per cent were industrial customers but they used 49.8 per cent of all natural gas.

Production of natural gas in Ontario in 1963 amounted to 15.9 billion cubic feet, an increase of two per cent over 1962. The Ontario production represents nine per cent of the total consumption of natural gas in the province.

Accompanying the growth in consumption is an increased use of the gas storage facilities. Last year we put 26.2 billion cubic feet of gas in storage and we took out 24.4 billion cubic feet. The Ontario Energy Board authorized further storage facilities by granting permission to Tecumseh Ltd. to inject, store and withdraw gas in the Kimbal-Colinville, Seckerton and Corunna pools, thereby increasing our storage facilities by about 40 billion cubic feet of working storage.

In order to transport the gas stored in these pools to the major consumption areas, Union Gas Co. was authorized to commence construction of a 142-mile-long, 34-inch pipeline extending from Dawn township in Lambton county to a point near Oakville at a cost of $24 million. The first phase to be completed in 1964 is 60 miles from Dawn township to London at a cost of $10 million, 95 per cent of which will be spent in Canada.

Very recently, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Ltd. applied to the National Energy Board for a certificate to construct a number of compressor stations in Ontario. The stations will be located near Vermilion Bay, Martin, Raith, Hurkett, Jellicoe, Klotz Lake, Calstock, Kapuskasing, Potter, Swastika, Marten River, and Sundridge. The total expenditure involved is close to $20 million for the Ontario portion of which about 70 per cent will be spent in Canada.

Liquefied petroleum gas: A fast-growing source of energy in this province is liquefied petroleum gas. It is used for a large variety of purposes. We expect that when the pipeline from Empress in Alberta to Winnipeg is operating large quantities will find their way into Ontario. This will probably lead to a greater use of propane appliances, such as forklift trucks, heating for cottages and trailers, and greater use on farms. We will work closely together with industry to see to it that safety is not sacrificed in a period of rapid expansion.

Electric power: This will be fully discussed by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Boyer) who will report on the activities of Ontario Hydro. However, I would like to point out that last year in Ontario 39.5 billion kilowatt hours of electricity were generated, an increase of 1.8 billion kwh over 1962, or 4.8 per cent. This is also a new record for Ontario.

Uranium and nuclear power: Canadian production of uranium in 1963 dropped to 8,141 tons, a decrease of about 300 tons over last year. Of this Elliot Lake produced 72 per cent, or about 5,860 tons; Bancroft four per cent or about 326 tons; while the balance of 24 per cent or 1,955 tons was produced in Saskatchewan. The labour force in uranium mines in Ontario dropped from 3,580 in 1962 to 2,900 in 1963.

By the beginning of 1965 there will probably only be two uranium mines operating in Canada—one in Saskatchewan and one in Ontario, Rio Algom's Nordic Mine at Elliot Lake. We expect that the uranium production will decline for the next few years but that an upturn in sales can be expected by about 1970.

The nuclear power demonstrator—NDP-2—in Rolphton, Ontario, is now in service and is mainly used to gain the necessary experience for the staff to man the CANDU reactor once it goes into operation, as well as gain the technical experience necessary to make CANDU a success. The CANDU reactor being constructed at Kincardine is expected to be finished in 1964 and to commence regular commercial service in 1966. The construction is on schedule and well within cost estimates.

Inspection services branch: After having reviewed the various sources of energy for which The Department of Energy Resources has some responsibility I would like to give you a brief review of the key branches in the department.

During 1963 the inspectors of the inspection services branch carried out 20,524 inspections of fuel oil, natural gas, pipelines and liquefied petroleum gas installations.

The function of the department in the inspection field is probably best explained in the policy we follow in appliance inspections. The department stresses the education of those doing the work rather than the policing methods. As far as the appliances are concerned, I can say we have a specification for every type of oil, gas and propane unit and every manufacturer must use these with his product. We also designate the agencies who will test to authorized specifications and place their seal of approval on the appliances. Certain units and appliances are made up for special purposes and will not be production line units. The department will, however, test and approve non-production units if necessary. A total of 2,763 units of this type were approved by the department in 1963. The number of gas, oil and propane appliances and installations in the province at the present time runs into the millions and this creates a considerable inspection load.

Gas fitters, maintenance fitters and pipeline inspectors are now required to have a government licence. Every appliance installation job and all pipeline installations must be directly supervised by a man holding a certificate. From commencement of this programme in 1961 to the close of 1963, there were 6,432 gas fitters, 737 maintenance fitters, 908 pipeline inspectors certified by The Department of Energy Resources.

Prior to December 31, 1963, a voluntary programme of certification resulted in 320 persons receiving liquefied petroleum gas fitters certificates. Since the start of the new year, with the change in regulations, the certification of liquefied petroleum gas fitters has become mandatory. To date, 431 certificates have been issued.

We have distributed several thousand code books during the year and have sponsored an active programme of trade instruction in all parts of the province. I think the best example of this are the classes that were sponsored by the department beginning in April 1961.

To date, sir, approximately 3,000 persons have attended lectures throughout the province and this emphasizes our objective—education, in addition to our inspections, is the best approach to fuel safety.

The department has co-operated with the Provincial Institute of Trade Schools in establishing a course for gas fitters. This technical instruction course in gas fitting and servicing has been most enthusiastically received by the trade. The inspection personnel of the department are taking an active part in the course acting as instructors, until such time as the school can develop its own teaching personnel.

We have also produced a manual written in non-technical language to further assist tradesmen. And we have also produced a special manual to assist many small gas companies in their operational and maintenance procedures. We are planning to continue this programme by following the same procedure for all propane fitters in Ontario as was used to licence the natural gas fitters. We are also studying the feasibility of certifying personnel in the fuel oil business similar to natural gas and propane.

Members of the department during the last few years have been working together with representatives of other provinces and associations to effect changes in certain standard codes, and work in this field is continuing.

In November 1962 The Department of Energy Resources issued its first licence to an oil distributor who will distribute fuel oil by pipeline from one main tank to a number of houses in a subdivision. Before issuing this licence the design of this plan was studied from a safety requirement standpoint and before the oil lines in the ground were covered. The system was inspected to be certain that the installation followed the proposed design. In 1963 another licence was issued and two applications are presently being considered. The licences issued were for two subdivisions near Ottawa. The licences under consideration at the present time are for another subdivision in Ottawa and an industrial development in Scarborough.

I would now like to turn to the drilling and production branch. I have already stated earlier that the government is encouraging by various means the exploration and development of our native sources of oil and gas. In 1963, 216 wells were drilled in Ontario and of these 35 were drilled in Lake Erie. Twenty-three of the Lake Erie wells were successful in finding gas thus adding significantly to Lake Erie's gas reserves. Some of the 23 were new pools and 1964 drilling will evaluate these discoveries. Lake Erie is now an important source of natural gas accounting for more than 23 per cent of our local production.

The section of the oil and gas industry concerned with lake drilling is fully aware of its obligations to the general public and to the fishing industry. It is continuing to take many steps to help eliminate the hazards from lake production of which the public has been fearful for the past two drilling seasons. The rotary drilling equipment mounted on a converted lake freighter, has proven very effective. At the beginning of the 1964 lake drilling season, a major drilling and production company on Lake Erie will place in operation a newly designed, engineered and constructed drilling barge, on which will be mounted rotary drilling equipment. Blow-out preventers will be used and sewage treatment equipment built in. This same company is designing new well-head assemblies of a simpler design and with a newly designed protective device to allow fishermen's nets to pass over the well-head without fault. In addition, a flexible hose take-off from the well-head in the gathering line is also being designed to help prevent line separation during winter and spring ice conditions on the lake.

A general meeting of all three parties, that is, fishermen, drilling companies, and government, held in the fall, did much to allay the fears of the fishing industry. The department will continue to do all in its power to reduce conflict to a minimum. The Ontario Petroleum Institute, as in past years, has been doing a fine job in promoting technical consultation between the exploration, drilling and production personnel of the oil and gas industry and the department will continue to provide all possible support. The Ontario Gas Council continued its activities in 1963 and held seven meetings. Through the council, the government has obtained industry's views on various matters such as proposed legislative changes, and the wording of proposed new regulations.

The gas and petroleum association is now organizing a committee along the same lines as the gas council so that there will be continuous consultation between the producing industry and The Department of Energy and Resources Management.

The last item I would like to discuss is the Ontario Energy Board. During 1963 the board received 87 applications of which 70 were heard, 13 were withdrawn, and four were heard in January, 1964. There is a great variety in the nature of these hearings. Nineteen hearings were held under The Municipal Franchises Act, 17 hearings were held under

The Ontario Energy Board Act and covered such subjects as rates, authorization to inject gas and arbitration.

Thirty-four hearings were held under The Energy Act covering such items as leave to construct pipelines, pipeline expropriation, secondary recovery of oil, designation of storage areas.

A major public rate hearing of Northern Ontario Natural Gas and its subsidiary Twin City Gas Co. commenced in September, 1962. Hearing of evidence and cross-examination was completed in 1963 and the board is now preparing its reasons for decision which have now been issued.

A second major public rate hearing which had begun in 1962 was that of United Gas Limited. It was concluded in mid-year and the reasons for decision and the rate order were issued in July, 1963.

A new storage area in Zone township was designated and will provide a potential working storage of about 4.9 billion cubic feet of natural gas. In November 1963 the board heard the application of Tecumseh Gas Storage Ltd. for authority to inject, store and remove gas from three of the previously designated Imperial pools namely, Kimball-Colinville, Seckerton and Corunna. Following a two-day hearing in Sarnia the board granted permission thus providing an additional 40 billion cubic feet of working storage.

Throughout the year the board has continued its study and investigation of natural gas storage and related problems. The report of this is now in the final stages of preparation and will be completed at an early date. The fact that the board exists and handles problems very fairly, has led to a more flexible outlook on both sides.

In 1963 the board lost one of its members in the death of Mr. J. J. Wingfelder. His valuable knowledge and experience will be greatly missed.

I would now like to make some comments on the programme of the conservation authorities branch.

Since the passing of The Conservation Authorities Act in 1946, 32 conservation authorities have been established throughout Ontario, embracing 465 participating municipalities and covering an area of 21,952 square miles. Since the beginning of 1963, two new authorities have been formed — the Raisin River Conservation Authority in the Cornwall area, and the Sault Ste. Marie Conservation Authority. Two of the older authorities, the Twelve-Mile Creek Conservation Authority and the Sixteen-Mile Creek Conservation Authority, both in Halton county, have been combined into one, called the Halton Region Conservation Authority.

The most important and costly phase of the work of the conservation authorities is the construction of water conservation and flood control projects. On smaller schemes the province's contribution amounts to 50 per cent of land acquisition and construction costs. The grant in larger capital works is 37.5 per cent and is supplemented in most cases by a further 37.5 per cent grant from the federal government. The authorities are responsible for raising the remainder from their participating municipalities. The total cost of projects completed, under way, or planned at the present time amounts to nearly $136 million.

Agreements were reached in 1961 with the federal government on three large schemes—$38.9 million flood control scheme for the Metropolitan Toronto and Region Conservation Authority, $10 million flood scheme on the Thames river and the $1 million Parkhill Dam on the Ausable river.

The Metropolitan Toronto and Region Conservation Authority programme involves the construction of 15 dams, the acquisition of 7,200 acres of flood plain lands and the creation of ten new recreation areas extending over 2,500 acres. These recreation areas will be within 40 miles of downtown Toronto. It is expected to take ten years to complete and will cost about $38.9 million. On this scheme the Ontario government will defray 37.5 per cent of $24 million of these costs and 50 per cent of $14.9 million.

The Thames river scheme will consist of eight sub-projects including the construction of six dams, one at Mitchell, two near St. Mary's, one near Woodstock, one near Thamesford and one at Stratford, and three major channel improvement projects. Work has been completed on the Mitchell projects and is well under way on the Wildwood Dam. It is expected that the general contract for the Woodstock Dam will be awarded and that work will start early this spring. The Wildwood Dam will be completed this year and the Woodstock Dam will require two or more years.

The Credit Authority has presented a flood control brief to the province and to Ottawa. This covers nine projects to be undertaken during the next ten years, estimated to cost $6.6 million. In addition, the Grand River Conservation Commission and the Grand Valley Conservation Authority are preparing briefs for presentation to the provincial and federal governments for flood control and water conservation works at an estimated cost of over $24 million.

During the past year, expenditures for major flood control and water conservation projects under agreements with the two governments amounted to $7 million. This included $3.5 million for property and $500,000 for engineering work. In all, about 3,000 acres were purchased and construction and engineering work has been started or completed.

In 1963, 12 partial or complete conservation reports were published, covering surveys on the Mattagami, Big Creek, Lower Thames, Crowe Valley, Sydenham, Whitson, Otonabee and Otter watersheds.

Twenty-one conservation authorities have also undertaken the establishment and management of authority forests. Under these agreements, which run usually for 50 years, the Ontario government refunds to the authority half of the cost of land, and for the period of the agreement the province assumes the entire cost of establishing and managing the forest. During this past year, 9,000 additional acres were acquired, bringing the total areas of authority forests to 69,000 acres. As part of their forestry programme these authorities assisted private landowners in planting 1,750,000 trees in 1961. In addition, authorities have continued to subsidize and provide technical assistance in the construction of community and farm ponds. Last year, 175 ponds were constructed, bringing the total to nearly 2,900.

Another aspect of the overall conservation programme is the acquisition of surplus land, not already devoted to authority forests, bordering a large reservoir, a community pond, or some other conservation project developed by an authority, and the conversion of some of the attractive and otherwise suitable sections into parks, thus providing recreational and other facilities. During 1963, 2,923 acres were added to these conservation areas, bringing the total coverage to 31,723 acres. Within the 110 conservation areas, 71 parks have been established covering 5,180 acres.

During the coming years, surveys will be carried out on six of the authorities at an estimated cost of $130,000.

During the coming fiscal year, the department will take steps to initiate an increased programme of development and protection for the province's water resources.

In addition to the normal, ordinary and capital programmes of the Conservation Authorities Branch, I am asking the approval of the Legislature for special and increased amounts in both ordinary and capital expenditures to commence a number of programmes and projects relating to water.

While discussions leading to new programmes are proceeding daily, it can now be determined that ordinary expenditures will be required for research leading to an understanding of our long-term water requirements in this province, and the most economical way to develop our water resources over a period of years to meet these needs.

On the other hand and on a short-term basis, it is felt that the government may be required to develop an emergency water supply programme which will provide general assistance in areas of this province where prolonged drought over reasonably large areas creates a hardship on our production and our people.

With regard to the increased capital works programme the government intends to review carefully the need for increased provincial financial participation in water development and management and to determine if the lack of finances at the local level is a limiting factor in an accelerated water management programme.

A review will be initiated of all of the hydraulic reports of each conservation authority and all the small reservoirs originally recommended in the conservation authority reports. These will be examined to ascertain their relative importance in a water management programme, cost estimates will be prepared and a list of priorities for construction developed in relationship to the needs of our economy.

I would ask all hon. members of this House for their support, so the department may carry out the programme.

On vote 601:

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I suppose the first thing that I should do on occasions such as this is to congratulate the hon. Minister on his taking over the portfolio of The Department of Energy and Resources Management.

Now, this is the first time, of course, that he has presented his estimates to this House and while I may not agree with everything that was said, I think it was a very interesting analysis of many facts and figures that can be digested, probably at a later time.

While I wish to congratulate him on going into the Cabinet and becoming the head of this particular portfolio, nevertheless I must say that I find it hard to believe that such a portfolio is necessary in a government of this province at all.

I have been very tempted to say this afternoon what was suggested to me a couple of years ago, I think it was, by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Letherby). One time when he was criticizing hon. members of the Opposition, he said, "I cannot understand why you do not stand up and say to the hon. Minister, 'Obviously you need this amount of money, it is going to be used for a good cause and we will be glad to give it to you,' and then sit down and it would save a great deal of time."

I am tempted somewhat to do that this afternoon, because, quite frankly, the amount of money that is going to be used in The Department of Energy and Resources Management for what could be called new projects in connection with this portfolio, is very minute indeed. We have involved in it, of course, the Ontario Energy Board, the Conservation Authority Branch, the Ontario Water Resources Commission and Water Management Programme, all of which in years gone by have been in other departments of this government of the province.

When one looks over the amount of money, the grand total of $33,732,000, which includes both the ordinary expenditure and capital disbursements of this portfolio, and then you realize that only $671,000 actually comes under the authority of the hon. Minister, one can very well ask why this portfolio in this government is necessary at all.

For example, this year, $20 million of this amount is going to be spent for the Ontario Water Resources Commission for capital disbursements, and $3.1 million is being spent for ordinary expenditures. In other years, this particular commission has been in other departments of government. I would suggest that it could very well be in The Department of Municipal Affairs or some other department, just as easily as in The Department of Energy and Resources Management.

This portfolio could very easily be compared with a holding company we read about on the Toronto or Montreal stock exchanges—a holding company which keeps together these other various commissions which, in other years, have been in other departments. And the speech, as far as I could follow, given by the hon. Minister this afternoon, was really a great number of statistics dealing with the oil and gas industries in the province of Ontario. It dealt with the sales and consumption of the same. And really, why we have to have a Minister to give these figures to us in this Legislature is beyond me.

At various times, hon. members of the government ask us in the Opposition, when we say that too much money is being spent and suggest that economy should be practised: "Where would you economize if you were running this government?" I am saying to you, Mr. Chairman, this afternoon, that one place where some economy could be practised in this government is by not having a Minister of Energy and Resources Management at all.

Now, I am not saying this personally about the hon. Minister. You could put him in some other department over there, because I am sure it would not be hard to find another department where he could be used; but the facts and figures are right in front of us, on page 49 of the estimates of this province for this year. Other than the boards and commissions I have mentioned, only $671,000 is being spent under the direct office of the hon. Minister.

Mr. Chairman, because he has so very little control over the expenditures of this department, it is very hard to be critical of that amount of money he is spending. One has to go into other areas, other commissions, in order to be the least bit constructively critical of this department at all. I propose to take one or two of these, which will be elaborated upon when they come forth. I understood the hon. Minister to say that Hydro would be discussed by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Boyer), and no doubt we will discuss that at the proper time. When the Ontario water resources are explained a little more fully, we will discuss them, too.

Take, as an example, the Ontario Water Resources Commission. I remember, some years ago, when it was started in this Legislature. At that time the then Prime Minister of this province, in telling us how many billions of dollars would be necessary for this commission in years to come, attempted, of course, to give credit to the government for the vast and huge sums of money which would be spent by the various municipalities of this province. Of course, at that time, we, in the Opposition, pointed out, and quite correctly so, that every dollar which was going to be spent had to be paid back by the municipalities, even though the water resources commission was putting up the money in the first place.

This, of course, has been borne out; and many of the municipalities which have taken advantage of the legislation are now paying this money back. I would say this: I think it has done an excellent job in the overall picture. On the other hand, I would say that in many of the smaller municipalities of Ontario there has been a decided lack of leadership by the water resources commission.

Generally speaking, it is the smaller municipalities in the province which take advantage of this legislation. Generally speaking, it is the smaller municipalities which do the borrowing of the money from this commission. Large municipalities, such as Metropolitan Toronto, can borrow the money they require for water works and sewer projects cheaper on the open market than they can from the Ontario Water Resources Commission. It is for this reason that I believe the commission should show leadership, not only in the planning of the sewage projects or water projects in the various municipalities in the province, but also they should attempt, through their engineering facilities, to make sure that once the capital money is spent these projects run properly.

As an example, I am going to read a paragraph or two from the paper of one of the municipalities in my own area, and I would say that this is common throughout the province of Ontario. This is from the Kincardine News of Wednesday, March 18, and it is headed: "Council Not Happy With Sewer Story."

The project is under the Ontario Water Resources Commission. I believe that the money was borrowed from this commission in order to initiate this project, but this is what the paper says about the council:

Council were generous at their Friday night meeting in their criticism of the contracting company installing the local sewer system, after most of the council had attended a meeting with the officials at the town hall the day previous. The attitude of council was summed up by a statement made by Councillor Gordon Campbell when he said: "I have never seen a man who knows so little about what he is doing. All he has got is excuses."

An hon. member: Was that the Minister?

Mr. Whicher: No, that was not the hon. Minister, but the Minister may be responsible. To continue:

Councillor Lantink put the blame on the engineering firm of Dillan and Company.

"Dillan has admitted that we have a poor contractor," he said. "Why did they not tell us before?"

Taking the blame from both, Councillor Gordon Campbell stated that the fault lies not with the contractor or the engineer but with the system which forced the town to accept the lowest tender submitted regardless of the contract. Mr. Campbell told council that even if the contractor has to be replaced and another brought in, the town would not be out any money. We may have the roads out for two or three years though.

I just read these few paragraphs to show you that in the town of Kincardine, which borrowed money from the water resources commission, which had accepted the engineering and technical advice of the water resources commission in putting these sewers into being in this town, are far from happy at what has taken place.

The town is in a mess, the contractor—according to what I have read in the paper—does not appear to know what he is doing. If this were just an obsolete case then I would hesitate to bring it to the attention of the Legislature, but in many municipalities throughout the province of Ontario, and in several in Bruce county, they have not been satisfied with what is happening.

May I point out to the hon. Minister, through you, Mr. Chairman, that in the smaller towns of the province we simply have not got the engineering facilities to know how to deal with the expenditures of such sums of money in dealing with water and sewer projects. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would urge the hon. Minister, if he is going to be in charge of the commission, to emphasize to them most emphatically that these towns do not just need the opportunity of borrowing the capital money to go ahead with these various projects; they need the engineering advice to be able to carry them through to the completion of the same, and advice to help run the project after the whole thing is completed.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Bruce; do you want to continue for a while?

Mr. Whicher: No; I am willing to continue but—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. chairman, if it is necessary I will move that the committee adjourn until eight o'clock.

Some hon. members: Oh, no, no!

An hon. member: We are not sitting to-night!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: No, no, my error. This is all my error. I was thinking in terms of a night session tonight. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report progress. I must admit that I was thinking in terms that we were coming back at eight o'clock.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, you only sit on hockey nights.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I will remember that and see that we maintain that record of only sitting on hockey nights.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that the committee of supply rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report progress and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, before moving the adjournment of the House, I would like to give the order of the remaining departments in the estimates, after these present estimates. The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner) will deal with the water resources commission section; this comes about because of the Easter break. Had these estimates been dealt with prior to Easter, of course the new department would not have been set up. The bill setting up that new department was given Royal assent prior to Easter, so in dealing with these estimates that portion concerning the conservation authorities, which, after this, will be administered by this department, will be dealt with in the estimates of The Department of Lands and Forests—in which department they are now. The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs will deal with water resources and with the water resources commission. When this is completed we will deal with the estimates of The Department of Economics and Development, following that, Education, following that, Attorney-General, following that, Lands and Forests.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 6.05 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

THURSDAY, APRIL 16, 1964

The House met at 2 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are always pleased to have visitors to the Legislature and today we welcome as guests, in the west gallery, students from Earl Haig Secondary School, Willowdale.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Mr. R. K. McNeil (Elgin) moves that the fees plus the cost of printing be remitted with respect to Bill No. Pr25, An Act respecting the Norfolk Hospital Association.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of bills.

HOMES FOR PERSONS REQUIRING SPECIAL RESIDENTIAL AND SHELTERED CARE

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to provide homes for persons requiring special residential and sheltered care.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to authorize the Lieutenant-Governor in Council to establish and operate residential facilities for persons requiring nursing, residential, specialized or sheltered care. By this, we hope to get out of our hospitals for the mentally disturbed those people who no longer need to be there by virtue of their psychiatric disability, and to establish them in properly controlled centres.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, and on a point of order, I would like to attempt to correct the record of something which happened in the House yesterday.

Yesterday, in the estimates of the hon. Minister of Tourism and Information (Mr. Auld), when he was asked how much Dalton Camp and Associates got from his department for advertising purposes, he told us that in his opinion this was the only government agency from which Mr. Camp received money. On looking over the public accounts for last year I find, in The Department of Economics and Development, that Dalton K. Camp and Associates Limited received $163,119.75.

I realize that this information was probably given incorrectly, inadvertently, by the hon. Minister of Tourism and Information, sir, but on the other hand he said that the net profit to Mr. Camp from his department would be approximately $14,000. Using this same percentage of profit on The Department of Economics and Development, we find that the net profit there would be approximately $30,000. So, Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of the House that Mr. Camp is indeed doing very well through the various agencies of this Legislature.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I beg leave to present to the House the following:

1. The Niagara Parks Commission financial statements for the year ended October 31, 1963.

2. Annual report of the Niagara Parks Commission for the year ending October 31, 1963.

3. 1963 annual report of the Workmen's Compensation Board of Ontario.

4. Forty-fourth annual report of The Department of Labour of the province of Ontario for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1963.

5. Ontario Northland Transportation Commission 63rd annual report for the year ended December 31, 1963.

Clerk of the House: The 4th order: Consideration of the report of the Ontario Police Commission on organized crime.

ONTARIO POLICE COMMISSION REPORT ON ORGANIZED CRIME

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in speaking in the debate on this report, I would like to point out that this report was tabled in the House by the then Attorney General (Mr. Cass) on March 19, 1964 and, in order that we may keep the record clear, although this report is dated January 31, 1964, it was received by the Attorney General on March 9, some ten days before it was tabled here.

In placing this report on the order paper for debate and discussion, I feel that it is necessary that this report be examined and debated in the Legislature in order that we may have, first of all, a full examination of the facts contained in it. We want also to examine its findings and perhaps relate them to the findings of other reports which have been made in this area of crime in Ontario. I am referring specifically to the Roach report and to various comments which have been made by individuals throughout the course of the last few years.

All of this goes to the end that we, here in this Legislature, and the people of the province of Ontario, may have some comprehension and understanding of the extent of the existence of crime here in the province under its various names and classifications; that we may understand the problems of law enforcement, the place of the police forces and the administrative forces, the justice forces of our province, and the problems which are created by the existence of crime.

We want also to see what has been done to meet the existence of crime in the province, what has been done to meet these many difficulties, what remains to be done, what lies ahead in what, I think we all realize, is an ever-present and ever-continuing battle against the forces of crime and evil which are always present in our society—indeed, which are always pressing hard against our society in their efforts to infiltrate, in their efforts to develop, in their efforts to worm their way, if I may put it that way, into the lives of our people, where they will prey on the helpless and where they may establish their empires.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, since taking office as Prime Minister of this province, that the whole question of crime and the enforcement of law in the province has been one which has concerned me very deeply. Through the years it has concerned the government, which I have headed.

Mr. Speaker, we have been concerned with the protection of our society against criminal elements, whether on an individual or on a syndicated basis, which exist and, indeed, which may exist in the future in the province.

If the hon. members go back to Hansard of December, 1961, and carry on from there, it will be found that a very substantial part of that record has been devoted to the consideration of crime and the steps which have been taken by this government to deal with this problem, to ensure that crime shall not flourish in this province and, above all, to ensure that crime shall not gain a foothold from other jurisdictions to infiltrate our province.

A bill to establish the Ontario Police Commission was introduced into this House on November 28, 1961, and the creation of the Ontario Police Commission was contained in The Police Amendment Act, 1961-62. This gave to the police commission the power, among other things, of investigating, inquiring into, and reporting to the Attorney General upon any matter relating to the maintenance of law and order in Ontario. It also gave to the commission, or the person holding an investigation under section 48, all the powers and authority which may be conferred upon a person appointed under The Public Inquiries Act.

The 1961-62 Act also defined the powers of the police commission relative to the commissioner of the Ontario Provincial Police, and it was phrased in these terms:

Subject to the direction of the Ontario Police Commission, the commissioner has the general control and administration of the Ontario Provincial Police Force and the employees connected therewith.

That Act, the 1961-1962 Act, also gave the police commission the power to inquire into and report to the Attorney General upon the conduct or the performance of duties by any chief constable or any other police officer, constable, special constable, or by-law enforcement officer; to comment, too, on the administration of any police force, the system of policing in any municipality, and the police needs of any municipality.

Thus we established the police commission in that year, with these powers, to deal in two areas: (1) with the administration of the police of the province, so that our law enforcement facilities would be adequate and would be improved; and (2) to carry out investigation in order that we might learn the extent of crime and the criminal elements in our province.

Now, sir, in the session of 1962-63, the function of the commission was more elaborately spelled out in The Police Amendment Act.

At that time we introduced section 39(B). In addition, in 1962-63, we made a change in section 40(2) of The Police Act, which now reads as follows:

Subject to direction of the Ontario Police Commission as approved by the Attorney General, the commissioner has the general control and administration of the Ontario Provincial Police Force and the employees connected therewith.

The section to which I was referring deals with the functions of the commission. In order that we may understand what the commission does, I am going to read this into the record:

It is the function of the commission:

(a) to maintain a system of statistical records and research studies of criminal appearances and matters related thereto for the purpose of aiding the police forces in Ontario.

(b) to consult with and advise boards of commissioners of police, police committees of municipal councils, and other police authorities and chief constables, on all matters relating to police and policing.

(c) to provide the boards and commissioners of police, police committees of municipal councils, and other police authorities and chief constables, information and advice respecting the management and operation of police forces, techniques in handling special problems, and other information calculated to assist.

(d) through its members and advisers to conduct a system of regular visits to municipal police forces throughout Ontario.

(e) to assist in co-ordinating the work and efforts of the police forces in Ontario.

(f) to operate the Ontario Police College, which had been just recently established:

(g) to conduct investigations in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

(h) to hear and dispose of appeals from members of police forces in accordance with this Act and the regulations.

(i) to exercise the powers and perform the duties conferred and imposed upon it by this Act.

All these functions—they are set out in this particular section—deal with the function of the police commission in relation to other police forces in the province.

With regard to the police commission and its creation and functions, I would just like to quote some remarks I made in 1961 when, in the debates on December 11th, page 284, in referring to the police commission, I said:

It is our intention that this commission will examine on a continuing basis, over a period of time, all matters having to do with crime in Ontario and all matters having to do with the administration of the various police forces. One can see the advantages in such a body. In the first place, it is completely free from all external influence and will operate on a continuing basis over a period of years and thus will develop a knowledge of the organization of our police and the enforcement of our laws over a long period of time.

In addition it will develop continuing knowledge of the broader trends of criminal activity, not only in this jurisdiction but in the jurisdictions that surround us.

And that, sir, I think pretty succinctly sums up what we were attempting to accomplish with the police commission.

When The Police Act was introduced the Attorney General of those days, who is now the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts), in that debate said as follows—and this is on page 344 of the same Hansard:

I would point out that under section 48 of The Police Act, as amended by section 6 of the bill before the House, this new commission is given the widest powers to make inquiry into law enforcement.

In order that matters between sessions may be attended to without delay, where requiring action, the commission would report on any such inquiries provided in the bill. It could, of course, report and comment on the same matter in its report to the Legislature. However, that report would come later when the Legislature is in session.

These provisions are all designed to give the board an independence of action and of reporting commensurate with the importance which is attached to the creation and functioning of such a commission.

I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that the personnel of this board will be of such strength and experience as to give to it a very extensive insight into the varied and complex problems with which it will be dealing. As I see the proposed commission, it will have vision, it will play an important part in improving public relations of our police, improving the education and training of our police and, as time goes on, it will grow in the public estimation and will have an ever-increasing good influence upon the police and their work and upon law enforcement in the province. It will also serve as an excellent body for co-operation and for confidential interchange of views and information with comparable, or other high-level, police and crime investigatory bodies in other jurisdictions.

Now, sir, it can be very clearly seen that the establishment of the police commission at the very outset of my term of office is an indication of the very great importance I have attached, and all persons on this side of the House at least have attached, to the fact that crime in our province shall be contained and that all steps shall be taken in order to contain crime. And in order to exclude that crime which would like to be here, we would have the necessary bodies and the necessary administrative bodies to meet the requirements of the day.

Further, Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my term of office here, as a result of some very serious allegations of wrongdoing which were levelled at certain senior civil servants in The Department of the Attorney General, and as a result of statements regarding the establishment and the extent of crime of all kinds in the province, it was decided by this government to conduct a complete investigation of all these matters by a Royal commission. Mr. Justice Roach was appointed a Royal commissioner in December, 1961, and I am just going to put into the record his terms of reference.

The terms of his commission are as follows:

To inquire into and report upon:

1. the administration of the laws and regulations regarding the incorporation and operations of social clubs having regard to allegations made by the leader of the Opposition in his speech of November 29, 1961;
2. any improper relationship as alleged by the leader of the Opposition in his speech on November 29, 1961, between senior officials of the legal staff of The Department of the Attorney General and any person or persons, and more particularly relating to: (a) the termination of investigations; (b) the suppression of evidence; (c) the payment of money;
3. the extent of crime in Ontario and the sufficiency of the law enforcement agencies to deal with it.

When I put this commission before the Legislature, I said the following:

I would like to repeat that I feel it is of the utmost importance that there be no doubt in anyone's mind in this province concerning the honesty and integrity of our officials, the sufficiency of our laws and the adequacy of our enforcement agencies to deal with the criminal elements that exist in every society. More particularly, we must have confidence that we can deal with any criminal element that may choose to attempt to cross our borders from another jurisdiction. We can all be certain that a most complete and impartial investigation will take place, that the necessary machinery will be established to deal with these matters in an efficient and complete way. I can assure the hon. members of this House and the people of the province that I and this administration will be satisfied with nothing but the best in the administration of justice and the maintenance of law and order. We will welcome the report of this Royal commission and if any action is necessary as a result of the report, we will be standing ready and able to take it.

Mr. Speaker, I submit to you the position of this government has not varied one iota from the position that we took back in those days of 1961. Indeed, the requirement today stands even higher than it did then, that the conduct and the investigation and the administration of justice in all its phases in whatever area it may be, must be at the highest possible level in our province. We are dedicated to this principle as the record clearly shows. We have clearly taken full and meaningful action, and I want to make it absolutely clear that we have never deviated from this position, and we never will.

I think this is indicated by the facts that are brought out in this report. The easiest way to keep criminals out of this jurisdiction is to make it a very unhealthy place for them to be.

Mr. Justice Roach subsequently made a very complete and I think a very meaningful report in accordance with those terms of reference. In the report were many recommendations. This government has seen to the carrying out of many of those recommendations. I will deal with this a little later.

In keeping with our continuing concern that the government must at all times be vigilant, particularly in dealing with these matters concerning the prevention of crime, the prosecution of criminals, and the prevention of the establishment here in Ontario of syndicated crime—and I will deal with the definition of these matters in a moment—but particularly in dealing with the establishment in Ontario of syndicated crime which appeared to flourish in some of the jurisdictions upon which we border, the government felt it was absolutely necessary to ensure that when Mr. Justice Roach completed his investigations under the terms of that commission, the Ontario Police Commission should be standing by to take on the obligation and duty of continuing where the Roach commission left off, if this should prove to be necessary.

This is one of the responsibilities and duties committed to the Ontario Police Commission, and this, I think, is made clear by section 48A of the Act, which provides that the Ontario Police Commission may investigate, inquire into and report to the Attorney General upon any matter relating to the maintenance of law and order in Ontario.

Here, Mr. Speaker, I think is one of the great factors in the development of crime which we must never forget, and that is that it is an ever-changing theme. What is true today may not necessarily be true two or three months from now. I think that this is self-evident. It is to me. Any investigation into crime can only see what the situation is at a fixed position in time. As we see, and as one sees as one follows one's newspapers, a constant battle is going on with crime pushing in and the forces of law and order pushing out. Thus the police commission, in its role of a body standing by continuously to do these things, serves a very important purpose in this whole problem.

From there we come down to last summer, when in August, Commissioner Harvison of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police spoke at the Canadian National Exhibition. He made some remarks that disturbed people greatly, remarks that would lead one to believe that syndicated crime, organized crime, international crime, was about to move into Ontario. The Attorney General, sir, on August 21, 1963, issued a press release in which he said that he had conferred with the commissioner of the Ontario Provincial Police and Chief Mackey of Metropolitan Toronto Police. After conferring with them he had asked His Honour, Judge Macdonald, the chairman of the Ontario Police Commission, to exercise the powers conferred upon the commission, which I have mentioned, in order to investigate matters relating to the maintenance of law and order in Ontario, to find out if there had in fact been any change since the findings of Commissioner Roach. The Roach report had been brought in in March. That is the basis of the report, sir, which we are discussing today.

Exhibit 2 of this report is a letter which

I will not read, of course, but to which the hon. members can refer. It is exhibit 2 in the report, a letter dated August 31, 1963, signed by Judge Macdonald, in which he points out certain facts arising from Harvison's speech and he says in the last paragraph:

To summarize, we are of the opinion not only by reason of Commissioner Harvison's speech, but because of other information received and allegations made as well, (a) that a further intensive inquiry is called for at this time by this commission to determine the extent, if any, of both foreign-controlled, syndicated crime, and organized crime of proportions capable of being converted into the former, there may be in this province; and that witnesses appearing to have knowledge be examined publicly or privately on oath to assist in determining the matter. And (b) that the inquiry be a continuous one and that our investigative staff be augmented further, as may be needed to maintain a constant oversight into crime conditions. (c) that the commission initiate discussions with police authorities concerned to endeavour to establish between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and provincial and municipal police a better co-ordination of law enforcement effort on a permanent basis as outlined above.

Mr. Speaker, this report resulted from the events I mentioned to you. I would point out to you that in the report itself it is described by the chairman of the commission and by the commissioners, as an interim, or a preliminary, report.

In that regard I refer to page 11 of the report, where the members say:

We consulted the deputy Attorney General as to our legal powers while conducting our inquiry in camera, and were advised that there was considerable doubt as to these, which should best be resolved by legislation to clarify. Accordingly, we decided to await a decision as to such legislation and its enactment, if favoured, before undertaking the private questioning of reluctant or hostile witnesses.

This would necessitate the making of a report, in the meantime, which could best be described as a first or preliminary report. We think, therefore, that it may be of value if we report conclusions which we have reached on the acceptable evidence and information heard so far.

I want to make it very clear to the House, to the hon. members here and to the people of the province, that the records I have touched upon here show that this government is very deeply concerned and ever-vigilant in the matter of the investigation of suppressive control over crime and, wherever possible, the complete elimination of crime in our province.

We see this as one of our prime responsibilities, as one of the prime responsibilities we have as a government to the people of the province. And under no circumstances, Mr. Speaker, will we shirk this responsibility.

The report which we are examining today, and debating this afternoon, was asked for by this government as part of a continuing process, which I have outlined to you, a continuing battle against the criminal elements in our society, as a continuation of those steps which we took back in 1961 and which, I might say, have had quite effective results, with which I shall deal later. Suffice it to say now, this report constitutes another move in what I think we must all realize is, and will continue to be, a constant and a ceaseless contest, really, between good and evil in our society.

In examining the report of the commission, I think it is essential, if we are to have a full understanding of what we are discussing, that we look to the definition of these terms—"organized crime" on the one hand, and "syndicated crime" on the other—in order that they may be fully understood.

This differentiation between organized and syndicated crime arose in the Roach report. Mr. Justice Roach tried to bring some order into this matter by defining organized crime and syndicated crime, and this report we are debating today has accepted his definitions. But I sometimes wonder whether these definitions are accepted by others outside the area of those who are familiar with these two reports and basically familiar with the differentiation which Mr. Justice Roach made. Because it is really only a definition of a term.

One can read in the paper, in another newspaper or a newspaper, perhaps, from another jurisdiction, a reference to organized crime which might not have the same meaning Mr. Justice Roach attaches to organized crime, as opposed to syndicated crime in his report—which definition has been accepted by the Ontario Police Commission.

There has been a good deal of confusion of the two terms, by everyone speaking generally about crime. I think there has been some confusion in the newspapers. I think, indeed, that it is difficult for the public to distinguish between these two. But, on the other hand, if we are to analyze these two reports, one of which follows the other, I think we must look at these definitions and see what they mean—what the words mean in the definitions which have been adopted.

In the foreword to this commission report on page 4, the commission adopts the definitions which were accepted and laid down originally by Mr. Justice Roach.

In his report—this is on page 5 of the Ontario Police Commission report, it says:

Mr. Justice Roach, for the purpose of his inquiry, formulated certain definitions for the terms used, and for the purpose of clarity in this report, we have adopted these definitions which are found at pages 351-354 of his report and these read as follows:

"The term 'organized crime' appears to have been coined in the present century. I am not aware of it having been used earlier.

"It relates to an association of persons whose business is crime, and to the criminal activities conducted by them as an organized group.

"The commission of any crime, except one committed in the heat of passion, involves some degree of organization. The lone robber plans the course of conduct that he will follow in committing a robbery and even if he commits a whole series of robberies his conduct does not come within the meaning of organized crime.

"Two or more persons may collaborate and formulate their joint plans for the commission of an isolated robbery but their commission of that offence does not bring it within the term organized crime.

"Together they might even commit several robberies at isolated times getting together and formulating their plans for each one separately, and in the intervals between them having no association or relationship with one another. One robbery having been completed each goes his separate way, with no plans between them to become associated one with the other in the future. Each of those robberies would be an isolated occurrence and would have no relation to the others notwithstanding that they were committed by the same persons and notwithstanding also that, if it so happened, the same procedure was followed in all of them."

"Organized crime" denotes a subsisting association as a social organism within the social body. Within that association are individuals or groups of individuals having a special function to perform and co-operating with one another as interdependent parts of the whole in such a way that together they operate a system and their purposes or objects are criminal. There is a continuing, subsisting conspiracy between them, evidenced in part by the substantive offences committed by them.

Organized crime does not have to be nation or state or province wide. Its existence is not determined by the area in which the conspirators operate, although it is not likely to be confined to a relatively small area.

Here is a reference:

Fagin and his band of pickpockets in London were engaged in organized crime but I am not aware that Charles Dickens described their activities as such.

Neither is it necessary that the association be organized with the precision of a well-run commercial organization. It may be relatively tenuous and loose-knit. The "fence" who operates a pawnshop in the city of Toronto and the housebreaker with whom he conspires to provide the outlet for the stolen loot, together are engaged in organized crime and this notwithstanding that the pawnbroker is also engaged in legitimate business and the housebreaker, perchance, works in a factory by day and carries on his housebreaking at night and at irregular intervals. What brings their activities within the term is this, namely, that there is a continuing, subsisting arrangement between them by which the stolen loot is disposed of and converted into cash.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): What page are you on?

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Six.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: This may be a little slow, but I want particularly some of the newer hon. members of the House who have not been through this before, to understand that there are some very specific differences. If we are to understand the extent of crime in our province, I think it is necessary that we understand what we are talking about.

There is a misconception, more widespread than I should have thought, that there cannot be organized crime unless there is a "Mr. Big" at the top and in control—an underworld tycoon such as Al Capone in Chicago, Louis Lepke and "Legs" Diamond in New York, and other gangland leaders who established criminal empires in the United States.

Now what he is saying is that some people think that to have organized crime you have to have a Mr. Big. In fact you do not.

Fortunately we have not had characters of that ilk in this province but we have had organized crime and specifically organized gambling.

That is the organized crime definition. Then Mr. Justice Roach turns to the second term, "syndicated crime", and he says:

This term, too, seems to have been coined in the present century. It denotes a subsisting association of criminals which is so highly organized that it has acquired exclusive control of crime over a given area—in other words, a monopoly.

The monopoly does not necessarily include all organized crime in the area. In a given area there may be one or more syndicates exercising exclusive control in different types of crime. One syndicate may have exclusive control of gambling, another of prostitution and another of narcotics. These syndicates are jealous of their respective monopolies and in their own way guard the areas over which they have control against the intrusion into their field of any opposition. Their common enemy are the honest police; their common confederates, the crooked police and crooked politicians. If they are to thrive they need the assistance of both. Their methods of crushing any opposition that threatens their monopoly are varied and usually subtle. They resort to violence only as a last resort. With the aid of crooked police it can be arranged that criminals who set up in opposition to the syndicate are caught. "Knocked off" is the term they use.

The terms "organized crime" and "syndicated crime" are frequently used as though they were interchangeable when in fact they are not. There can be the former without the latter but there cannot be the latter without the former.

In other words, a prerequisite for syndicated crime is organized crime.

On that same page 6, Mr. Justice Roach's finding in his report, dated March of last year reads:

As a result of my investigation—and it was as complete as I was able to make it—I now report to you that there has never been, as far as I was able to ascertain, any syndicated crime in this province but there has been organized crime.

I will refer later on to his conclusion and elucidate it a little further. I might just as well, to keep the record straight, read his finding in connection with syndicated crime.

He says:

My investigation did not disclose that there was organized crime in the province to any alarming extent except in the field of organized gambling, which, of course, included gaming and bookmaking.

Sir, I wanted to get these definitions clear, because this report today uses the same words that Mr. Justice Roach used in these definitions he established some time ago.

The next point I would like to deal with is, what does this report reveal in relation to the existence of crime in the province of Ontario, and what conclusions can we draw from the facts that are revealed in this report which we are speaking about today?

I am going to refer to Mr. Justice Roach's findings which I just mentioned, because he continues. I was reading from a quote from him in this report. In his own report, at page 357, as I have pointed out to you, he said that there was no evidence of syndicated crime in Ontario, but he said there had been and was indubitably organized crime. He adds:

... except in the field of organized gambling, which of course, included gaming and bookmaking.

Then he goes on to say:

In the field of organized illegal gaming, Feeley and McDermott were the leading figures, together with some lesser lights associated with them. Earlier in this report I reviewed the history of their operations and I need not repeat what I said there. Their activities ended when Wright was arrested on May 28, 1960.

I think it is interesting to note here, in view of his remarks, that since he made these, both Feeley and McDermott are languishing in jail.

Now, when we come to this report we will find that there is a comment to the effect that the gambling activity is less than it has been and I think that these two things are directly related. In other words, Mr. Justice Roach found these men were leading figures in illegal gaming and they have been removed from the scene.

Sir, in this report of the Ontario Police Commission, the position in relation to syndicated crime is confirmed. It is confirmed by Commissioner Harvison, whose comments, as I have pointed out, had much to do with the start of the investigation leading to this report. However, I would warn most strongly against permitting the conclusion which appears in this report, to develop in any one of us any sense of complacency or any sense of security, concerning the overall situation in Ontario crime and its development in the province.

I pointed out to you that this is an interim report. It has been in preparation since last August. I would say the fact that we do not have, and that this report finds that we do not have, syndicated crime in the province, following along after the same finding by Mr. Justice Roach, is a tribute to the law enforcement agencies of our province. I think that we should pay tribute in this respect where tribute is due.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: However, I would point out to you that the threat is always there. There was a threat in the remarks of Mr. Justice Roach in which he says in effect that organized crime is a prerequisite for syndicated crime. While he does not find syndicated crime, he certainly finds and makes a finding of organized crime. Commissioner Harvison of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, I think, sounds the same warning note. This report itself sounds, in my view in any event, the same warning note.

On page 20, to illustrate what I mean, perhaps I should go to the bottom of page 19 where this report comments upon Mr. Justice Roach's conclusions. This is the report of the Ontario Police Commission commenting upon the report of Mr. Justice Roach and making some comments which I think are relevant and important. This report says, referring to Mr. Justice Roach:

He believes, apparently, that there is organized crime in Ontario in the fields of narcotics, counterfeiting, fake stock rackets, theft and disposal of stolen bonds, as well as in gambling and other offences, which latter offences primarily concern provincial law enforcement bodies.

Mr. Justice Roach, in fact, said there was no organized crime to any alarming extent, except in the field of gambling.

What he meant is a matter of interpretation, but certainly it can never be interpreted in any event that he found there was no organized crime in any field other than gambling. I think we must read into it that he did find indications of organized crime, but only to an alarming extent, in the field of gambling.

This report goes on to say:

He apparently makes no positive finding regarding these other criminal activities, and if he is suggesting in a negative manner that it may or does exist he is obviously of the opinion that, if it does, it does not exist "to an alarming extent." With that, Commissioner Harvison might agree, because he says:

And he goes on to quote Commissioner Harvison.

"Our agencies are coping with the situation here, having in mind recent prosecutions and convictions."

What he sees, however—

And I will deal with Commissioner Harvison directly:

—are attempts by American syndicates to get into Canada, and that is what he fears and wishes to warn us about. At the same time he says that they have not, so far, succeeded in doing so.

So there is the situation as found in this report.

On pages 140 and 141 of this report, and this is in an appendix dealing with the comments made by Commissioner Harvison at the Canadian National Exhibition on Friday, August 16 last, there are some comments of his which, I think, should be considered when we are looking at the overall picture in the province.

Commissioner Harvison had a news conference at the Canadian National Exhibition and this was taped by radio station CKEY. He said:

I gave a talk to the Canadian Club in Toronto some 18 months ago at which time I said the U.S. crime syndicate was making incursions into Canada. I have not changed my opinion since that time. Any incursion by an American crime syndicate is serious and will become increasingly serious unless we do something to prevent them coming in.

You will note that he says into Canada; he does not say into Ontario.

He was asked:

How extensive are they, and what are they, and what are we doing?

His reply was:

They have increased somewhat during the past year; they go up and down. Police activity and legislation drives them out of the country but Canada is presenting an increasingly attractive target as we become wealthier, our cities become larger, and they are constantly trying to get back into the country. I think the threat is a serious one.

Commissioner Harvison was asked another question:

Would you say maybe we were ripe for a real invasion of organized crime from the States here, with our laws the way they are, or are we getting on top of the situation?

And he replied:

I certainly wouldn't say we are ripe for it. Your enforcement agencies, I think, the legislators, are aware of this danger of the American syndicates moving in. I think they are aware, too, of the tremendous power of the syndicate and the difficulty of keeping them out, so I wouldn't say we are ripe for an invasion. I wouldn't say there were any large loopholes in our laws, always provided the laws are strictly enforced and that heavy sentences are handed out.

Commissioner Harvison, at page 142, says:

I think an honest police force is completely necessary if we are to combat the syndicates or the Canadian home-grown organizations but an honest police force is only one of the requirements, one of the many requirements, of battling the criminal syndicates.

You must back up the honest police forces, you must have honest legislators, honest counsellors, honest courts, honest lawyers, and there must be honesty right down the line, because if there is dishonesty anywhere then the corruption creeps in there.

Another question asked the commissioner was:

Commissioner, what would you like to have in your power or at your fingertips right now, in the RCMP's fight against organized crime, that you don't have now?

And he replied:

I think we are reasonably well equipped now.

He was also asked:

You don't need any changes in legislation? You don't need any changes in legislation that would help?

Commissioner Harvison replied:

The matter of change in legislation is now under study by the Canadian Chief Constables Association and the recommendations that have been studied during the past year or two will be presented at the conference in Hamilton this coming September.

In answer to another question, he said:

We have had considerable success during the past year and I think the situation is probably better now than it has been in some years. Because several of the recent and extremely important cases are now before the court, I can't go into any more detail than that.

Those are the comments which were made by Commissioner Harvison in those days—as a matter of fact, last August.

Then he was asked:

Where would you say, what part of Canada would you say, organized crime has the tightest hold on right now?

He replied:

I wouldn't say.

Are you saying that you don't know or that you don't choose to say?

I am saying that I don't choose to say. I don't like evading questions but I just don't think it would be a wise thing for me to say at this time. I think that if we are really going to fight organized crime, if we are going to prevent the sort of sprawling crime they have in the United States, then we must avoid sensationalism and avoid pointing fingers anywhere and just get out doing the job. So I, for that reason, won't answer that question.

So, Mr. Speaker, those are the opinions Commissioner Harvison had, as reported in this report.

I think we have been aware of this situation for some considerable time and, if we go back to 1961, even in those days, Mr. Speaker, the Attorney General of that day, the present hon. Minister of Lands and Forests, on November 28, 1961, said in this House at that time:

There have been indications that organized crime may be infiltrating into some parts of Canada from the United States where they have been plagued with it for a long time. Every effort should be made to prevent any attempt to develop that sort of thing in this country and particularly in the fair province of Ontario. This bill should help substantially to meet any offensive of that nature.

So this, Mr. Speaker, is I think, the conclusion which must be drawn from this report, in its position as the sequel to the report of Mr. Justice Roach and this conclusion, I think, must be drawn from the remarks of Commissioner Harvison. We do not have syndicated crime in Ontario. Syndicated crime has been kept out of Ontario by efficient police work and by constant attention to the handling of crime as it exists on the local scene and on a local basis in various areas of the province.

But I think the conclusion is inescapable from the comments that I have read—I think we are all aware of this and I think this is what we find worrying—that there are criminal elements poised and waiting, if an opportunity offers, to make such inroads as they can. I think this is what Commissioner Harvison was referring to when he mentioned the increasing wealth of our country, the increasing growth of our cities. He is pointing out that the criminal elements are waiting and are ready to establish themselves if they find it possible.

To put it another way, they are standing ready to attack us and to move in if our guard goes down and if we, in the way we handle our affairs in the province, permit them the opportunity or provide an opportunity for them. I see this as being the concern expressed by this report. I see it as well in the conclusions drawn about the extent and ramifications of local crime which falls—certainly not all of it does, but it may fall—into the category of organized crime, both in this report and in the report of Mr. Justice Roach.

In the examination the commission has made—and I am not going to go into it in detail, but it is in this report—into law enforcement and of the situation across the province, I think there are some very heartening developments revealed there in the area of local enforcement. There has been the establishment of intelligence units, and there is a growing co-operation developing among the police forces of the larger centres. In reference to Metropolitan Toronto particularly, on page 73-D, the following conclusion appears, which I would like to refer to. There is, preceding this quotation, an analysis of various types of crime but this reference refers to organized crime and I would point out that this is in the Metropolitan Toronto area.

Organized crime is thought to have decreased greatly in the last three years and is described as 50 to 100 per cent better. The social clubs were responsible for much of this crime and their partial elimination has resulted in much better conditions. Large-scale bookies are, at least temporarily, not functioning, in the opinion of senior police officials.

That is the comment in this report dealing with gambling, which was the area of organized crime that Mr. Justice Roach was concerned about.

Sir, if you review the situation which this report reveals in dealing with crime locally across our province, I think we may draw the conclusion that we have alert police forces that are working constantly and achieving a large measure of success in handling the day-to-day problems of enforcement and discouragement of crime. This is done through constant action on their part, and as I say, the measure of success is dependent, of course, upon a constant alertness.

It might be interesting to look at some of the things that have happened across the province in the last few years. When we discuss crime in a general way, I think sometimes we do not really give credit to our police forces for some of the work they have accomplished. While these are being discussed in the abstract, at the same time we have some very loyal policemen and law enforcement officers who are doing a very fine job of ensuring that the criminal elements in our society go to jail and are punished rapidly. I have already mentioned the fact that Feeley and McDermott, who were referred to in Mr. Justice Roach's report of some 13 months ago, are in jail, and we notice as a result of that, some decrease in the gambling activity in the Metropolitan Toronto area.

Just as a matter of interest, I would refer you to what was really a very large criminal operation indeed. That was the robbery in Brockville some years ago, in 1958—the Brockville Trust Company bond theft, as it was called. We must not overlook the work that was done in the solution of that particular crime. It had international ramifications. The investigation into that robbery in the town of Brockville reached into South America and Switzerland, Chicago, New York, Montreal, and many other places, and all the police forces had to work together. They achieved a remarkable degree of success. Many of those involved were located and charged and convicted. In the process of that, several notorious criminals were picked up and jailed on other counts as well. Here was an example of a very large and a very complicated and certainly an organized crime, in the single element in any event. It was not part of an organized crime in the definition of organized crime, but as a unit of organization it was certainly a very complex one and it was solved.

In 1959, the following year, a large car ring operated in eastern Ontario. In this case cars were being stolen in one province, transferred to another province, relicensed and then resold. That ring was broken up. A similar ring was broken up in western Ontario within the last year or so. An Auto Theft Branch, for instance, has been established in the Ontario Provincial Police force to deal with this type of activity.

As the years went by there was a theft in St. Catharines, for instance, at the Premier Trust Company. It was a large, single, organized crime. Some of the culprits were picked up in the province of Quebec and convictions were obtained. This is the result we must continue to accomplish in our province if we are to keep crime out. If the criminals come here and are unsuccessful and go to jail, not only will they not bother us any more but it is a very great deterrent as far as others are concerned.

I could give you a good many other cases. There was a Hamilton resident who had the name of the Enforcer. He was prosecuted here in Ontario and went to jail here. Then he was taken, of course, to New York on many more serious charges.

You remember, of course, that gangland murder that took place here in Toronto, a double murder. In that case too there was a very quick arrest and a very quick trial and a very quick carrying out of sentence. And this too—

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Are you sure he was guilty?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Pardon?

Mr. Whicher: Are you sure he was guilty?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I do not question the rulings of the courts. Excuse me one moment, Mr. Speaker, I have been handed a note here.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): We are divided; I am sure he was guilty.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: But the point I make in mentioning these particular cases is that, when we are dealing with crime, I think we have to take into consideration what is done by our police forces, and the great effect there is in rapid investigation, rapid arrest, rapid trial and rapid punishment.

I feel that while we can be confident—and I think we have evidence that justifies confidence—in the efficiency and vigour of our police forces, I think that we must also recognize that in this field of activity any relaxation is the greatest threat there can be to the present situation because, as I have said before, it is a constantly proceeding battle. We must examine, very carefully, recommendations which are made to us in regard to strengthening our police forces and the means of enforcing our laws.

We must be always alive to the constant, continuous improvements which are necessary in methods of detection and methods of investigation. And I think one thing we must view with ever-increasing alarm, and this has been echoed by many people, is the increasing use by the criminal element in our society—not only here but all over the world—of the many and varied means of communication and the very rapid means of transportation which are available. We are all aware of how easy it is to move, not only about your own jurisdiction but about the world, today. It is nothing to speak to someone today who will say, in a very casual way, "When I had lunch in Rome yesterday," and this sort of thing.

Properly organized, these modern facilities are of great value and can be used by the criminal element in our society to very great effect. The use of electronic devices, all of these things, can be turned to anti-social and criminal use, as they are. They constantly increase the difficulties which face our law enforcement agencies in their battle against crime.

I would like to refer, Mr. Speaker, for a moment, to what has been done by the government since the Roach report was tabled in this House and brought in last year. There were recommendations scattered throughout the whole report, not gathered in any one place; many of them have been implemented by the government, and I would like to point out those which have.

May I say that Inspector Stringer has been discharged from the Ontario Police Force; Deputy Commissioner Bartlett has been discharged; there was one Sam Balsom, who was mentioned in that report, and he is presently being prosecuted. The Ontario Police Commission has been authorized to establish a central record bureau for intelligence operations, which would be available to all of the police forces in Ontario; this was recommended in the report.

There are studies presently going forward to provide for more efficient organization of the smaller police forces in the province. The recommendation, of course, was that some of these smaller police forces be eliminated. I can only say to the House that this is a very large task indeed. It can only be accomplished on a long-range basis and will take some time, but nonetheless a start has been made.

In regard to social clubs, of course the hon. members of the House are aware that legislation was introduced to give the Provincial Secretary authority to cancel the charters of social clubs which have not been used. The Provincial Secretary has also been given authority to require social clubs to appear before him for inquiry when their operations are in question. These provisions are of the utmost importance in dealing with the control of gambling in the province, and have gone a very long way indeed in helping us block gambling activity.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that we are taking all the necessary steps we can to provide the machinery to develop the organization to provide the means whereby we will be able to fight this continuing battle which has been going on as long as I have been here and, I am sure, will be going on long after I am gone. I think the steps we have taken have assisted a great deal in ensuring that syndicated crime has not been able to enter our province, has not got a toehold here; and, also, that local crime, organized or otherwise, is kept under close control.

I would say, if we have alert and well-informed police forces and if we add an equally alert and well-informed public, then these are the best weapons we can find in this constant struggle.

After analyzing the police commission report—without going into too much specific detail as to its findings because it has been circulated and, I assume, read by all the hon. members—but after analyzing it and examining the conclusions reached there, and after studying very carefully its list of recommendations, one is compelled to move to that final and most difficult area of determining what the government must do to meet the threat that is posed, and to what extent these recommendations contained in the report should be implemented.

The Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Robert Kennedy, who was here earlier this week, appeared before the United States Senate committee investigating syndicated and organized crime operations in that country. When he appeared before that committee he said, and I quote:

Organized crime not only becomes more refined in its activities but also takes advantage of modern developments in transportation and communication. As it does so, and as it grows richer and more powerful in the process, it can more easily elude enforcement efforts.

That is the end of his quote. The point here is, Mr. Speaker, as the elements of criminality and their methods become more sophisticated, and take further advantage of the marvels of modern science, so must our police forces and our methods of doing investigative work. And in the field of enforcement so must we develop likewise if we are to keep pace in what is really a continuous, never-ending contest.

The concern of this police commission, as contained in this report, as I read it, is that we must develop a modern, up-to-date means to conduct investigations which will reveal to us the extent and the existence of potential, syndicated, criminal elements in our society here—and in any moves which may be made to enter Ontario.

We are asked in this report to do certain things to meet the problem, to meet this threat to our society. I think it is a threat which we all recognize. Yet, Mr. Speaker, the great responsibility we bear is to ensure that, in our zeal to meet this enemy, we do not in any way damage the rights and privileges, the freedoms and liberties, in fact the inalienable rights which every man enjoys by the mere fact that he is in this province and is alive.

Mr. Speaker, certain legislation was presented to this Legislature by the former Attorney General which, while intended to meet some of the requirements of the Ontario Police Commission recommendations contained in this report, proved to be highly offensive to us all. I can only say that the legislation was brought forward in good faith, with no thought that it would have the effect ascribed to it. Never would I, Mr. Speaker, or any hon. member of this government, or any hon. member of this Legislature that supports this government, tolerate the passage of legislation which would strip an individual of his basic rights and privileges.

This legislation will be examined before a standing committee of this Legislature and no doubt much more will be said about it there. I am establishing here the principles I feel must guide us as we approach the problem of examining the conclusions and the recommendations of this report.

First, we must continue to accept the responsibility, as we have over these past years, and I think with some success, of developing ways and means of dealing in this day, with the threat that crime may pose to our society. Secondly, in doing so, we must be ever-vigilant that we preserve the rights and the position of any individual in our society. Sir, these are the two great principles involved, and in my view these are the two standards that any action we take must meet.

There are among the recommendations, some that are bound to be controversial, some that are bound to be interpreted as constituting some infringements on the rights of individuals. I refer, for instance, to the recommendation of the necessity for photographs on drivers' licences; the recommendation of licences for all types of firearms, and limiting of those to people 16 or over; the requirement of the production of means of identification by persons suspected of criminal or illegal activity; some alterations in bail requirements—it is recommended in the report; and the whole problem of wire tapping, which is recommended in a fashion. This is just to name a few of the recommendations that I think, if improperly handled, could be done in a way that could constitute, or could worry people about, an infringement of their rights.

Implementation of any of these recommendations will be done only after the closest and most exhaustive investigation and examination of the possible effects of any such implementation. We must subject any action that we take on these recommendations to these two principles I have set forth. This, Mr. Speaker, will take some time, and of course any such specific action will be brought back to this House.

As I pointed out in the beginning, sir, while this report is dated January 31, 1964, in actual fact it was received on March 9. I think we have all learned that matters as important as these cannot be done in a hurry, but I offer my assurance to the House and to the people of Ontario that we never will be party to the destruction of these basic rights that we all hold to be so very, very dear.

Mr. Speaker, this matter is of such great concern to the government, of such great concern to me personally, that I have already taken steps to devise the best means possible to ensure that these basic rights of our people are not in any way affected or disturbed, even though this could happen inadvertently. I have had conversations with Dean Leal of the Osgoode Hall Law School. I can assure you that I intend to continue the investigations that have been started, in order that we may devise a means of ensuring forever and under all circumstances that these very basic rights belonging to the people of our province will be protected, even though we cannot in any way escape the responsibility of having to devise means of meeting this other threat that appears to be menacing our society as a whole.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, in or about the year 1775, England found itself in substantial difficulty, which threatened the future of that country, because of the agitation that was taking place in the American colonies. The government of that day in England saw fit to introduce into the House of Commons a statute that prescribed that anyone landing from a foreign country in England could be carted off to jail immediately and kept there. The use of the prerogative writs such as Habeas Corpus and others would be denied to those people.

There was a gentleman who held a seat in the House of Commons for the electoral district of Bristol, whose writings and speeches and record as a member of Parliament are outstanding in our history of parliamentary government, in our history of the development of the democracy which we all believe in. His name was Edmund Burke. About that time, sir, he felt called upon to write a letter to two of his constituents who were sheriffs of the city of Bristol. Among other things in that letter, this is what he said:

I confess, gentlemen, that this appears to me as bad in principle and far worse in its consequence than a universal suspension of The Habeas Corpus Act. And the limiting qualification, instead of taking out the sting, does in my humble opinion, sharpen and envenom it to a greater degree.

Liberty, if I understand it at all, is a general principle, and the clear right of all subjects within the realm, or of none. Partial freedom seems to me the most invidious form of slavery, but unfortunately is the kind of slavery the most easily admitted in times of civil discord, for parties are too apt to forget their own future safety in their desire of sacrificing their enemies. People without much difficulty admit the entrance of that injustice of which they are not to be the immediate victims.

In times of high proceeding it is never the faction of the predominant power that is in danger, for no tyranny chastises its own instrument. It is the obnoxious and the suspected who want the protection of the law. And there is nothing to bridle the partial violence of state factions but this, that whenever an Act is made for cessation of law and justice, the whole people should be universally subjected to the same suspension of their franchise.

The alarm of such a proceeding would then be universal; it would operate as sort of a call of the nation. It will become every man's immediate and instant concern to be made very sensible of the absolute necessity of this total eclipse of liberty. They would more carefully advert to every renewal and more powerfully resist it.

These great determined measures are not commonly so dangerous to freedom. They are marked with too strong lines to slide into use. No plea, no pretence of inconvenience or evil example which must in their nature be daily and ordinary incidents, can be admitted as a reason for such mighty operations. But the true danger is when liberty is nibbled away for expedience and by parts.

The Habeas Corpus Act supposes, contrary to the genius of most other laws, that the lawful magistrate may see particular men with a malignant eye and it provides for that identical case. But when men in particular descriptions marked out by the magistrate himself are delivered over by Parliament to this possible malignancy, it is not the Habeas Corpus that is occasionally suspended, but its spirit that is mistaken and its principle that is subverted. Indeed nothing is security to any individual but the common interest of all.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that these sentiments should be our text for this debate this afternoon.

We are not called upon here this afternoon to hear particularly about the great efforts the government has taken to preserve law and order in the province of Ontario because, Mr. Speaker, our record in this regard leaves much to be desired. Mr. Speaker, many of us sat in the House in the year 1961 and knew that this government was dragged, kicking and screaming, into a problem which they said up to that point had not existed at all. Mr. Speaker, you will remember on November 29—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Sopha: The hon. Minister should be the last one to open his mouth.

Mr. Singer: The hon. Minister of Lands and Forests interjects, Mr. Speaker, and I am pleased that he interjected. I have not got all of the speeches he made here, but in my files, Mr. Speaker, I have clippings at least four inches thick from repeated speeches made by the present hon. Minister of Lands and Forests when he was the Attorney General, when he said: "There is no problem in Ontario. There is no organized crime. There is no necessity for investigation. There is nothing wrong that we can't control. Let me control it and everything will be fine".

Mr. Speaker, of all the people in this House who should say nothing on this point, the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests is the leading example.

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I would like to say that any such suggestions as the hon. member has just made, whether they were in the press or where they were, were taken out of context. On no occasion, throughout the whole time of my occupancy as Attorney General, did I do anything but try to get after the criminals in this province; and we had a pretty fair success at it.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose this afternoon to argue with the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests. The record speaks for itself. It is abundantly clear. Nothing I can say is going to change it. Nothing he can say has changed it yet.

Mr. Speaker: it was interesting to listen to the hon. Prime Minister's review of the various events which led up to these two investigations. As I mentioned, he left out some significant parts of the preamble. He left out the discussions which raged in the early months of 1961, all the way through until that eventful day on November 29, 1961, when my leader, John Wintermeyer, stood up in his seat and delivered the speech which brought on the Roach investigation.

That, sir, was an act of political courage, of integrity, of the acceptance of the duty of his role as leader of the Opposition, which will stand for many a year in the proud annals of the functions of this Legislature, and so it should. And even after that speech was made, the complaints, the niggling, the denials continued, until some eight days later the brash hon. member for London South (Mr. White) stood up in his seat and issued a very foolish challenge that the speech be read outside the Legislature.

That challenge, sir, you will remember, was accepted. The speech was read outside the House, and it was as a result of the public reaction, and as a result of the comments in the newspapers, that finally—notwithstanding the objections of the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests and those he was able to convince on that side of the House—the hon. Prime Minister did, two days or three days later, the following Monday, announce to this House that he had appointed the Honourable Mr. Justice Roach to investigate a situation which, up to that time, the Attorney General had said did not even exist.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): The hon. member, I do not think, has the record very straight.

Mr. Singer: Well, the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan)—was that the hon. Provincial Treasurer? No, I am sorry, the hon. Minister of Mines.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): A fatuous remark like that—the hon. member should know where it came from.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Singer: I was a little surprised because the hon. Provincial Treasurer made a remark earlier; but the hon. Minister of Mines I could expect that from. I am not even going to dignify it with a reply.

In any event, sir, that is the reason why; and there is no other reason. It was not the great zeal exhibited on the front benches of the government which brought about these inquiries. The reason these inquiries were brought about was because the Opposition, led by its leader, Mr. Wintermeyer, saw the problem and recognized the problem; and he took action as a responsible leader of an Opposition would do.

Well then, we had the Roach inquiry. That started early in 1962 and, finally, the report came in in 1963. In that report, as the hon. Prime Minister has pointed out, among many other things, Mr. Justice Roach said:

My investigation did not disclose that there was organized crime in the province to any alarming extent, except in the field of organized gambling which, of course, included gaming and bookmaking. It is impossible to say at any given time, with absolute assurance, that there are no organized criminals operating in our society. The best, at any given time, one can say is that there does not appear to be.

And, just about at that point, Mr. Justice Roach left that particular phase of it.

Another interesting part of the record—and we must go along by parallel steps when we examine the record—which goes along with this part of the record, is the appointment of the Ontario Police Commission, and the various discussions and disagreements which took place between the gentlemen on the police commission and the new Attorney General. Because the new Attorney General, Mr. Speaker, did not seem to have the same faith as the old Attorney General did in the role of the police commission.

When the hon. Prime Minister was reciting to us the various changes in the legislation concerning the police commission's duty, it was reasonably obvious that there was a real struggle going on as to what the Ontario

Police Commission was going to be allowed to do. Obviously the new Attorney General did not want them to have anything to do with the provincial police; so the legislation was changed and changed and changed, until the police commission was pretty well left out in the cold insofar as the Ontario Provincial Police was concerned.

Let anybody rush to the bulwarks to deny this, Mr. Speaker, I can refer only to the report of the Ontario Police Commission, and the remarks put in there by, apparently, the chairman, which were tabled in this House, just a few weeks ago.

You will recall, sir, on page 13, of that report, that the police commission said this:

The commission this year finds itself in a position where it is unable to make a very useful report on the operations of the Ontario Provincial Police force. Despite its statutory responsibilities under section 40 of The Police Act for giving direction to the commission of the force, considerable uncertainty has existed with regard to these responsibilities which we hope can be removed.

Well, Mr. Speaker, it does not require any great genius to discover that what they, in polite language, refer to as "considerable uncertainty" means, in plain English, that the Attorney General, their boss, and themselves were not able to agree. The Attorney General did not want them to have anything to do with the provincial police, and they wanted to have something to do with the provincial police.

Then they go on and quote the sections of The Police Act prior to 1962. The hon. Prime Minister has already read them; I am not going to repeat them. They talk about what happened in 1962, the changes which were promised, and the interchanging of a few words which, in effect, meant that the new Attorney General was saying to them, "Keep your hands off the provincial police. We will look after that. You just better go off and do something else because I did not think of appointing you in the first place."

However, the amendment, as interpreted and practised by the Attorney General—

they go on to say on page 14

—left us in a powerless consultant and discussion role with the commissioner reporting to the Attorney General and taking his instructions directly from him without information or reference to ourselves.

After two joint meetings, when efforts to develop some mutually satisfactory method of procedure proved abortive, the commission gave up any further attempt to influence OPP policy and the force, for the most part of 1963, and especially since August, has been operated by the commissioner as approved directly by the Minister.

We are prepared—

say the commission:

—to withdraw from the field if that is the wish of the government.

Well, the former Attorney General, I think, had made himself reasonably clear on that.

But we did ask, if so, all reference to our responsibility for the OPP be deleted from the Act.

They go on in this tone for another page and a half and they say how sorry they are that their role in having something to do with the OPP has been taken away from them. What happens next, Mr. Speaker?

We have a county court judge, and a general, and a former policeman, sitting around with titles—they are all members of the police commission but they really have nothing to do. Well, lo and behold, Commissioner Harvison made another speech and this gave them all a bright idea.

Commissioner Harvison said there was organized crime in Ontario, and they could not understand how there could possibly be organized crime in Ontario because Mr. Justice Roach had just said: "Well, if there was organized crime it was only alarming in gambling." Surely this did not tie in with what Commissioner Harvison had said, and certainly here was a field where at long last the judge, the general, and the former policeman could get to work. They were going to do something; they were going to fix things up.

So. Mr. Speaker, they wrote a letter—they wrote a letter, and I think the hon. Prime Minister had the facts just a bit twisted. The Attorney General did not suggest to them, they suggested to the Attorney General that they be allowed to embark on this new investigation. They set out in their letter the reasons why they should do it, and the hon. Prime Minister read parts of that letter. On August 31 that letter was written, and on page 8 there is a reference to it in this report.

They reported to the Attorney General on August 31 that, because of what Commissioner Harvison said, it was important that a further inquiry be made into organized crime, that the inquiry be a continuous one, and that the commission initiate discussions with police authorities to endeavour to establish between the RCMP and provincial and municipal police a better method of co-ordination.

I think it is rather important that the record be corrected in this aspect, Mr. Speaker, because it was not the Attorney General who showed his concern about this and asked the commission to do it; it was the commission, which was having a fight with the Attorney General and were looking for something to do, which came to the Attorney General and said: "Let's have another investigation. Let's investigate the report that Mr. Justice Roach just made, because maybe there is something wrong with it."

In case anyone thinks I am overstating the point, let me read from page 8 Mr. Harvison's remarks:

—implied (a) that the report of Mr. Justice Roach was incomplete or incorrect in its findings; and/or (b) that something had occurred in the succeeding five months to indicate that syndicates had made their appearance in Ontario during that time.

It is a rather fascinating thought, Mr. Chairman, that all of the forces of government which, as we heard at great length this afternoon, are ever alert, always on guard, did not realize in the five-month period that the situation had so deteriorated it was necessary to make another investigation!

In any event I would think that the new Attorney General was quite anxious at that point to get the police commission out of his hair. They were complaining about not being allowed to do anything with the OPP so he said, "By all means, go on out and have another investigation. Get out of my hair! Go away, do not bother me!"

Little did he know what that report was going to bring up. Little did he know what the recommendations were going to be. And little did he anticipate the storm that it was going to arouse.

In fact, when this report was tabled in the Legislature, you will remember, sir, that the Attorney General was shocked about the form in which it appeared and did not hesitate to tell the press that he was most shocked at the way in which it had appeared.

Insofar as the recommendations in the report are concerned, I am going to deal with them in due course. But, Mr. Speaker, I think it is most important that the record be set abundantly clear. This investigation—the second one—was needed for no other reason, in my mind, than to keep these three gentlemen busy—the county court judge, the general, and the former policeman—because they had nothing else to do. They had a job, and they had to keep themselves busy and "out of the Attorney General's hair".

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): He is now a magistrate.

Mr. Singer: Well, yes.

An hon. member: It's a new title, a new appointment.

Mr. Singer: So they go along and begin to conduct this investigation. Along the line, Mr. Speaker, they felt it was somewhat important to contact Commissioner Harvison. Commissioner Harvison was unavailable; he was in Europe. But, fortunately, and they say in their report:

Fortunately we had in our possession a transcript or a tape of that speech that he made.

And I think one of the radio stations, CKEY, took that tape and they gladly made it available to the commission for their help. They played the tape, and transcripts of it were taken, and there are substantial portions of it quoted in the report. Then they said: "Well, things are really serious; let us see what Commissioner Harvison has to say."

In November, 1963, Commissioner Harvison sent them a telegram and said:

There is really nothing new that I said in my speech at the exhibition. It is what I have said on many occasions before. It is what I said to Mr. Justice Roach. It is how the situation was then and it is how the situation is now. It really has not changed materially.

Well, Mr. Speaker, this did not perturb the fearless three—the judge, the general and the policeman. They had a job, sir, and they were going to go out and they were going to do it, come what may. So they did it, for some 280 pages. Then, Mr. Speaker, some of their ideas of their importance begin to emerge as you read through the sections of their report.

On page 12, for instance, they refer and compare themselves, without shame, without embarrassment, to the Denning commission in the United Kingdom. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Denning commission in the United Kingdom was concerning itself with whether or not matters which affected the security of the United Kingdom might have been revealed to potential enemies of that country. I would have thought that at least some mild modesty might have crept into the thinking of the judge, the general and the policeman, in comparing themselves to the Denning commission—which was charged with a far more serious and grave responsibility. But if that modesty did exist, Mr. Speaker, it failed to find its way into this report. And so they carried on.

Somewhere along the line, I would have thought that they might have been impressed with one of the remarks in the transcript of the address by Commissioner Harvison. That is his comment number five—where he says there are no large loopholes in our law, that all was provided, if the laws are strictly enforced, and that heavy sentences are handed out.

Let me pause at this point and elaborate on this. The hon. Prime Minister touched on this in his remarks.

He made other references to one of the appendices where Commissioner Harvison's remarks are quoted at greater length. I would have thought that this would have sounded a warning note to this police commission that at least there was one gentleman in this country, a gentleman who occupied probably the most senior police position and who was carrying out his job and carrying it out well, who felt he did not need the type of recommendations that the commission was later to bring in. What did Commissioner Harvison say? He said there are no large loopholes in our laws, all was provided, if our laws are strictly enforced, and that heavy sentences are handed out.

He was concerned, Mr. Speaker. He was concerned in 1961 and 1962 and 1963 and in the years previous to that, with the fact that our laws were not being strictly enforced, with the fact that our law enforcement agencies somehow seemed to be a little slack in carrying out their jobs.

He was concerned, sir, with the sort of thing that Mr. Justice Roach referred to when he was referring to charter clubs. He was referring to such things as the fact that gamblers were able to obtain through The Department of the Provincial Secretary, letters patent incorporating social clubs and/or get control of charters originally granted to others, and that this was an important contributing factor in enabling them to carry out their illegal operations.

This is a matter, Mr. Speaker, that we all know full well was under the control of this government and its Cabinet Ministers and its civil servants if they chose to enforce the law. But the government did not, until all this fuss blew up. It did not until all this discussion took place. It did not until the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests had to move from his previous portfolio into the one he now holds. They were not concerned with this at all, but they had the machinery available if they wanted to use it.

Again, quoting from Mr. Justice Roach's report, Mr. Speaker, as it is referred to in this report on page 74, he reports that the club X and the club Y were granted charters notwithstanding strong adverse police reports, and that the club Z and the club A and the club B were granted charters without referral to the police for a report. Mr. Speaker, what greater condemnation could there be of government procedures that were available to them than those remarks of Mr. Justice Roach?

These are the things that must have been implied in Commissioner Harvison's remarks and the tenor of those remarks did not change through the many years. These are the things that this government could have done. There are actions it could have taken. There are remedies it could have enacted. It could have done all these things without coming to this House and asking for these arbitrary powers that infringe on civil liberties.

I have been trying to understand why this police commission brings in a report that contains so many arbitrary suggestions. I just cannot find it in my mind to follow their thinking or their reasoning, unless, Mr. Speaker, it is the thinking and reasoning of those people, and there are many of them in our society, who believe that the politicians should not have the responsibility of running this country or this province, that such responsibility better devolves on nameless and faceless civil servants who run around giving orders and conducting investigations, or on the police who should not be under the control of the politician, or on the military.

If these three gentlemen belong to that group, then, Mr. Speaker, I say they have no place in our administration at all, any one of them. One has already gone, two of them have been reappointed. I say they have no place in our administration at all, because our administration, as imperfect as it is, our democracy as imperfect as it is, is the best system that the mind of man has been able to come up with in lo, these many hundreds of years that it has taken to develop it.

We must jealously guard the rights and privileges that have been fought for and established over these many hundreds of years. We must ever be on the alert not to allow the type of thinking that is expressed in this report to nibble away at these rights and privileges. As Edmund Burke said, while it is easy to point at the hideous person or the suspect person and say we are only going to take his rights away because it is a great time of emergency, once you take his rights away you have taken away the rights of all of the people and you have destroyed a little bit more of our democratic system.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the tenor of the debate that I thought should be well established early in the remarks of the hon. Prime Minister.

Unfortunately, as carefully as I listened, this did not seem to come through. To my mind, this report in its arbitrary approaches, is a document that should have no place in the public annals of this province. All of the focuses, all of the emphases, all of the onuses, they describe are put in the wrong way. They talk about accused people or suspected people as though they had already been found guilty. In one stage here they refer to some lawyers, whom they had cause to suspect. They bemoan the fact that they did not have really the power to cross-examine those lawyers and they hoped, if I remember the phraseology correctly, that the suspicions against them would be disproved when the Legislature saw fit to give them the power.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, in all the hundreds of years of tradition that we have had in building up our system of English law and justice, if we have established anything, we have established the presumption, in the eyes of anyone who has any understanding of our law, that people are presumed innocent until they are proved guilty. That is not good enough for these three gentlemen, for the judge and the general and the policeman. They are hoping that maybe when they get additional powers they will be able to allow these lawyers to prove that they were not guilty of some gossip that was heard about them. That is what they say. It is this sort of emphasis throughout this report, Mr. Speaker, that disturbs me so much.

I am pleased to hear the hon. Prime Minister say, and I am sure he says it sincerely, that he is not going to allow any infringement on civil rights. But the hon. Prime Minister cannot escape the responsibility for what has happened. He cannot escape responsibility for having allowed this police commission to get off on this investigation and bring in these arbitrary recommendations. He cannot escape the responsibility for having allowed his Attorney General to bring in Bill No. 99 and the other four bills that are equally obnoxious—the bills relating to credit unions, automobile salesmen, mortgage brokers and real estate brokers.

There is a disease that has begun to affect some of the thinking on the front benches of the government and in the civil service that advises them. This disease is: If the Opposition complains about something and if it complains loudly enough and long enough, and the newspapers join in and support it, then, "We are going to show them. We are going to show them that we are going to take action, and it does not really matter the form that action takes. We are going to answer that criticism and we are going to eliminate forever that cause of complaint. We will fix the Opposition."

The question is going to be asked before this debate is over, "What are we going to do about it, what do we suggest?" Well, let me answer the question now, and I will repeat the answer later on during my remarks.

What we would suggest is this, Mr. Speaker, that there is no excuse for the arbitrary encroachment on civil liberties as exhibited in the thinking of this commission, in the thinking of the government, in the introduction of these five bills to which I have referred.

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: How did this government vote?

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Singer: The hon. Minister of Mines—I would like to hear his opinion, does he like the five bills as they are presently written? Would he want to answer that?

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): He has never read them.

An hon. member: If he did, he would not understand them.

Mr. Sopha: Because he mutters.

An hon. member: I hate a mutterer.

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: Thanks! That is a great compliment coming from the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

May I inform the members that I am going to insist upon the proper order of debate. When a member is speaking I want the other members to listen unless he is out of order in some remarks that he has made pertaining to them, and if they are of that opinion they may rise on a point of order to the chair and state their point of order and correct whatever the member has said that is out of order. I am going to insist upon this and I want the debate to be carried out in an orderly fashion.

Mr. Singer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

I was suggesting that when the question is asked, and I expect it will come from the government benches during the course of this debate, "Since you brought the matter up, since Mr. Wintermeyer delivered this speech that focused attention on the system of organized crime that existed in this province, what are you going to do about it? Since your members have talked about the horrible actions of used-car dealers, mortgage brokers and what-have-you, and now we bring in bills that are going to allow us these fantastic powers and you are objecting to them, what do you suggest we do about it?"

Well I say, Mr. Speaker—and I think I am only paraphrasing some of the remarks the hon. Prime Minister made earlier this afternoon—I say that there is machinery available presently to govern, to allow for proper policing in this province; that there is the intelligence available in Ontario that can be put to the work of the government, that can advise Cabinet Ministers and civil servants as to what are infringements on civil liberties.

Commissioner Harvison said he does not need any more tools to get on with the job, he just needs proper use of the tools that are presently available. I would suggest, sir, that if the government is serious—and I hope they are and I would expect they are—if the government is serious about enforcing law and order and keeping control of crime in this province and making sure that the law enforcement authorities have the upper hand rather than the criminal element, that the government will constantly, 24 hours a day and 30 days a month and 365 days a year, make sure that every policeman in this province is working to the peak of his efficiency. Where small police forces—and this is one recommendation in this report that I agree with—where small police forces by reason of their lack of funds and inability to be properly trained exist, that these must go for the greater public good and we must produce larger units which can have more facilities and perhaps better pay. In all places in which we spend public money we cannot stint on paying our law enforcement officers, our policemen, sufficient money to get the best people available for those jobs. We must insist on high standards of education, high qualifications and impeccable character for those men whom we choose as policemen.

That is one phase. Where there are small forces they must give way to larger forces for more efficient operation and better operation.

I was interested to hear, or to read, the former Attorney General's remarks—not the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests—when he dealt with this recommendation from the police commission and he said: "This is a good idea but it is premature, it is going to cost thousands of policemen their jobs."

I could not quite follow his logic in that one at all. By and large, as I understand it, the police forces in this province are undermanned and there should not be any wholesale cut down of jobs if there is a better form of administration worked out. I would think it would lie within the intelligence of government to work this out; this is what they are here for, after all. They certainly are not going to work out a system that is going to throw thousands of men out of jobs. I would like some further clarification from the government on this.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, another thing that is needed and most thoroughly needed, is the employment by government as civil servants of the best qualified people that are available, as civil servants who will become legal advisors and the law officers of the Crown. The government should not be afraid to bring into its service, at high rates of pay, the best legal brains it can find in Ontario. I mean no disrespect to anyone who is working in The Attorney General's Department at all, but I say to you, sir, that at the present salary rates there is little encouragement at all for any young lawyer to go into that department and to make working in The Attorney General's Department his lifetime career.

I say, too, that the government should pay great attention to the selection of Crown Attorneys and assistant Crown Attorneys. We all know how the system works now: An assistant Crown Attorney is usually some bright young lawyer, fresh out of law school, who enjoys court work and who wants to spend a few years at government expense at a minimum salary learning to find his way around. He stays here two years or three years until he knows his way around, until he has established the beginning of his public reputation and then, because the salaries are so meagre and the desire of The Attorney General's Department to keep those people there is so lacking, he moves on and goes into practice for himself.

I say, sir, that until the government sets its house in order it cannot expect that we are going to have proper law enforcement in this province. It can do it in these ways.

When this government has done these things, then let it come back to the House and say: "We have done them and this is the record." Then let them say: "If that is not enough, we need arbitrary powers," and then let us have a look at them. But let us prove that need. We are not going to stand idly by, Mr. Speaker, and allow any infringement on civil rights unless a thoroughgoing case has been made for it.

I find it difficult to imagine what that case could be. It is conceivable that possibly some extraordinary measures might be needed on a single occasion, directed to a single situation. But to enshrine these arbitrary ideas in statutes, as this commission suggests, and tuck them away so that you have an army of faceless civil servants coming around investigating, seizing documents, forcing people to answer questions, allowing them to ask a lawyer the secrets of his client, or a priest the confidences of his parishioner, or a doctor the knowledge that he has attained from his patients!

None of these things seems to disturb the government, and they bring in these statutes without even a word of apology. Mr. Speaker, we are as anxious as anyone, probably more anxious, to see that any abuses against the laws of the province of Ontario be stopped. But we say, and we say as emphatically as we can, that there are methods presently within the law to allow these things to be done.

The government has no cause to pat itself on the back and say, "Oh, what good boys are we. We solved the Brockville bank robbery. We solved the St. Catharines Trust robbery." These are things we expect of government. This is why we have Attorneys General, why we have policemen, why we have courts. These are the things we have, and there are reasons why we have them.

The government should be able to tell us, and we have not heard it this afternoon, why matters had got to such a horrible state in 1961, why matters had got to the deplorable condition that it was necessary for the leader of the Opposition at that time to make his speech, and to suffer all of the abuse he did because of it. That is what the government should be telling us.

The government should be telling us why Mr. Justice Roach had to disclose the record which he sets out in his report. Reference has been made to that and I am not going to elaborate on that at any length.

The government should be telling us why, when its police commission got into these matters, it elaborated and went much further than Mr. Justice Roach. The government should tell us why its errors of omission and commission allowed these things to happen. It should not be telling us "what good boys are we."

They are ever-vigilant. I was making some notes as the hon. Prime Minister was speaking. He said he is deeply concerned; he is ever-vigilant; he will not shirk. "We are reasonably well equipped now," was the reference that Commissioner Harvison made. "An alert police force is important."

The hon. Prime Minister quoted from Mr. Robert Kennedy, but I wonder if the hon. Prime Minister noticed one of the quotes attributed to Mr. Kennedy on the day he was in Toronto. This is to be found on page one of the Globe and Mail of Wednesday, April 15:

He told the 30 reporters that Canadians should not be lulled into thinking crime does not exist in Canada because there is more of it in the United States.

"Your officials know organized crime exists and so do you newspapermen," he said.

Asked whether he felt existing laws were adequate to handle organized crime, Mr. Kennedy replied that anti-crime legislation must never be allowed to interfere with fundamental individual liberties. "Too much power should not be granted to a government," he said.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): What powers is he asking for?

Mr. Singer: I was interested in that aside from the hon. Provincial Secretary about New York State or what powers he is asking for. It was rather interesting to note these references made by the police commission to what is going on in New York State. On page 116 they point out under the heading:

CIVIL RIGHTS LAW

A code of fair procedure for investigating agencies is set forth in the civil rights law of the state of New York. It provides for fundamental rights of persons attending and testifying before the commission and should be of value in the formulation of similar rules for the proceedings of the Ontario Police Commission.

I would have thought, Mr. Speaker, that such an eminent lawyer and someone so concerned with civil rights as the hon. Provincial Secretary, would have spotted this recommendation and would have been among the first to have stood up in his place in this House and said, "We must have a code of civil rights' protection for people who are summoned before such agencies." We have not had that from him. We have just had his interesting remark this afternoon. I would hope that he thinks this is a good idea.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. It is unfortunate that the hon. member for Downsview is never in the House at the times when he should be. If he will refer to my remarks in this House on a previous occasion, I did make specific reference to that.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, I—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The hon. member usually makes a speech and then he leaves.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Singer: I am sorry that I have piqued the hon. Provincial Secretary, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. member: We all are. We have to listen to him.

Mr. Singer: I would have hoped that rather than make reference to it, the hon. Provincial Secretary would have been able as a Cabinet Minister to have had something done about bringing in this sort of code, to protect people who are summoned to appear before various administrative bodies. After all, the hon. Provincial Secretary, able man that he is, is not just an ordinary person. He is a man of substantial ability. He is a member of the Cabinet as well, and he really should not speak of his personal opinions when he speaks of matters of this great importance in this House. He speaks as a member of the Cabinet.

Is he prepared to say now, or is his hon. leader prepared to say now, this is what the provincial government stands for: that it will bring in a code to protect people who have to appear before administrative bodies? I would hope we would hear that and I would commend the hon. Provincial Secretary if he was able to say this with the authority of the government behind him. But we have not heard it, Mr. Speaker, and we are not going to hear it, I suspect, until a lot more water goes over the dam.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: What powers does Robert Kennedy want?

Mr. Whicher: What powers do you want?

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, indicative of the rather interesting attitude that the commission takes to various matters, is page 89. To be quite fair to the commission, I am not sure whether these are the views of the commission, or these are the views of a group of Crown Attorneys, from whom it received ideas—it is very hard to tell from the way this is set up—but this is a paragraph that is included, in any event, at the bottom of page 89 of the report which, at least, if the commission is shocked about it, it does not say so. It says this:

It is suggested that fingerprints be taken on application to license a motor vehicle; that tapping telephones be permitted by police for purposes of investigation and also as evidence; that license be required to install more than one telephone; that the Criminal Code be amended to set out grounds where bail may be granted; that there be appeals on facts as well as law; that injunction and padlock proceedings be authorized as aid to law enforcement.

I do not know, as I say, to be entirely fair to the commission, whether it endorsed all of these ideas but at least it saw fit to repeat them and it repeated them without any comment, without any indication of shock or horror or anything else. If nothing else, it has given these ideas notice and probably much more than passing approval.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, if this is the sort of thinking that we have represented on that police commission, its members have no business to be in the positions which they hold in the province of Ontario today.

Mr. Speaker, I want to deal at a little greater length with some of the recommendations here. Before I get to the recommendations section I thought the paragraph at the bottom of page 100 of the report was worthy of comment. This is what the commission says and there is no doubt that this is its opinion:

We recognize that the proposals here made may arouse the opposition not only of interested persons, but it will also give concern to others who may fear the loss of a traditional if not legally guaranteed freedom of private communication. What is called for is a weighing of social values, to determine if what is here seriously advocated really involves any substantial loss of present rights as opposed to very worthwhile social advantages, which will serve to ensure the continued freedom of the individual from the physical and mental duress and tyranny which might result from the successful inroads of syndicated crime. Of what value, then, would any of our freedoms, legally guaranteed or otherwise, be to us?

I say, Mr. Speaker, that paragraph perhaps as well as anything that is in this report indicates the thinking of the police commission. This sort of thinking and this sort of phrase have been the cry of tyrants down through history. If these cries are allowed to take hold, if these ideas are allowed to become part of our government thinking, then democracy is gone. These are the matters that must concern us.

Mr. Speaker, insofar as the role of government is concerned, I think a paragraph from the remarks made by the hon. Prime Minister on the fateful Monday when Bill No. 99 was discussed is most pertinent and should form a part of the record at this time. If the government says it can escape responsibility for this, the hon. Prime Minister squarely put it on the spot. This is what he said:

It is thus possible for hon. members to see that the report itself, with its exhaustive investigation into the existence and possible future development of crime in the province, together with this bill form a unit in which is contained the problem which must be met and a possible means of meeting that problem. In other words, the report and the bill must be considered together, and in themselves they form a unit.

The hon. Prime Minister has accepted the responsibility, as well he should, and now he must accept the criticism that goes along with it. Fortunately, those suggestions have not been enacted in law, but I hope this government has learned a lesson and will learn a lesson when it reads reports like this about suggestions of what should become a part of our law.

The commission on page 111 says that it is not satisfied with the investigatory procedures allowed under section 48 of The Police Act. It is not satisfied to have the powers that Mr. Justice Roach had, which were subject to review by the Court of Appeal, and which on at least one occasion saw fit to reverse his ruling. The commission is better. It knows more than Mr. Justice Roach. It should be allowed to be a law unto itself. It should be allowed to make its own decisions, to seize its own papers and on and on, to imprison people for contempt, to deny people the traditional privileges that have been built up in our history of law.

In case there is any doubt about what it was thinking—and there has been discussion about what the law officers really meant; there have been questions about which set of law officers we really believe—at the bottom of page 112 the commission is worried about the contempt feature of these matters.

While under The Public Inquiries Act, which is made applicable to inquiries under section 48 of The Police Act, witnesses who fail to attend when duly subpoenaed or who refuse to answer questions asked of them, may be summarily punished by the commission for contempt, the New York commission must make application to the courts for such punishment, which is an unsatisfactory way of obtaining information and leads to delays—

Courts delay things! It is terrible. Courts in protecting civil rights often cause delay, and this commission says:

While our procedure is, therefore, better, it is not, in the opinion of the commission, clear that it may exercise the same legal powers in a private as in a public hearing and this should be clarified. Consideration should also be given to extending to the commission the powers given to courts at common law to punish for contempts committed in the face of the tribunal.

So the county court judge and the general and the policeman want to set themselves up as the be-all and the end-all; and the statute you remember, Mr. Speaker, allowed one or any of them, to determine these matters and to send people to jail. These are powers that we should never contemplate giving to a body of this sort.

Mr. Speaker, running through these recommendations that start at page 119, and the hon. Prime Minister has already listed some and he has indicated, as I understood him in any event, he has some grave reservations. There are many that give us real cause to wonder about the sort of thinking that is being asked to be reflected in the legislation e.g.: that in the interests of public security police be permitted to require the production of means of identification by persons suspected of criminal or illegal activity. I would like to know how that one would work. The policeman suddenly decides, Mr. Speaker, that you, sir, are a person suspected of criminal or illegal activity. I am only suggesting this as a hypothetical case. No policeman would ever put himself in that position with you, sir. But, the policeman if the commission is given its way, is entitled to force you, because you are a suspicious person, to produce some sort of identification.

Mr. Speaker, surely it must shock every hon. member of this House that the commission did not have sufficient respect for the liberties of the citizens of this province which would instruct them to think out these suggestions before they committed them to paper.

Then there are the recommendations contained in item 11 of the report. The hon. Prime Minister said that it was as a result of these recommendations that the infamous section 14 of The Police Act was brought before this House. It is rather interesting to note, Mr. Speaker, that in the explanatory note attached to The Police Act, one of the excuses for section 14 was that The Securities Act has the same sort of provisions.

Now I did a little research last night on how long those sections have been in The Securities Act. I know they have been in as far back as 1950. I would suggest they have been there for a much longer time. They are arbitrary too and they should not be there and I would have thought that the law officers of the Crown, having discovered they are there, should have recognized their arbitrary nature.

But even The Securities Act—as arbitrary as it is—recognizes that there are certain privileges to be respected and it sets those out, at least the one referring to the privilege of a lawyer not to be forced to discuss information that he may have received from a client.

The draftsman of this Act, and the people who introduced it, did not even think that precaution was worthy of inclusion in Bill 99 or these other four bills I talked about earlier.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, let me reiterate what I have said earlier this afternoon. We are proud of the role we have played in bringing to the attention of the people of Ontario, the tragic situation that existed insofar as the enforcement of our laws was concerned. We believe that our leader in 1961, Mr. Wintermeyer, did outstanding service for all of the people of Ontario in forcefully and dramatically bringing these matters to public attention and as a result forcing the inquiries that have taken place.

We have at no time advocated, nor do we advocate now and we suggest that no case has been made whatsoever for remedies of the type suggested by this commission or enunciated in Bill 99 and these other bills.

We abhor this type of arbitrary action, this sort of power that it is suggested be given to policemen, to the military or to nameless and faceless civil servants, and the abandonment of civil rights in line with British traditions of justice that have been built up over these hundreds of years. We believe that the government presently, in the words of Commissioner Harvison, "has the tools available to do the job and the job can be done without asking for any arbitrary powers."

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Is that the policeman the hon. member is talking about?

Mr. Singer: Yes, but I would suggest that he is being reasonably sensible, because in his years of office as a policeman, and in his years of office as probably the most senior policeman in Canada and one of the most highly respected, he has never seen fit to go to his superiors and ask for these arbitrary powers. He has some respect for the civil rights.

We say that if the government is doing its job and if these law enforcement agencies are operating to the peak of their efficiency—and they can if there are proper advisors, well paid, within government and within the courts—that these matters will be controlled and they will be controlled in a manner that will protect all of these important legal traditions.

Statements like the one "It is better a thousand guilty men go free than one innocent man be convicted" have not become a part of our thinking as a result of our taking these matters lightly. The principle that a man is innocent until he is proven guilty has been a hard thought out principle that is an integral part of our system of law enforcement. The idea is that a person be not forced to incriminate himself, but if he has committed some wrong or some crime against the state it is the duty of those persons charged with the authority of law enforcement to go out and get the evidence to convict him. These are ideas which are important to preserve and they cannot be lightly cast aside.

Well, Mr. Speaker, as I began with a quote from Edmund Burke, let me end with a quote from Edmund Burke. And in the same letters he wrote to the sheriffs of Bristol, he said this:

I therefore could never reconcile myself to the bill I send you, which is expressly provided to remove all inconveniences from establishment of a mode of trial which has ever appeared to me most unjust and most unconstitutional. Far from removing the difficulties which impede the execution of so mischievous a project, I would heap new difficulties upon it if it were in my power.

All the ancient, honest, juridical principles and institutions of England are so many clogs to check and retard the headlong course of violence and oppression.

They were invented for this one good purpose, that what was not just should not be convenient. Convinced of this, I would leave things as I found them. The old cool-headed general law is as good as any deviation dictated by the present heat.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate somewhat inhibited, because I must say that the hon. gentleman to my right has all the appearances of a wanted member of the Mafia, whose picture I saw in the paper about two weeks ago.

However, if I can recover my composure I will proceed to deal with the issues before us.

Mr. Speaker, I think that in any debate of this nature the question of the traditional rights of the individual should be given pre-eminent consideration—not only in any debate of this nature, but also in any of the activities, any of the legislation of this House, they should be given pre-eminent consideration. I am not going to take a great deal of time this afternoon in dwelling on them, as far as this Legislature is concerned; because quite frankly, insofar as enunciating these principles is concerned, insofar as abhorring any breach of them is concerned, I think that task has been done in about as dramatic a way within the past month, in the province of Ontario, as ever took place in our history.

The response of the people of this province to the implications contained in the so-called police state legislation was, to put it mildly, resounding. Indeed, it was so resounding that this government, which enjoys a majority and a power as a result of that majority from an election no more than six or eight months ago, for a period normally for the next four years, was virtually brought to the brink of defeat.

It was humbled in a fashion in which few governments, for quite some time, have been in the province of Ontario. And it was, Mr. Speaker, if my friends to the left at the moment—who really stand to the right—will not interject, because they at least, for a fleeting moment, recognized the importance of some of these principles. To their credit these principles were given prior consideration over party considerations. The result is that the government had to beat something of a disorderly retreat and we saw at least the end of that offensive section of Bill 99.

I do not think there is any necessity for prolonged discussion of this aspect of the question in the Legislature, even though it is important. There is only one aspect of it, Mr. Speaker, that I think is rather interesting and rather important, and that is that we normally, in Canada, particularly those of us who are active in public life, deplore the lethargy of the electorate on many issues. That being the case, it is rather interesting to ponder why, on this particular issue, the people of Ontario, I think it could be said that spontaneously, six million or more of them, expressed their view in such a fashion that the government had to withdraw at least the offensive section of Bill 99.

Why do you have that contrast between what is usually deplored as a lethargy of the electorate and their almost spontaneous reaction in this instance? This is the point I want to dwell on for a moment, Mr. Speaker, because I think it is important, as we consider these basic and traditional rights of the individual.

I want to suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the reason why the people of the province of Ontario, and indeed the people of Canada, respond almost uncharacteristically on an issue, when it is this kind of an issue, is because governments in Canada in the 20th century have a very sorry record in this connection. To say that it is spotty is to put it mildly.

We have had repeated instances of governments in this country who have seized upon the threats — often an exaggerated threat which happened to suit their political purposes—and with the pretence of coping with this threat they have destroyed the basic rights of individuals.

Perhaps the most startling and far-reaching of those was after the first world war in 1919, when the workers in the city of Winnipeg engaged in a general strike and the Conservative-dominated coalition government at Ottawa, almost within a matter of hours, under the leadership of Arthur Meighen, rushed two amendments through the House of Commons. One was an amendment to The Immigration Act. But, Mr. Speaker, just stop and consider this: it meant that if a person was picked up because of the fact that, presumably, he was one of these subversive elements, there were people in Canada, Mr. Speaker, believe it or not, who thought that what happened in the Winnipeg general strike was the Canadian equivalent to the Russian revolution.

This was Canadian Bolshevism! And anybody who might be accused or might be suspected of fomenting these ideas could be picked up without being charged, without being taken to the courts. There could be an arbitrary exercise of power and he could be deported from the country even, Mr. Speaker, if he were a British subject. That happened in Canada.

You had, along with it, the infamous section 98 of The Criminal Code, which also permitted the arbitrary exercise of power against a person who was considered to be—and I will use the general term—a Bolshevik. And this in the fashion we have seen in more recent years in the McCarthy era in the United States, against anybody who was left of centre. And, Mr. Speaker, it took us one generation under the dogged battling of J. S. Woodsworth ultimately, with the co-operation of Lapointe, to get that legislation off the books.

In 1935—I have referred to this in the past but I did not happen to have a copy of it in the House—so I am going to refer to it now.

In 1935, when we fought an election in this country, out in British Columbia the six Liberal candidates running in the Vancouver constituency ran full-page ads in the papers entitled, “CCF and the Oriental Vote,” in which they quoted, in the centre part of the ad, from the federal Hansard in which J. S. Woodsworth said, “Sure, I am in favour of the vote for people who happen to be of Japanese descent. And I will come into any hon. member’s constituency and say so.”

These men, one of whom became a Cabinet Minister in the government which was elected, sponsored an ad which said: “You will decide on election day. A vote for any CCF candidate is a vote to give the Chinaman and the Japanese the same voting rights which you have!”

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacDonald: “A vote for the Liberal candidate in your riding is a vote against the Oriental enfranchisement.”

An hon. member: What about the Irish and English—

Mr. MacDonald: This is not the Irish and English years ago, Mr. Speaker. This is something of the spotty record in this country within the last generation, and it was not surprising therefore, Mr. Speaker, that a government which had Cabinet Ministers elected on that kind of an appeal seven years later trampled the rights of Canadian-born Japanese into the ground, uprooted them from their homes, looted their property and scattered them east of the Rockies.

An hon. member: It was John Diefenbaker who fought for them, not J. S. Woodsworth.

Mr. MacDonald: Just let me remind hon. members of a final episode that has created in the minds of the Canadian people and in the minds of the people of Ontario a sensitivity so that they spontaneously react to a threat of the nature that was contained in Bill No. 99.

When I came out of the Navy in 1946 one of the first community activities in which I became involved in the city of Ottawa was in the Civil Liberties Association. The main concern of the Civil Liberties Association in 1946 was the acts of the government of the day in coping with the threat that was revealed by Gouzenko when he defected from the Russian embassy and provided some details as to the existence of spy rings in Canada. I knew people in Ottawa—some of them I knew personally and some I knew about—women whose husbands just disappeared. Nobody knew where they were; they were held incommunicado for weeks. They were not charged; they had no right to counsel but they were being grilled behind the scenes by the police because of the threat, a sort of a post-Second World War manifestation of Bolshevism in Canada. And this time the Liberal government took this kind of action.

You know, Mr. Speaker, it is very interesting because there is a remarkable parallel with some of the talk we have heard in this House in the last while. During the course of the debate that took place in the House of Commons over the breaches of individual rights, you had this kind of a quote:

We are all attached to the proper administration of justice whether it be criminal or civil, as it is being practised under the British system which has become our own, but there has been nothing shown anywhere which constitutes any violation of any rights which any individual may have when he comes to answer for any charge brought against him.

This was with reference to these people who were being held incommunicado for a month without right to counsel. Their wives did not know where they were. Do you know who made that statement? St. Laurent, the Minister of Justice in the government of the day, who subsequently became Prime Minister.

Mr. Sopha: Is the security of the state a different proposition?

Mr. MacDonald: We will get around to whether the security of the state is a different proposition or not, because that is a very pertinent point that I want to dwell on later.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the same Mr. St. Laurent, on May 8, 1946, in the debates of the House of Commons had this to say:

Those principles resulting from Magna Carta, from the Petition of Rights, the Bill of Rights, from The Habeas Corpus Act are great and glorious privileges, but they are privileges which can be and unfortunately which have sometimes to be interfered with by action of Parliament, or action under the authority of Parliament.

In peacetime? This was not wartime.

Mr. Whicher: The security of the state was threatened.

Mr. MacDonald: This is 1946.

Mr. Sopha: The security of the state is a different matter.

Mr. MacDonald: Indeed there was another man who happened to be a supporter of the government at that time who rose and his explanation and justification for what the government did was: "I have a deep respect for Magna Carta!" You see the respect—it was like what we heard here in the House from some of the Conservative members, that they had great respect for these principles. Yet look what they did in their caucus and their Cabinet to these principles! The parallel is remarkable. This member of the House of Commons said this:

I have deep respect for Magna Carta. However, because I have a deep respect and sincere admiration for the Magna Carta and because I want it to continue to protect our rights and liberties, I contend that the government has acted wisely in taking these rights. The government acted the way it did in making the arrest precisely to prevent the sabotage of the Magna Carta.

Ponder and reflect on the rationalization there.

In my opinion the saying "desperate ills call for desperate remedies" remains true. I am quite sure that the Magna Carta would have contained clauses pertaining to sabotage and treason had the possibility of such actions been foreseen at the time. This was the quote of one Frederick Dorion the Liberal member for Charlevoix-Saguenay.

A week or so ago I was very interested in some of the comments that were made in the press with regard to the government's police state legislation. I was particularly interested, for example, in the comment of Jack Pickersgill, who was the adviser to Mr. King and subsequently to Mr. St. Laurent before he went into active politics. Mr. Pickersgill's comment was that the Robarts government police state legislation made the padlock law look like a bill of rights.

Well maybe, Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of personal judgment, I am not certain, but the interesting thing is that the Liberal government with Mr. Pickersgill as an adviser played politics with the padlock law and never, because it was not politically expedient, would they disallow the bill. Even though they exercised their power in disallowing equal threats to some of our basic rights when they were passed by the Alberta government. It was left, Mr. Speaker, to a man—distinguished in this country as a lawyer, and I might add because of a political association that I am proud of—Frank Scott, to fight the Roncarelli case through the courts for 15 years and finally achieve the unprecedented thing of pinning a conviction on the premier of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Sopha: He did no such thing, he got a judgment against him.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, okay then.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Is that more effective than getting rid of Premier Duplessis, which Lesage did?

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I come back to the historical perspective in which we should place this issue of the challenge that has come to the basic rights of the people in this country, a record that is so spotty on the part of both Liberal and Conservative governments—and perhaps because they were in power often in the last generation, particularly on the record of the Liberal party—that the people of Canada are profoundly sensitive on this issue. They will almost spontaneously arise when the circumstances demand, and I am not surprised that they rose in the instance when this government brought in its particular police state legislation.

However, Mr. Speaker, having dealt with the pre-eminent position in which we should place these basic rights of the individual, I want now to get around to dealing with the basic problem with which, in an incredible fashion, this government got itself into difficulty, as it sought to shape more effective machinery, namely, the problem and the threat presented by organized crime.

We have been trying to come to grips with organized crime in the province of Ontario for years now. The inability of the police, for example, for a number of years to cope with the clubs such as the Centre Road Veterans' Club out to the west of Toronto, when anybody who knew anything about this club—the dogs at the door, the barred windows and the three doors to get into it—knew that it was carrying on illegal activity. The police could not do anything about it. Indeed for three years after, when we in the province allegedly had moved to cope with it, by switching it from a federal to a provincial charter, the Attorney General of the day said that raids were not to be made on it unless there were complaints.

We had frustration of the police. I was very interested in the hon. Prime Minister saying that Feeley and McDermott languish in jail. They languish in jail now, but I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, Feeley and McDermott in conjunction with the Mafia ran the Centre Road Club for years and it is passing strange that the police could not come to grips with the thing. Just let me put it that way and nothing else, it is passing strange that they were frustrated in their efforts to enforce the law.

Commissioner Harvison says, for example, that Canada is not rife for invasion, but he added:

—always provided the laws are strictly enforced and that heavy sentences are handed out.

But the problem in this province was that for years our laws were not enforced and they were not enforced because the greatest obstacle to enforcing the laws was the attitude of the government. The attitude—and the hon. member for Downsview is very right—the attitude of the then Attorney General of the province of Ontario, Mr. Speaker, was that there was no organized crime. One could not really blame him for taking that attitude because he was backed up by the Prime Minister of the day.

So for years we drifted instead of really coming to grips with this. Then we had the Roach commission following the revelations in this House by the then leader of the Opposition—a very able statement, because it was prepared by the leader of the crime-investigating group of one of the papers, Mr. Speaker, and the information that he had dug out for years in his capacity as a professional journalist. It was presented to the House and the public reaction was such that finally the government had to set up the Royal commission.

The Royal commission had three terms of reference, Mr. Speaker. Its first term of reference was to get at the problem of the chartered clubs. The second term of reference was to investigate the allegations with regard to corruption in the Attorney General's department. On each of those terms of reference I would say that the report of the Royal commission was tolerably good and effective.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. MacDonald: I said it was tolerably good. Those are my words and I will stick by them. But the third term of reference, Mr. Speaker, that was given to the Roach commission was to look into the ramifications of organized crime in the province of Ontario and to make recommendations with regard to the effectiveness of the law enforcement agencies to deal with it.

After that, Mr. Speaker, the Roach commission did virtually nothing. Indeed, they picked up information along the way as they were dealing with the other two terms of reference and then Justice Roach and everybody involved became so weary of the task that there were one or two in camera sessions held with the commissioner of the RCMP and other people and we were presented with a report that merely scratched the surface in coming to grips with the ramifications of organized crime in the province of Ontario.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it became necessary for that job to be picked up and to be completed. It was just another instance of unfinished business. So we have now before us the report of the Ontario Police Commission, a pretty weighty tome. But I think, Mr. Speaker, that we should take note of this. That after all of these years the situation is not yet fully investigated. We have not yet got the full story, and this is the reason the hon. Prime Minister is very right when he said that we should not be lulled into any sense of false security.

We have not got the full story. The Ontario Police Commission report says quite frankly that this is a first and a preliminary report. It adds on page 11:

Many names were obtained of persons said to be engaged in organized crime, some of whom appeared before Mr. Justice Roach. We consulted the deputy Attorney General as to our legal powers while conducting our inquiry in camera and were advised that there was considerable doubt as to these, which should best be resolved by legislation to clarify. Accordingly, we decided to await a decision as to such legislation and its enactment, if favoured, before undertaking the private questioning of reluctant or hostile witnesses.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, there is the OPC in effect saying that a main aspect of this investigation that we have been doing in bits and pieces for years still remains to be done, and therefore it is not surprising when you get to the concluding portion of the report, their conclusions and their recommendations, you will find on page 113, the following comment:

The commission has refrained, as stated elsewhere, from completing its inquiry as to criminal personalities until its legal powers can be settled by legislation or by the courts.

This is a point I want to pause and dwell on, Mr. Speaker, because this is important. We have had one Royal commission. We have had innumerable court cases related to it. We have had another investigation, and the point we must never forget is that we are not yet fully conversant with the picture of organized crime in the province of Ontario.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I would say that just as the Valachi testimony in the United States in the investigation of the U.S. committee contributed in an extraordinary way to the knowledge of the operations of syndicated crime in the United States, and incidentally its link with Canada, so the testimony of the key leaders in Canada may represent a major lead to the organization and operation of organized crime in Canada and this we have not yet got. This is merely a first and a preliminary report.

It is rather interesting, Mr. Speaker, since we are trying to come to grips with how we can shape more effective machinery, to recall the whole origins of this report. Both the hon. Prime Minister and the hon. member for Downsview have spelled it out, that back last August—whether it was because they had nothing to do and because Commissioner Harvison made his statement, that the police commission then requested the Attorney General for permission to proceed and, in effect, pick up from the unfinished business of the Roach commission—whether that was the reason or not I do not know, but as a result of the public expressions of opinion with regard to organized crime in Ontario, they finally proceeded to complete the investigation. Indeed at that time, Mr. Speaker, we were treated to the rather unseemly spectacle of the Attorney General of Ontario and Commissioner Harvison in a public argument as to whether or not we had organized crime in this province and to what extent. It was not the kind of thing that would give one confidence as a citizen when the two leading people responsible for law enforcement, the Attorney General of Ontario and the Commissioner of the RCMP, were squabbling over what the facts were within the province of Ontario.

Very early—so the newspapers reported all last fall—very early the commission went to the deputy Attorney General, as I intimated in the quote from page 11 of the report, and said: "What are our powers for in camera sessions? We know we have the power to call witnesses and all the powers related to that under The Public Inquiries Act, but what are our powers with in camera sessions?" Apparently it was the deputy Attorney General who said that he was not certain that the law was explicit in granting them these powers.

In other words, it is interesting—as I said in the famous debate on Bill 99 on Monday, March 23—it is very interesting to note that the origins for the amendments proclaimed in Bill 99 come directly from the deputy Attorney General. It was he who said that they were necessary. So they cannot be palmed off on Judge Macdonald in the kind of continuing vendetta which the former Attorney General tended to get into with Judge Macdonald.

Those origins were in the advice of the deputy Attorney General. In his view the law was not explicit in granting the necessary powers for the in camera sessions. So the OPC asked for it in their report. The irony of it, Mr. Speaker, is that in spite of their own recognition of the need for it, when they got around to bringing in a bill to grant these greater powers, they handled the matter in such a fashion as to create one of the major political crises in the history of the province of Ontario. They handled the content of the bill with a monumental insensitivity. As the hon. Prime Minister said in a comment during those trying days: "We underestimated the side effects of the bill."

Of course, they also handled it with a fumbling ineptitude on the political level that is almost beyond comprehension. I do not want to review all that here now, because it is all old straw, but the fact that the bill should come into this House and that we should have no explanation, and that the Attorney General should have immediately gone out and made such alarmist statements so that he created the atmosphere that finally blew him out of the Cabinet and forced the government into a rather humbling retreat is almost beyond comprehension.

Even more important, he was grilled—and quite rightly so by the press. "If you think the bill is as bad as you say," in effect the newspaper corps said to him "then why did you bring it in?" And his retort after the question had been put to him many times was: "Do not ask me, ask Judge Macdonald."

An incredible statement, because it must have been that his better judgment and his recognition of the responsibility of Cabinets and Ministers was superseded for the moment from the underlying tendency in his thinking to continue his vendetta with the police commission and Judge Macdonald. So he blamed Judge Macdonald and got himself into real trouble. The result was, as I said, that this province was rocked with a major crisis which humbled a powerful government and, notwithstanding the comments of my hon. friends to the side, brought the government to the verge of defeat. It certainly resulted in the departure of the Attorney General—an honourable thing, incidentally, an honourable thing.

Indeed, if I may say this, and I say it without any undercurrent of criticism, I am glad that there was finally a Minister in the Cabinet who, under circumstances like that, had the integrity to resign. Because there are, sitting on the Cabinet benches, a number of them who have said—and let me go back to the former Attorney General and the debate on the NONG report in 1959—"I pledge my word that we have got the whole story and if it is ever proven that we have not got the full story on the NONG affair, then I will resign and go out of public life." Well, his resignation is long since past—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well now, on a point of order, I never said any such thing.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Speaker, I have not got the quote here but perhaps we can get it for him.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I never said any such thing, or ever made any such suggestion. The hon. member may be getting mixed up about what I said in relation to something that the leader of the Opposition at the time said, later on in another context. But we are not discussing either at the present time. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to accept my statement at this time.

Mr. MacDonald: I shall quote the record before we begin the House tomorrow, before orders of the day. It is known by all—

Mr. Speaker: We are discussing the order before the House.

Mr. MacDonald: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Sopha: A good filing system this fellow has.

Mr. MacDonald: It is filed in Hansard for posterity to read.

Mr. Speaker: Order! I am sorry. We are discussing the order before the House and I would ask the member to continue with the proper order of business at this time.

Mr. MacDonald: I was speaking of the honourable thing that the former Attorney General did under the circumstances, and I repeat: I think it was the honourable thing.

But the net result of all this, Mr. Speaker, is that the government, the Opposition, and the people of the province of Ontario, have been alerted to the need for a greater scrutiny of these threats to our basic liberties—not only in legislation, not only with regard to organized crime, but in the regulations and the procedures generally with which we have to deal in implementing the legislation which passes through this Legislature.

It is for that reason, Mr. Speaker—and I just say this in passing—that I have placed on the order paper a resolution—which I hope the hon. Prime Minister will give us an opportunity to debate—of the full range of these threats to the basic rights of the individual which may be in legislation or regulation; or the lack of appeal in some of our commissions arising from the fact that another committee which was set up by this House never completed a job, but just drifted off into limbo because of the preoccupation of the chairman in other matters.

However, Mr. Speaker, let me now come down to the real problem—the problem of organized crime. This is what provoked Bill 99. How great is that problem? I want to dwell on its seriousness for a moment, Mr. Speaker, because I think that the public consternation aroused by Bill 99, and the threat which it posed to individual rights, has tended to obscure the seriousness of the threat of organized crime. It has had a tendency to strengthen the feeling in the minds of some people that we are exaggerating the threat of organized crime.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, and I say this without any equivocation, organized crime is the greatest single threat from within society in the North American continent today. In contrast to it, the subversive forces such as Communism and Fascism are infinitely less. The forces of Fascism and Communism are supported by very few people but, in an unconscious and vague way, many people get drawn in in support of organized crime unwittingly—and this is a point to which I want to come in a moment.

In fact I think, Mr. Speaker, we have got to see this in the whole broad perspective of what is happening in Canada, and the threat which has emerged in recent years. The existence of organized crime in the United States has been well known, so well known that time after time of studies have been made available for people to know the nature of it, its organization, and what is necessary to cope with it.

But because of the seriousness of the threat of organized crime in the United States, Attorney General Robert Kennedy has been conducting a very vigorous campaign against its leaders. Combined with those developments in the United States you had, for example, after the Castro revolution in Cuba, gamblers being driven out of the international casinos of Havana. They could not go back to the United States and operate with the ease they had been able to in previous years. So they began to look to Canada.

They looked to Canada, if I may borrow that phrase of Commissioner Harvison's that the hon. Prime Minister referred to, as "an increasingly attractive target." In fact, Mr. Speaker, we have in the North American continent, there is no doubt about it, a continental cartel controlling crime in various degrees. We say, for example, that crime does not pay but this continent is systematically looted of $22 billion a year by the crime cartel.

The United States Senate committee has estimated that $47 billion a year are made in illegal betting in the United States, that $9 billion of that $47 billion of illegal betting goes into the treasuries of the underworld. Attorney General Kennedy, in his speech to the U.S. committee, which is recorded in this Ontario Police Commission report on page 155, had this to say:

The private government of organized crime, a government with an annual income of billions, resting on a base of human suffering and moral corrosion.

This is his description of the nature of organized crime. It is a private government within our government.

One of my hon. friends over here was interjecting, when I was recalling the threat to civil liberties, when the security of the state was threatened because of the Gouzenko ring; but I want to submit to this House that the security of the state is constantly threatened by organized crime. It is the enemy from within. They are a private government unto themselves. They have their own laws, they have their own moral code, they have their own discipline, they have their own law enforcement agencies. They even have their own pension system, so that when somebody has to be polished off in the squabbles and the internecine warfare and widows are left, there is at least some modicum of humanity; they will have a pension system for the widow who has to continue to live after her husband has been bumped off in their warfare.

You have this "moral corrosion" which Attorney General Kennedy spoke of, the $9 billion income, half of which is used as protection money. Now just pause and consider this, Mr. Speaker, and all hon. members should consider it when they are considering how serious is the threat of organized crime, this pattern of the United States of which we have the details. We have not got the details in Canada. We have not got the details in Ontario. This is the second or third report, and it is still only a preliminary report.

We can assume that the kind of thing that happened in the United States can happen in Canada, and what happened in the United States is that $4.5 billion of the $9 billion that went into the treasury of the underworld was used as protection money.

For example, in the Maclean's magazine article written by Allan Phillips on April 4, a couple of weeks ago, he refers to this and uses these figures—they are not new as far as he is concerned, they have been available from the records for quite some time—that the police and the politicians and the judiciary are subject to this kind of moral corrosion. Do not let us for one moment say, "This is American and has nothing to do with us." I was very interested, for example, to read in this Phillips article in Maclean's magazine, a quote he attributes to an embittered Toronto policeman who said, "Buy yourself a politician and you don't need to buy the police." Do not dismiss Allan Phillips' comments either, because if there is any man who has done a good job, apart from the Roach commission, to reveal the whole nature of organized crime, it is Allan Phillips, and this OPC report acknowledges this. It says the OPC is not in a position to agree, for the moment at least, with some of the conclusions he comes to, but this is in the context of the fact that it has not the full story.

In the United States, for example, there is more money being spent for protection than the police are being paid, far more money. Indeed, Mr. Phillips notes in this article, as I have seen in American articles studying the situation, that it is quite possible that police at the local level in the United States, whose total incomes are approximately $1 billion a year, get more money from organized crime for protection than they get from their own income. This is the conclusion of some of the studies in the U.S.A.

As for politicians, Mr. Speaker, just let me remind this House so that we do not get a bit of a holier-than-thou attitude with regard to what happens in the United States and cannot happen here, that there is no doubt in the wide world that there were politicians in this province, one of them right in the Cabinet, who was a very good friend of the—

Mr. Speaker: Order! I am sorry, I think I will have to ask the member to desist from making references that do not come within the ambit of the report of the police commission which is now before us.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I do not know why at this point we draw the line between evidence which was contained in the Roach commission in its testimony and further evidence as made available in this. All I am saying is what was in the Roach commission testimony and report.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion, I did not think it was relevant to the report which is now before the House.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, with very great respect, I want to suggest to you that if we are talking about the threat of organized crime and its corruption of police and politicians and the judiciary, this is very relevant to what we are discussing at the present time.

Mr. Sopha: Suppose we let the man rest in his grave.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. MacDonald: Fine. But let us suppose that we take cognizance of the fact when we do accept your advice, that accomplices with organized crime were right at the Cabinet level.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: The hon. member must feel very proud.

Mr. MacDonald: Indeed, Mr. Speaker, if you think I exaggerate at all, let me quote another paragraph from Allan Phillips' article on April 4, when he said:

Politically the cartel puts up an estimated 15 per cent of all U.S. state and local campaign contributions, about ten times as much as organized labour. In Montreal's last election the Mafia backed its chosen candidates with sums totalling $100,000. In Quebec's last provincial election, it anted up nearly $1 million. Bookies and runners doubled as poll workers. Strongarm men stuffed ballot boxes. At the core of many big city machines is the manpower of organized crime—an alliance of two governments, one directing the law, the other the lawbreakers.

Here is a man who knows about as much about organized crime, outside of those who are investigating it, as anyone, and this is his comment. So what is the point we have reached? I just sum up my comments by agreeing with the hon. Prime Minister 100 per cent, that we must not for one moment underestimate the threat of organized crime and be lulled into a sense of false security.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: What is the title of that article?

Mr. MacDonald: This article?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Yes.

Mr. MacDonald: "For the Sake of Argument." Allan Phillips says, "Let us give the police more power."

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: Just a minute now. Never mind this "would you" stuff. Let us get down and deal with the substance of the issue instead of continuing to play politics with it.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. MacDonald: The final and the most important aspect of this, Mr. Speaker, is that if you are going to cope with the threat of organized crime you have to recognize that organized crime becomes established through legitimate businesses. When it gets built in with legitimate businesses and gets established in a community such as we have in Metropolitan Toronto, you can never uproot it—that is the considered opinion of the students of organized crime. You will find, for example, on page 119 in the conclusions of the Ontario Police Commission report, conclusion (j):

—that once syndicated crime has obtained a foothold in any large community, it is almost impossible to eliminate it.

Just let that sink in, Mr. Speaker: "—it is almost impossible to eliminate it."

—but that it cannot gain such foothold without police laxity, inefficiency or corruption.

The conclusion of both this report and of the Roach report is that we have organized crime in the province of Ontario, that as yet we have not syndicated crime.

I just want to say, Mr. Speaker, that with the record of Attorneys General not coming to grips with it and with the difficulties that the police have had in trying to track down and close up clubs, we are luckier than we deserve that we have not got syndicated crime established in the province of Ontario. But let us not take too much for granted, because according to other evidence in this Ontario Police Commission report, the line between organized crime and syndicated crime is a very thin one. It is almost a matter of judgment as to which is organized and which is syndicated. One can develop into the other very easily.

One recalls, for example, the Bluestein beating here in the city of Toronto. Once again the law enforcement agencies did not seem to be able to come to grips with it until Pierre Berton began to expose it in his column and force some action. But let us face the fact that the Bluestein beating was a manifestation of the battle to establish syndicated crime. The Aguecci murder, when a resident of the township of Scarborough was found, his body mutilated and burned over in New York State, was another proof of the fact that syndicated crime controlled from the United States involved a Canadian citizen. He was bumped-off because for some reason or other he was not playing the game. Or you have the instance of "Scrip" Mitchell, up until the time he disappeared, a well-known gambler down in the Niagara frontier area, who walked out of a club one night at twelve o'clock and nobody has heard of him since, because he apparently was not playing the game according to the rules the leaders had established.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, you have a very serious threat, and I repeat, in my view organized crime is the greatest single threat within the North American society from within.

It is a threat that is just as great as the threat of subversive elements that led the government at Ottawa, for example in 1946, to try to crack spy rings. Indeed it is a threat for precisely the same reasons. It is a threat against the security of the state, and the integrity, not only of the state, but of the judiciary and of the police and politicians. Let it go on uncontrolled and you will destroy society as we know it.

So I think it is very important, as somebody quipped over here, asking "do you want to give the police more powers," it is very important that we examine whether or not we have given every bit of power that we can to the police to deal with this kind of threat—short of a threat to the basic rights of the individual. This is the acid test.

If you look at the recommendations, Mr. Speaker, you will find that underlying these recommendations is the confusion of the government's position at the present time. Underlying the recommendations that are made not only in this report but in the annual report of the police commission—the first annual report made a year or so ago, a copy of which was tabled in this House, and which I have had for reading purposes the last few days—you will find that there is a plea for more effective co-ordination of the police forces in the province of Ontario; co-ordination between the provincial and the national, so that you would not have the Attorney General and Commissioner Harvison arguing as to what exactly was the situation in Ontario; co-ordination between the provincial and the municipal; co-ordination between the provincial and the international forces on the other side of the border.

It suggests that you should have intelligence officers and intelligence committees, with the officers reporting only to the chiefs of the various police forces so that they will be able to keep their pooling of information within a limited group, in order that it cannot leak out into the hands of those who might be able to use it.

You have the basic recommendation that they make in this instance. It is to be found on pages 119 and 120 and I think it would be useful to have it put into the record:

For the purpose of improving police efficiency and effectiveness of law enforcement generally, this commission respectfully submits and recommends:

1. That all police forces should be under the immediate government of an independent and non-political authority subject to removal for cause by the government on the recommendation of the Attorney General; that in pursuance with that policy, police commissions be appointed for all municipal departments now governed by municipal councils; and that provision be retained in the organization of such commissions for political representation;

2. That smaller police departments, where geographically feasible, be amalgamated and/or placed under a single police commission or provincial authority, to ensure the maximum availability and mutually effective use of manpower and of specialized services; that consideration be given to the enactment of amendments to The Police Act, to empower this commission to make reports and propound schemes for such amalgamations, conduct hearings thereon, and subject to the approval of the Attorney General, put such schemes into effect.

In other words, what we were seeking to establish was this co-ordinated police force through the province of Ontario. This, as the hon. Prime Minister has indicated, is the reason why the government has established the police commission.

But what has happened since then, Mr. Speaker? The government created the police commission and in less than 12 months it started to destroy it by withdrawing its power. When it was established in 1961, or at least the debates dealing with it were in 1961, the hon. Prime Minister concluded his comments in the first reading of the bill with this comment:

In short, the commission, in addition to supervising the affairs of the Ontario Provincial Police, will play a general watchdog role over law observance and enforcement in Ontario, to the end that our province will always be an unhealthy place for crime and criminals.

The Attorney General added the following; as was recalled in the first annual report of the police commission:

It is the intention to make this commission as strong, as impartial and as qualified for its work as possible. In particular it will have the directing and control of the Ontario Provincial Police force. It will have the powers of directing, overseeing and leading the Ontario Provincial Police force, which will come directly under the commissioner.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, it was this government which established the Ontario Police Commission and said that it was to co-ordinate all of the police forces and would have direct control over the Ontario Provincial Police. Yet within less than one year, this same government acted and subsequently confirmed its action with amendments in which it took the OPP away from the Ontario Police Commission.

The pleas of the Ontario Police Commission in its annual report a year ago, and the pleas of the Ontario Police Commission in this crime report included one that there should be something to co-ordinate all of these small police forces across the province of Ontario. This would cope with the kind of situation where you have a municipality in which there is one policeman, and while the bank is being robbed he is impounding a dog or looking after some bylaw about burning grass or something of that nature. Surely, this is a pathetically inadequate kind of situation to deal with any threat of organized crime. Yet this government up until now has categorically dismissed this proposal.

I was very interested, Mr. Speaker, in the hon. Prime Minister's comments, whether in a quiet way he was not letting us know that perhaps now that the former Attorney General was gone, maybe they are going to give a somewhat more sympathetic hearing to this particular recommendation. The hon. Prime Minister, in referring to the need for amalgamation of these various forces, and conceivably the other part of the recommendation that the OPP should take over in the small municipalities that do not have the wherewithal to build an effective modern police force, commented that it was a "long-term task."

Does this mean that the hon. Prime Minister is saying that he has reversed the policy of dismissal of these recommendations, because it was reported in the press many times by the former Attorney General, who categorically dismissed this recommendation. He certainly did nothing when it was reported in the annual report a year ago. Judge Macdonald repeated it many times throughout the fall and many times the former Attorney General is on record as saying that he was not going to entertain this proposal. Perhaps some time before the debate is over, the hon. Prime Minister will enlighten us as to whether or not this is an indication of a more sympathetic reaction to this request.

However, Mr. Speaker, there is another quotation that I would like to put into the record. There is no doubt about it that Judge Macdonald's recommendation in trying to bring all the police forces together was born of his reactions from a study of the situation in Great Britain. There, they had had an investigation of the whole of the law enforcement agencies through a Royal commission. Once again, in that Royal commission report, you will find that the argument against a national police was studied in Great Britain. It was rejected in 1962 in a Royal commission report. In other words, they were in favour of a national police force that was a co-ordinated body and their reason was this—I quote:

British liberty does not depend and never has depended upon the dispersal of police power. The proper criterion is whether the police are answerable to the law and ultimately to a democratically elected Parliament.

Their recommendation was for a national police force that would co-ordinate the local forces in a fashion that our OPC has been seeking for a year or so.

What is the government going to do? Here is an area of utter confusion at the moment. The government set up the Ontario Police Commission. The government within a year starts to dismantle the Ontario Police Commission until the hon. member for Downsview is not too far wrong when he says that the police commission today happened to be—he is he a county court judge, the new one; the former chairman was a county court judge—a Crown Attorney, a policeman and a general who are really looking for something to do. Most of their original powers and most of their original status and most of their original functions have been destroyed by the government that set them up.

Let me emphasize this—I am not wedded to the Ontario Police Commission as it stands. What I am looking for is the most effective kind of organization to cope with the situation about which this government now has the obligation to “level” with the hon. members of this Legislature and the people of the province of Ontario. The government set up the police commission; it has reversed its policy. It is in the process of destroying it now. It has refused to accept the commission’s recommendations for establishing a co-ordinated effective law enforcement agency in the province of Ontario. What is the government going to do? It has a real mess which is its own creation.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: That is what you think.

Mr. MacDonald: At least I am thinking and I wish I was convinced that the hon. Minister who just spoke was doing the same thing.

I will make this further comment. Perhaps when we get back to The Attorney General’s Department it will be more appropriate to deal with the police commission since it is responsible to him. But I must say that I am more and more inclined to the need for a separate administrative and co-ordinating agency—which was one of the functions which was given to the police commission and now has been dismantled to a degree—apart from the investigating functions which have also been given to the police commission, to conduct what in effect is a continuing Royal Commission into crime, or the threat of organized crime, in this province.

I think it is going to be increasingly difficult to get one body of people to be the administrator of the police, the co-ordinator of whatever group of police you have in the province of Ontario, and at the same time conduct the kind of continuing investigation in which the New York crime commission has been engaged in since 1958.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, it is possible that there is an error in the basic concept here. The public in a democracy are very suspect of the excessive power of police. Therefore if we find that we have got to give whatever body is charged with the responsibility of a continuing investigation into the threat of organized crime powers which are dangerous powers, I think they should be in the hands of not the police but a separate agency. I would suggest, in general terms, something along the lines of the New York crime commission, three out of four of whose personnel, incidentally, must be attorneys.

I move on to one of the aspects of the report of the Ontario Police Commission with reference to gambling. This is the one area which the Roach commission, and now the police commission, says is the most serious. Here, beyond any shadow of doubt, we have had organized crime.

I sometimes wonder how it can be argued we have not got, to some degree, syndicated crime; because if anybody notices the continuity—between gambling on horse races during the off season when Woodbine, New Woodbine, and other racetracks in Canada are not operating, because of the obvious connections with horse racing in the United States—I do not know how you can come to the conclusion that there are no international links which denote a degree of the syndication of that aspect of crime here in Canada.

Within this OPC report you have a comment which, I think, is very accurate—that “gambling is the root of all evil” as far as organized crime is concerned, that gambling provides the treasury of the underworld—the $9 billion which goes into the underworld of the $47 billion of illegal betting in the United States—according to the U.S. committee report. It provides the funds for other activities, from narcotic rings to prostitution rings, to all manner of frauds.

Here, Mr. Speaker, I think we run smack into what is basically a problem in public attitudes. On page 194, for example, of the police commission appendices, you will find a paragraph attributed to William Schneider, the Commissioner of Police for Buffalo, New York. It says this:

2. A small crime committed on the local level is magnified many times when its evil fruits are funnelled with those of similar crimes to the top of the pyramid. It is in this latter area that public awareness can supplant public apathy. In the area of gambling, for instance, the average citizen is generally unaware that the $2 so-called "innocent" bet placed with a casual acquaintance is his contribution to a multi-billion dollar syndicate which depends on brutal assault and murder as its means of cold, dispassionate discipline.

In other words, the individual citizen, with his little $2 bet which can be collected down in the front lobby of Queen's Park, or in an office or cigar store downtown, or in any factory, is the contribution of this individual citizen to this multi-billion dollar structure, which, beyond any shadow of doubt, is the syndicated portion of organized crime.

What are we going to do about this issue? Once again the government has not been facing up to the situation. We have had, for example, the Morden report, suggesting that we cannot ignore the great proportion of illegal betting which takes place off the tracks. In fact there is testimony in the OPC report which says—not attributed to any specific person but in one of the chapters—that for every $1 bet legally you have from $3 to $5 in Ontario which is bet illegally. I think it was given by one of the Crown Attorneys, or one of the chiefs of police, who were on a panel.

You had Magistrate Bigelow's statement to the legislative committee a few weeks ago that in fact the law permits track betting now as long as the money is channelled through the pari mutuels at the race track. He says this is an interpretation of the law which he has had from lawyers. He also said that he told Jimmy Gardiner one time—this is back in the days, which I think still exist, when pari-mutuels came under the Minister of Agriculture—that he was going to exercise this power as interpreted to him by some lawyers. And Jimmy Gardiner told him that if he did the law would be changed pretty quickly.

You have the OPC evidence on page 175, from Attorney General Kennedy, which I would like to read briefly into the record. This gives the opposite view because Professor Morden's proposal was that we should legalize off-track betting. Here you have part of the testimony before the Senate committee, as found on page 175:

Senator McIntyre [saying to Attorney General Kennedy]: I am sure that you are aware and, surprisingly, that there is this tremendous desire on behalf of the people to gamble.

I think perhaps you are aware that up in

New Hampshire this past year we have passed a sweepstake or general lottery?

Attorney General Kennedy: Yes, I am.

Senator McIntyre: I have often wondered whether or not the legalization of this whole field would at least tend to drive these hoodlums out of it and go along with what seems to be the public's desires.

Attorney General Kennedy: I would be opposed to it. I can understand the feeling for it. I happen to be opposed to it.

First, I don't think it drives the hoodlums out. Where we have seen legal gambling operate, it has not been a very happy picture, so far.

Senator McIntyre: Have you found, then, that legalized gambling actually attracts this element of society into its midst?

Attorney General Kennedy: It does, Senator.

So here we have an opposing point of view. Indeed, hon. members will find on page 21 in the testimony of Commissioner McClellan, the successor to Commissioner Harvison, this comment:

They doubted—

"They" meaning Commissioner McClellan and some of his senior police officers, who were with him before the Ontario Police Commission inquiry:

They doubted whether legalized off-track and other betting would get rid of the bookmaker taking illegal bets. It has not done so where it has been tried. The gangsters move in on anything like that that is legalized. The same applies to legalized supply of narcotics. The experiment in England is not successful. As a result of constant police pressure in Canada, the number of criminal addicts has not increased very much in the last 20 years; 3,300 then, 4,000 today despite the substantial increase in population.

So here we have contradictory views.

But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that since gambling is the root of organized crime, since this is where the money comes from, since this is where you get the billions of dollars in the United States and at least hundreds of millions of dollars channelled out in Canada—or even in Ontario. Last year approximately $90 million was bet in Ontario tracks; and if the ratio is correct that there is anywhere from $3 to $5 illegally bet for every $1 bet at the track, that means anywhere from $270 million to $450 million is illegally bet in the province of Ontario alone.

Now, you get about a fifth of that being creamed off into the treasury of the underworld and there you have something like $50 million, anywhere from $50 million to $90 million. This is the kind of fund that is available there.

What is the government doing about it? Well, the report has some interesting recommendations as to where the government is not doing very much about it. For example, it reports that radio and TV stations should be prosecuted for regular broadcasts of race results. In other words, Mr. Speaker, we have the authorities—the government, the law enforcement agencies, who profess to be opposed to the activities of bookmakers—and yet this is sheer hypocrisy, because every day of the week, every hour of the afternoon, on every newscast, you have open collaboration with the bookmakers through broadcast of the results of races, and they give them on every TV and radio station.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence (St. George): Newspapers, too!

Mr. MacDonald: Right; I agree with my hon. friend. I am very intrigued by their omission. I missed the distinction as to why newspapers are not listed in the report of the Ontario Police Commission. In fact, I remember years ago when I was working on the Montreal Gazette one day, either by design or in error, they left out the racing material in the "bulldog" edition in the evening and there were more telephone calls in the hour or so after that edition hit the street and the unsatisfied clients were not getting their information that they had ever had on anything that ever came into the Gazette. So there is no doubt in the wide world that the papers as well as the TV and radio stations are active collaborators with the bookmakers.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, I spend my summers down in that great God's country of Lanark constituency—the hon. member (Mr. Gomme) is here—in the Rideau Lake area and I have always been fascinated in the summertime by one thing.

It is a quiet, tranquil, pastoral atmosphere and the only radio station you can get on my little transistor—others are over the rocks to Kingston or through to Ottawa—the only good local station you can get is a little radio station, CJET, in Smith's Falls. It plays western music and caters to all the needs of the people in this pastoral atmosphere of eastern Ontario. Yet every half hour regularly in the afternoon, the news results from New Woodbine are pouring in. Now, this must create a little bit of disturbance in the minds of the responsible citizens, because where are the bookmakers hidden in this serene, pastoral atmosphere down there?

Mr. G. E. Gomme (Lanark): They are only there in the summertime.

Mr. MacDonald: I do not know whether there is any broadcast of the results in the wintertime when I am not there, so I will just have to try to assess one of the suggestions that has come from over here.

But the point, and having made it I leave it, Mr. Speaker, is that there is hypocrisy in the government and the law enforcement agencies. They have been tolerating, openly, gambling in this province. They have been tolerating collaboration with bookmakers.

Well, are they serious in doing something about organized crime and, if so, when are they going to go into action on this issue?

Surely that recommendation is one that is about as overdue as anything could possibly be—the recommendation that the Criminal Code should be enforced with regard to provision of all this working material for the organized crime leaders and all the little minions who work with them.

Mr. Speaker, I come finally to the last section of my comments with regard to strengthening the investigating powers. This is what we sought to do in Bill 99; it has relationship to that and also to one or two other phases of the subject. I am wondering, in view of the fact that it is three minutes of six, since this is a unit in itself, might I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: It being six of the clock, I do now leave the chair and will resume at eight.

It being six o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

THURSDAY, APRIL 16, 1964

The House resumed at 8.00 o'clock, p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

ONTARIO POLICE COMMISSION REPORT ON ORGANIZED CRIME (continued)

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, before dealing with the latter portion of my remarks in connection with this crime report, I promised the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts) this afternoon that I would give him the quote instead of paraphrasing him, so I shall read excerpts from Hansard at page 1347 and 1348 for March 18, 1959.

Mr. Speaker: I would just ask the member, is this relevant to the debate that is before the House?

Mr. MacDonald: No, except that the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests intervened this afternoon and said if I were going to use any quotes that I should give direct quotes. I will do it tomorrow—

Mr. Speaker: I would be of the opinion that the member should do it on another occasion as it is not relevant to the order that is before the House.

Mr. MacDonald: It has kept for five years, it will keep for another 12 hours.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Would the hon. member mind if I ask him a question? I did not want to interfere before, I did not want to break into his train of thought and as he is beginning a new— Would he mind?

Mr. MacDonald: No.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: On page 194 of the report which he quoted at some length earlier, the hon. member quoted from the statement of William Schneider, Commissioner of Police of Buffalo, New York, and I took it that he pretty well agreed with the third paragraph on the page, but I noted that he stopped right there. Page 194.

Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: There is a paragraph after that which he did not make any mention of and in all seriousness I would like to know if he agrees with what obviously Commissioner Schneider agrees with, that is, "there is no public outcry against suspended sentences or nominal fines in our courts for gambling or prostitution." Obviously the commissioner feels that there should not be suspended sentences for these offences. I wonder if the hon. member—

Mr. MacDonald: I agree with it emphatically. I think Commissioner Harvison's suggestion that we should enforce the law and that there should be stiff sentences is one of the great requirements. Once again, in Allan Phillips' article he quotes the fact that on the Canadian prairies there has not been a single conviction for bookmaking in years, so apparently out in that pastoral scene it is even more—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We are not speaking of "no convictions"; he says "no suspended sentences." Does the hon. member agree with that?

Mr. MacDonald: Well, that is a double negative. I am in favour of no suspended sentences and more effective sentences.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Thank you.

Mr. MacDonald: Now, Mr. Chairman, the final portion of my remarks have to do with two phases of strengthening the investigation powers, and obviously this is the area which raises the dangers with regard to the rights of the individual. I think perhaps it would be useful, to begin with, to quote the report and what it recommends, as found on page 124. This may have been quoted earlier in the afternoon, I am not certain. The 11th recommendation or the 11th conclusion, I have forgotten which it is:

That section 48 of The Police Act be amended to clarify the powers of the Ontario Police Commission so as to permit hearings in camera as well as in public and to make it an offence, without permission of the commission, to communicate the name of a witness or information given to the commission by any witness in private session; and to confer on the commission, whether in private or public session, the powers of a superior court to punish for contempt; and that following such clarification, this commission interrogate persons believed to be in possession of information respecting criminal operations, which information could be of assistance in determining the state of law and order in the province, and the need for special legislative, government or police action.

Now, there are some aspects of this that I personally think are unnecessary. On the other hand, I do not agree with the conclusion of the hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer) that we need no greater power. It seems to me that it is clear from the legal interpretation of the questionable powers regarding in camera sessions that we have to have some clarification of it. The clarification is needed to strengthen the hands of the investigating body to get information with regard to what is going on in the underworld. I emphasize, of course, and so there can be no misunderstanding, I will continue to emphasize this, that any consideration of an extension of powers beyond what is there now must be done only in a fashion that is not going to encroach on the rights of the individual.

This, of course, is the meat of the legislative committee's job, which we are going to have to get to within, I presume, the next week. We are under a directive from this House to strike out section 14, but as the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) insisted—and I certainly not only had no objection, I was enthusiastic on the proposition—we should study it to find what alternative to section 14 would be tolerable without being offensive to the basic rights of the individual. I personally await with a great deal of anticipation the attendance before the legislative committee of the law officers of the Crown to hear from them why they think, as both the hon. Prime Minister and particularly the Attorney General have intimated to the House, that section 14 as it stood did not constitute any reflection on the rights of the individual.

Without anticipating the work of the committee and the investigations that it is going to conduct, Mr. Speaker, in my view I think the working model that we should examine very closely—personally I can see nothing seriously wrong with it—is the situation with regard to the New York crime commission. As hon. members of the House are likely aware, this was set up as a temporary body—in fact its official name includes the word “temporary”—back in 1958 for a five-year period. Its term has been extended for another two years and according to what I have read it is likely to continue to be extended. As the hon. Prime Minister indicated this afternoon, they recognize that they have a continuing job to do.

What, in effect, this does is to invest an investigating body with the power to hold in camera sessions, to exercise most of the powers usually under The Public Inquiries Act. But the people involved can have counsel and here, of course, is the key point—that if witnesses are held in contempt and any of the penalties are going to be imposed, the New York crime commission itself cannot impose the penalties. It must go to the courts and seek a court order. In other words, here you have an opportunity for a review of the situation before the court and thereby an opportunity to protect the rights of the individual. It seems to me that this is granting the kind of power with all of the necessary safeguards. It is more power than we will have at the present time if the deputy Attorney General was correct in his legal interpretation that we do not have these powers now. But I think it is the kind of power that is necessary to strengthen the hands of any investigating body we have in Ontario to interrogate these leaders of organized crime and to try to get the kind of detailed information that they got in the Valachi hearings in Washington. I acknowledge the Valachi hearings were on a voluntary basis; they were not at this stage dealing with a hostile witness.

The second phase of strengthening the investigating powers that I want to touch on is this question of wire tapping and I do so for two reasons: one, I think once again here is a topic that illustrates the complexities and the difficulties involved in the problem with which we are faced here. I also raise it because I had something to say over the weekend on this topic and I was quoted accurately in one paper that I was almost convinced that this was necessary and inaccurately in another paper that I was unqualifiedly in support of the proposition of wire tapping. I hope in the course of my remarks I can indicate my thinking at least at the moment.

It seems to me the basic situation we have to take solid cognizance of is the fact that the leaders of organized crime and syndicated crime, beyond any shadow of doubt, are using these instruments all of the time. They are fully aware of all of the modern electronic devices and they are using them so that any suggestion that the police be denied the right to use them in coping with organized crime—as I shall point to a little later in reference to the committee in the U.K.—simply means that you are going to deny the police the use of modern electronic weapons that the leaders of the underworld have access to and are using all the while.

However, Mr. Speaker, there is one aspect of this, and I make this comment as a layman with no comprehension at all of all the incredible developments in the electronic world, but it is the case now, beyond any doubt, that there are new electronic devices with which you can in effect tune in on a discussion, or presumably on a telephone discussion too, and record it, even though you may be some considerable distance from it at the time. In other words, if you can in effect achieve the same result as has been achieved in the past by actual physical wire tapping, then the question that arises in my layman's mind is, are some of the problems involved in wire tapping as we have known it in the past really problems any longer? Do we need to physically attach anything to a wire when we have now moved into an electronic age where you can just in effect tune in and record anything that you want to record?

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we should have experts in this field come before the legislative committee when we are considering this. Indeed I read one newspaper story which stated that the Metropolitan police are now using this kind of equipment and that the police forces in some of these suburban communities have been in touch with the Metropolitan police to find out how effective it is before they get equipment of this nature.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence (St. George): The Toronto chief denied it.

Mr. MacDonald: He denied it? Well, I think there is a tendency to make denials with regard to these things. It is like denying there is going to be an election next week when the Cabinet has already decided there is going to be one.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Chief Mackey would not deny it if it were true.

Mr. MacDonald: Would not, eh? Well, I accept that; I have high regard for Chief Mackey. As a matter of fact I would not dispute that, except some times he is in a rather tenuous position vis-à-vis the law and public reaction to this kind of thing.

However, leaving aside for a moment the need for some expert advice to answer the question that I have just raised, I think it is interesting to go back and take a look at the legal position and the view of authorities—beyond any doubt they are real authorities in the various fields—with regard to wire tapping and its use. I want first, for example, to comment on the position in the United States. I am quoting from page 169 of the OPC report in the lengthy statement that was given by Attorney General Robert Kennedy to the committee in the United States. Starting in the middle of the page:

Finally, if we are to make maximum progress in our drive on organized crime, I am convinced that we need legislation to permit the use of wire tapping by law enforcement officials.

The urgency for revision of the present and ineffective provision of the wire-tapping statute is emphasized by the fact that the latest electronic improvements are easily available to the criminal. The advantages these can give him over law enforcement officers are plain.

Leading racketeers make almost unrestricted use of interstate facilities, particularly communications, to direct their illegal activities.

Meanwhile, the present statute fails to protect the right of privacy over the telephone, because anyone can listen in without violating that statute. At present, to convict someone of illegal wire tapping, we must not only prove both that a tap was made but also that there was unlawful disclosure of the conversation.

Thus the present law neither prevents indiscriminate wire tapping nor recognizes the legitimate needs of law enforcement for authority, closely circumscribed, to use this means of gathering evidence.

Last January, The Department of Justice resubmitted to the Congress a carefully worded bill, S.1308, with strong procedural safeguards, which would afford a clear-cut basis for the legitimate and controlled use of wire tapping by law enforcement officials. At the same time the bill would expressly forbid all other types of wire tapping.

Now there is the American position. Elsewhere in the report—I will not bother quoting it directly—it is intimated that Attorney General Kennedy is going to move to have the necessary constitutional amendment so that this enactment can be made.

Let us turn now to the Canadian position as reported on page 95 of the report:

A third and more drastic means of procuring information and possibly evidence of a bookmaking or narcotics operation by so-called wire tapping being given legal authorization is controversial and is opposed by many as an interference with the privacy of communication and an introduction of methods found in police states. The problems presented should be examined to see if the objections taken are not more emotionally than rationally based.

And I look directly at the hon. member for St. George, Mr. Speaker, when I say that because I think he went into orbit spontaneously when the report was put out. I continue:

To begin with, except for section 25 of The Bell Telephone Company Act, there is in Canadian law at present no prohibition against wire tapping as such. It can be and no doubt is done at present, for good and bad reasons, without fear of penalty. The only thing prohibited by Ontario law is the unauthorized disclosure of conversations overheard by a third party. The Bell Telephone Company special Act which makes it a "misdemeanor" to attach unauthorized equipment to its telephone lines or to intercept conversations on those lines would, in our respectful opinion, prove legally unenforceable, and with modern electronic equipment telephone messages can be intercepted anyway without the necessity of making any attachment physically to any telephone line or equipment.

A court, however, could and does permit, subject to the general rules of evidence, disclosures of such conversation to be made. Would it not be better, as is done in many of the American states, to prohibit wire tapping entirely, except as authorized by a court where justification and need are strictly proved and exacting restrictions are at the same time imposed?

So there you have the very confused Canadian position where there is really no law against it. Admittedly there is considerable use of it. The courts will accept the evidence and in face of that it is rather interesting that there should be such a widespread public antipathy to the idea—although I understand the reasons for the antipathy because it appears to be a serious invasion of privacy.

However, let me turn now to the British position as found on pages 96, 97 and thereafter. This is from a committee that was established in Great Britain comprised of two leading judges, Lord Birkett and Lord Monckton together with Mr. P. C. Gordon Walker. The report continues:

After making a careful historical review of the legal power to intercept communications of various kinds, they came to the conclusion that: (a) a right to detain and open letters and put them in evidence in court has long been recognized.

I must say, if I may interject here, that this makes very interesting reading for a layman. I was not aware that this was the case. But here are two distinguished British jurists plus another. I continue:

(b) this power of interception also extends to telegrams, and (c) if there is such a lawful power, then it is wide enough to cover telephone communications as well.

The authority to intercept communications is given by warrant of the Secretary of State and for the purpose only of detecting serious crime or of safeguarding the security of the state. We are here, of course, concerned with the first purpose only.

Then on the next page, page 97, the following extracts from the report are of particular relevance and interest:

We cannot think it to be wise or prudent or necessary to take away from the police any weapon, or to weaken any power they now possess, in their fight against organized crime of this character. The police ought not to be handicapped in their efforts to prevent, or to detect crime, whilst the criminal is allowed to use every modern method to achieve his purpose. If it be said that the number of cases where methods of interception are used is small, and that an objectionable method could therefore well be abolished, we feel that though the number of cases may be small this is not a reason why criminals in this particular class of crime should be encouraged by the knowledge that they have nothing to fear from methods of interception.

We therefore think that no useful purpose would be served by recommending that the power of interception be no longer exercised in the detection and prevention of crime, for it would remove from the hands of the police a weapon which they have found to be effective when all other methods have been unavailing, and would announce to potential wrongdoers that they have nothing to fear from the police in this particular respect. This, in our opinion, so far from strengthening the liberty of the ordinary citizens, might very well have the opposite effect.

And:

We feel that to announce the abandonment of this power now would be a concession to those who are desirous of breaking the law in one form or another, with no advantage to the ordinary citizen or to the community in general.

And a little later on in the page:

The committee accordingly concluded and recommended:

(1) The origin of the power to intercept communications can only be surmised, but the power has been exercised from very early times, and has been recognized as a lawful power by a succession of statutes covering the last 200 years or more.

(2) There is some difference of view on the authority to intercept telephone messages. On one view the power is identical with the power to open letters and rests on the ancient power to intercept communications. Another view is that the power rests on a comparatively modern statute.

(3) The power to intercept communications is exercised for the prevention and detection of serious crime and for the preservation of the safety of the state.

(4) The power is now almost exclusively exercised by the Metropolitan police, the Board of Customs and Excise and the Security Service. It is used with the greatest care and circumspection, under the strictest rules and safeguards, and never without the personal considered approval of the Secretary of State.

(5) The use of the power has been effective in detecting major criminals and preventing injury to national security.

(6) The exercise of the power in these limited spheres should be allowed to continue under the same strict rules and supervision and in the special circumstances we have set out. The criminal and wrongdoer should not be allowed to use services provided by the state for wrongful purposes quite unimpeded, and the police, the Customs, and the Security Service ought not to be deprived of an effective weapon in their efforts to preserve and maintain order for the benefit of the community.

(7) The interference with the privacy of the ordinary law-abiding citizen or with his individual liberty is infinitesimal, and only arises as an inevitable incident of intercepting the communications of some wrongdoer. It has produced no harmful consequences.

And then it goes on to point out that:

Mr. Walker, in a reservation, emphasized the importance of public support for the methods used by the police, and that telephone tapping should be limited as much as possible because of public repugnance to the interception of communications.

In other words, sir, if I may just sum up here. The body of advice and information from experts such as Attorney General Kennedy in the United States, and the committee in Great Britain, clearly indicates that we are going to tie the hands of our law enforcement agencies behind their backs in this important respect, if they are not given this right. Therefore the use of it should be considered under carefully considered and safeguarded conditions, so that any time they are going to use it they have to get a specific warrant for its use in the knowledge that it is required to detect some particularly important underground figure and his activities.

The second point in my summary that I want to go back to is that as a layman I am curious to have some information as to whether or not the modern electronic development does in fact make this all outmoded and it is really the Model T Ford approach to things because we really do not need any physical tapping in it at all.

This brings me to my final conclusion as we approach this difficult task of reconciling the shaping of more effective machinery and yet, at the same time, make dead certain that we are safeguarding the rights of the individual. It is a quote that I would like to draw to the attention of the House on pages 100 and 101. I think the hon. member for Downview used this quote this afternoon, sir, and used it in the framework of his general criticism of the police commission. Let me read it to the House again:

What is called for is a weighing of social value, to determine if what is here seriously advocated really involves any substantial loss of present rights as opposed to very worthwhile social advantages, which will serve to ensure the continued freedom of the individual from the physical and mental duress and tyranny which might result from the successful inroads of syndicated crime. Of what value, then, would any of our freedoms legally guaranteed or otherwise, be to us?

I must say that my initial reaction to this is somewhat different from that of the hon. member for Downview. I personally do not minimize the seriousness of the threat to our society from organized crime. I repeat, I think it is the greatest single enemy within society today. It is just as great a threat as the threat of subversive elements. The security of the state, and integrity of the state, its legislators, its judiciary, law enforcement agencies, all can be corrupted. Surely nothing could be more serious than this. Therefore I think there is a weighing of social values—as to whether or not the use of more power to investigate, or the safeguarded use of wire tapping, are not necessary to get the information that will protect the state.

Indeed, I think that Allan Phillips, in the concluding paragraph or so of his article, put the point very well. He said: "We need to define the enemy." I suspect this is what we are trying to do this afternoon. It is what I suspect the government should have done before it brought its legislation in, or it would not have got into so much trouble.

We need to define the enemy.

It is not our institutions; these are the very basis of our freedom. It is not the police; they are only a cross-section of the public, no less and possibly more honest in self-control. The enemy is the underworld, without and within—the undisciplined pursuit of our right to riches, the perversion of our society's principal dynamic.

It is this we are trying to protect; and it is the responsibility and the obligation of this Legislature now to go back and re-examine what the government has presented to us and withdrawn. I for one look forward to playing my part in it because I think it is a major contribution that we, as legislators, have to make to the people of Ontario.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Your Honour, we now have in this dignified House three charter members of the Attorney General's club, one active and two past members. One would have thought in the discussion of an important subject such as this that we might have heard from the two previous Attorneys General. Mr. Speaker, within the reign of the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests, who first assumed the Attorney General's portfolio on August 17, 1955, this problem confronted the people of Ontario. Then, of course, the establishment of the important body took place during the tenure of office of the previous occupant of that high and historical office (Mr. Cass).

I would have thought, sir, if they were not moved proprio motu—as we say in the law—to rise in their places and give their views on this important matter, then the head of the government might have abjured them to do so. But apparently we are going to be denied the valuable contribution of the two past Attorneys General, though it is hoped, and I make no judgment, nor do I make any prediction, that we will hear from the present incumbent of the office (Mr. Wishart) before the debate concludes.

I have this qualification, in all fairness to him, that he has occupied that office, I think, for less than a fortnight. It is less than a fortnight since he was called by the Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor of the province to assume the mantle of responsibility. If he is to make a contribution to the debate, your Honour—and I use that form of address to you again—if he is called upon to make a contribution, then it puts a very heavy burden upon him indeed, new as he must be to the department, although I do not suggest that in any way he is inhibited from hard work or is in any way denied a keen interest in the important matters that now have fallen to his shoulders. I will leave it at that.

Mr. Speaker, in the Judaeo-Christian civilization, so as not to leave out the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions who is sensitive about such things—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): And a couple of the hon. member's colleagues.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, and a couple of my hon. colleagues. In the Judaeo-Christian civilization the doctrine and the phenomenon of conversion is an important aspect of it. I draw attention to it. The one that has occurred in this House—I especially draw attention to that conversion. I did not really intend to, Mr. Speaker, but I was moved to do so because of the remarks of my hon. friend from York South on the subject of wire tapping. He struck in my heart a grave disappointment. When I was nurtured in youth and began to pay attention to the public affairs of this province and this great country, I had come to believe that the one group in the country in the political spectrum—at all times, morning, noon and night and in the wee hours of the morning, the great defenders of civil liberties—were the socialists or those who professed to be socialists.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. member was right then and he is wrong now.

Mr. Sopha: I am wrong now, because I have become disillusioned.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. members are both wrong.

Mr. Sopha: I say categorically, above the din, that it is no place of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition, Mr. Speaker, to advocate any measure in this House or anywhere else, that detracts from the civil liberties and the fundamental freedoms and the rights of the citizens. That is the responsibility of those that have the privilege of advising the monarch and her representatives. When they make such a recommendation then it becomes the duty of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition to scrutinize those measures with the greatest possible care and the strongest intelligence that they can bring to bear. And it grieves me that my hon. friend from York South gives himself leave to stand in the House as a professed socialist in the tradition of people like Frank Scott and others in this country—yes, Eugene Forsey, to name another—and to say, "I think perhaps wire tapping has become such an efficacious device that we must have it as speedily as possible."

Mr. MacDonald: I said study it.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, yes. But let me return to the hon. member's conversion. I want to read into the record. He talked at great length this afternoon, in a seemingly unrelated way. He looked into every closet in the country and he pulled out every dead cat that he could find, every smelly and odorous cat—

Mr. MacDonald: Most of them were Liberals.

Mr. Sopha:—and he said—oh, yes, most of them were Liberals; if they are not Liberals they are Tories, but they are never CCF—and he held it up for all to view. And he said, "The Police Act is in a long line of succession to such things as the enforced deportation of the Japanese and the jailing of the people in the Gouzenko spy trial," and so on, and he related everyone from just about the turn of the century. How they were related, the one to the other, escapes my comprehension.

Mr. MacDonald: I was closer than Burke.

Mr. Singer: If the hon. member had listened to Burke he could get some education.

Mr. MacDonald: Is that right?

Mr. Sopha: How the one was related to the other is beyond my understanding.

Mr. Singer: You listen to the NDP council and give no respect to Burke.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What riding does he represent?

Mr. Singer: Bristol.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): He left Bristol for—

Mr. Speaker: I would remind the members that the member for Sudbury has the floor.

Mr. Sopha: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You were always one of my greatest friends and supporters.

An hon. member: One of the few.

Mr. Sopha: Well, if hon. members do not like the analogy of the dead cat—he rattled the skeletons in the closet. And democracy—I say to you, sir, because I know it is something you understand even if he does not—democracy never held itself up to be the epitome of perfection. Certainly it has its failings and its dislocations and its moments of forgetfulness. We are not a perfect people. But that does not mean to say for a moment, or in the wildest stretch of anyone's imagination that there is not in this country a deep-seated belief in the democratic tradition.

I venture to say in retrospect that if that Bill No. 99 debate had lasted over a period of three weeks, let us say, instead of the few short days that it did, if it had lasted for two or three weeks, then any group that was alert in this country could have packed Maple Leaf Gardens with people who came there to protest. You could not get Canadians or residents of Ontario or Toronto to come to a meeting about public housing and protest. You could not get them out to listen to speakers on pensions, but let some government in arbitrary fashion interfere with the democratic rights of Canadians and Maple Leaf Gardens would not hold the crowd that would come there.

Now I return, and I am going to leave it at this, but I feel obliged to read it into the record—my hon. friend's early attitude. I do not intend to speak about Bill No. 99, but I am going to relate his early attitude to it. On March 20 this year, the day after that bill was introduced in the House, he had this to say:

Mr. Speaker, I shall not abuse the privilege you have given me—that was a change for him:

I just want to say two or three things.

that is a change, too:

One, the spectacle we have seen on the government side in the last day or so is a pretty unseemly one and it is obvious that the government itself, at least at this hour, recognizes it. The second, and equally important point, is that I hope we are not going to play politics with this issue. While I agree that it is desperately serious that the basic rights of individuals should be threatened in the fashion that they were, there is another threat that is almost as great.

Mr. MacDonald: Hear, hear, exactly; and I repeat it now.

Mr. Sopha: Continuing:

As the Royal commission says, there is another government in operation in the province and it is the government of organized crime. I hope that the government will pursue with continued vigour an alternative, and an acceptable proposition as, obviously, what they have presented is not acceptable.

Mr. MacDonald: Wonderful statement!

Mr. Sopha: And further:

So the initial onus is on them to come up with an acceptable proposition as to how we can cope with the frustrations that we have experienced in the last year or so, in both court and Royal commission, in trying to get all the facts.

Now hearken to this! I arrive at the ultimate of his remarks which demonstrate his conclusion. I ask every hon. member to listen to these remarks:

Let us not lose sight of this almost equally important problem, because in the long run it is a threat to the welfare of the community. I am just a little saddened by the willingness to play politics on the part of some people who a year ago were desperately disturbed with organized crime and now have forgotten about it completely.

Mr. MacDonald: It is a very good statement, I would not change a word of it.

Mr. Sopha: Anyone can see that on Friday, March 20, Mr. Speaker, he did not know just where he stood, and he was ready to get up and point the finger of accusation at the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Oliver) and accuse him of playing politics. But then over the weekend, of course, as happens so frequently when he makes an utterance in this House, the council meets and they decide the position he has taken is not tenable. On Monday, the man who can make the right hand turn on the road to Damascus, like Saul of Tarsus, quicker than any other man in public office, on Monday he was changed; he and the lion from St. George by that time were soulmates; they wrapped themselves in the Union Jack, and he got up in the House and he pilloried and he bludgeoned and he blustered, and then he was out into the public and was willing to take credit for the withdrawal of the bill. Thursday he was a different fellow though.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a small point of information. The hon. member would like to be informed that there was no meeting of the council of the New Democratic Party that weekend at all.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): They did not have to meet to tell the hon. member.

Mr. Sopha: They communicate by phone. Now I want to say, and I will get this business of wire tapping out of the way. The principle, Mr. Speaker, is this: we are not concerned really, no one in this House and no one in the province of Ontario who thinks about it at all is concerned really, about the rights of criminals. Other than the right to a fair trial, the right to be treated in accordance with human dignity when they are apprehended and incarcerated, criminals have no rights, they have no rights at all. It is the law-abiding people who have rights. Neither I nor any other member of this House has any sympathy for the criminal which would inhibit us from tapping the telephone lines of a person who is carrying on anti-social or lawless behaviour. What we are concerned about is the innocent, the good citizen, the law-abiding citizen, against whom one of these devices might be turned. He is the subject of our worry.

Mr. MacDonald: For a lawyer, that is a specious argument.

Mr. Sopha: Not at all.

Mr. Singer: The speciousness is in the hon. member.

Mr. Sopha: It is a problem when one starts to infringe upon the right to privacy. The problem always is, can you trust the people who exercise these powers to exercise them in accordance with just principles? That is the problem.

Now I say this, that the responsibility is not for the hon. member for York South to advocate in this House or anywhere else that we engage upon a programme of wire tapping.

Mr. MacDonald: I said there should be a study of it.

Mr. Sopha: Let the hon. Attorney General or the hon. leader of the government of Ontario lay before us a measure which conveys the deep thinking of the government, and we will scrutinize it. And if it is responsible, if that measure contains safeguards to the rights, liberties and freedoms of people, then they will find in a responsible way that it will get support from all sides of the House. Now I leave it at that.

Now then, I want to make some reference to the remarks addressed to the House this afternoon by the hon. Prime Minister, who launched this discussion. One got the impression—and I hope he would not think it unkind of me, because I would not want to be unkind to him or seem to be unkind—but one got the impression that he so protracted his remarks that he was almost beating a deadline, somebody else's deadline. But it can be said—and I listened carefully to what he said—that his remarks were couched to the utmost in the sanguine characteristic, sanguinity, if you like. He is a confident man and he is an optimistic man, and he wanted to give that impression that notwithstanding what is in this awesome document here in all its 120 or 130 pages of report—not counting the appendices—that in the tradition of the man whom he succeeded, the great man from Lindsay, hon. Leslie Frost, he wanted to convey to every hon. member of the House the thought that "things are bad in Ontario from the point of view of the influx of criminal activities, but they are not really so bad. And we are alert, and we are vigilant, and we are going to take the proper steps to put these lawbreakers behind bars and we are able to thank our lucky stars or someone—providence or someone else—that though organized crime has come into the province, we have no syndicated problem."

A great emphasis on semantics, great emphasis. That was started by the hon. Mr. Justice Roach, who drew a distinction between the two types of the organizational aspect of criminal activity. Well, I do not know that we need to be so thankful, and if we are going to give thanks and move a vote of appreciation, we on our side of the House are going to move that vote to that great citizen of this province, the former leader of our party, who had the courage to stand in the place where I now stand and to draw the attention of the public of Ontario to the threat that was posed against the very life's blood of our existence by the evil people that would drain it dry.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I just ask the hon. member a question? I have various comments on what the then leader of the Opposition in those days did, but I have not heard any comment upon what happened to his allegations of dishonesty and all sorts of things against various people in this government. That part of the result of his comments does not seem to be mentioned very frequently.

Mr. Singer: How about the rest of the comment that the Attorney General and the hon. Prime Minister denied, all the way down the line until he was forced to call a Royal commission?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: What about all the allegations of dishonesty?

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Why did they resign?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order! I would like to tell the members once again that when a member is speaking, the others are to listen in silence unless they have a point of order. Now please keep the debate in order.

Mr. Singer: That is a good thing even for the hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Sargent: The hon. member for Sudbury should answer the question, why did they resign?

Mr. Sopha: Perhaps I will say this to the hon. Prime Minister, that if he wishes to address some questions to Mr. Wintermeyer about allegations that he made or may not have made, I do not take the responsibility to answer for him; perhaps the hon. Prime Minister would write him a letter.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: The hon. member takes the part he likes and leaves the part he does not like.

Mr. Sopha: It is all I need do because this problem transcends, and has always transcended, individuals; this is the problem of the infiltration into our society of a large group of people who are a threat to our very existence.

The origin of the Roach commission as well as this report can be found if it needs to find a place for its genesis, Mr. Speaker, in this paragraph of the vote of confidence moved against this government:

This House regrets that this government has failed deplorably to recognize the peril of the inroads of organized crime into the life of Ontario and has failed to protect the citizens of this province from the activities of the criminal and the anti-social.

That was the beginning because, during that summer of 1961 an Attorney General (Mr. Roberts) who came to that office, as I said, in the height of summer of 1955, when he had come to the office—I well recall it although I was not in active political life at that time—I recall that Attorney General showed an absolute fetish, an obsession, about deaths on our highways. When he came to the office he was going to stamp out the problems that had been created by the motor vehicle and for months the papers were full of what he was going to do to correct this, to allay this slaughter on our highways. During the succeeding half-decade, of course, that evil people with their tentacles of threat to our society were coming into our province, the Attorney General and, I suppose, as well, his officials in the department, had their heads buried in the sand.

Then we come to the summer of 1961 when I myself had a few things to say, and I do not take back any of them. Everything that I said was borne out. During that summer, the same Attorney General paraded about this province saying that there was no threat of organized crime; that the police with their alertness would keep all this under check. He denied the need for a Royal commission and I recall with some sardonic humour, the delight of the MacPherson cartoons which depicted that man during that summer. Then the chips came down, Mr. Speaker, in the session of 1961, the fall session, when Mr. Wintermeyer detailed his findings, his investigations on the floor of this House.

Then, of course, I do not need to repeat what other hon. members have said during the course of the afternoon, that there is a dichotomy, there is a contradiction between this report that was signed January 31 of this year and the report that was delivered to the Lieutenant-Governor less than a year ago by the honourable Mr. Justice Roach. At page 117 of this report, where it lists the areas of criminal activity into which inroads have been made by organized crime, in categories one to eight running through narcotics and gambling and counterfeiting and high-grading and armed robberies and prostitution and extortion, intimidation and protection and frauds of the so-called white collar variety; I say, with truth, that ever since mankind became stained with original sin, that is just about a complete list of everything criminal and illegal that mankind has ever invented.

That is just about it. You could not devise another category of crime which has not been found by this police commission in some degree of organization.

So that is our mess of pottage. That is our inheritance at this time as we try to discuss this matter with some degree of intelligence and reason in this House tonight.

I say to hon. members, to sum up this part of my argument, Mr. Speaker, that this report gave no cause to the hon. leader of this government to stand in the House as he did this afternoon and appear to be sanguine and confident about the outlook.

Now, sir, having said that, I want to go on. I want to go on and say this: I too am going to make some suggestions, according to my training as a lawyer and according to what I feel I may have learned and the little experience I have had. But before doing that I want to say that I shall take upon myself the responsibility to try to get this discussion back to what I believe to be its proper plane of reason and out of the realm of inflammation where it has gone. I well recognize, and I so state, that on all sides of the House there is a concern about the problem. Every hon. member feels very deeply—

Mr. Bryden: We could not conclude from listening to the hon. member up to now that he is interested in reason.

Mr. Sopha: Unfortunately, I am sad to say, that before I take my train tonight, in duty I will stay here and I will probably have to listen to you. That will keep me awake most of the night. Most of the night, on the train. I find it difficult to sleep anyway, on trains.

Mr. Bryden: I attend all sessions of this House; perhaps I will speak tomorrow rather than tonight.

Mr. Sopha: Well, the hon. member is a full-time politician.

Mr. MacDonald: Where was the hon. member when we were dealing with important issues, in his law office?

Mr. Sopha: A full-time politician! We in this House are not subsidized or assisted on this side by anyone else to be a full-time politician.

Mr. Bryden: And neither am I.

Mr. Sopha: If I might add a word to what my hon. colleague, the hon. member for Downsview, so well said about the role—rather of the office—of the Attorney General in this province. I, sir, stipulate it as fundamental in dealing with organized crime and criminals and bringing them to justice that the office of the Attorney General must immediately become staffed with competent lawyers, a whole staff of them. Senior counsel, people trained as counsel; people under the direction, within that department, of a senior counsel, a man of ability and learning and experience.

Now I am not saying, as the hon. member for Downsview said, that the people in the department now are not competent, but I do hasten to add that there are not enough of them. They are a sturdy and small band and as he pointed out—we have for four years, I think, pointed out—that the salary schedule in that department could not possibly attract anyone that wanted to make a career in the government service as a counsel. It is a place to hang your hat for the time being and they go on to greener fields after having gotten a bit of training.

I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, and I will measure my words when I say it and I am a bit ashamed to say it, that under the present constitution of our society, when the criminal is brought to indictment that he, sir, can avail himself of the finest legal minds in the province. The finest lawyers in the province appear for the criminal. The Crown, the Queen, the government, The Attorney General's Department ought to be represented in the role of prosecutor for the Crown by the finest lawyer in the province on the staff of the Attorney General.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sopha: When an indictment is brought, such as was brought against Feeley, McDermott and Wright, or an indictment against Harry and Ben Smith, then it ought to be a counsel of The Attorney General's Department who appears in the place of and in the stead of the Attorney General to prosecute him and not a member of some law firm down on Bay Street.

I could go on and become more specific about the prosecution of the first trial of Wright, Feeley and McDermott, but I will inhibit myself. But in truth, for those who judge such things in terms of money, this government had no business in the world in paying for the prosecution of Feeley, Wright and McDermott the sum of $21,615 as they did.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): To the cent!

Mr. Sopha: To the cent! And in paying for the prosecution of the malefactors, Harry and Ben Smith, $82,830.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Where is he now?

Mr. Sopha: Jail is right! They could hire the best. Perhaps eight or nine lawyers and put them to work in criminal prosecutions full time.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Eight or nine months.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, a year for that. It would serve two immediate and useful purposes that come to my mind. If The Department of the Attorney General came to be staffed by a group of competent counsel, then it would strike fear and respect into the hearts of the criminal element. They would know that no matter whom they were employing, they would be met with vigorous resistance and strong prosecution when they got to court.

Second, such a calibre of counsel within The Department of the Attorney General would mean that department in its contact with the police forces and those in charge of the investigation of these crimes, such a staff of astute and intelligent lawyers could keep and exercise a supervisory role, over those charged with the investigation.

Now I do not have to spell out what I mean by that and the prophylactic effect that would have upon the activities of those charged with investigations. I do not think a moment should be lost in the inauguration of such a system within the office of the Attorney General. I have said so before in this House over the years. I hope to say again and I hope to be in this House when a common-sense principle such as that is adopted, and indeed the practice of the United Kingdom in that regard for more than two centuries is followed.

The institution of Treasury counsel is of great antiquity, a position of great honour, indeed a position of great prestige for the lawyers who go to court to represent the government. I say of The Attorney General's Department, in prosecuting the lawless, goes down to Bay Street and hires a member of a big prestigious firm there, then the government really is not in court. It is not the government that is in court at all, directly. The government, the Crown, the people, society, can only be in court defending our laws and upholding and maintaining prestige and respect for them, if the Attorney General is in court. But, Mr. Speaker, if the Attorney General is not there, then one of his counsel, in his stead working for him, employed by him, must be there in his place and not some other.

To borrow the words of my hon. friend from Simcoe East (Mr. Letherby)—

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Could I ask the hon. member a question? If the criminals he has just mentioned can hire the highest-priced counsel and the most capable and are well taken care of in court by such counsel, then why can he say on the other hand, that if the Attorney General gets the best counsel available, he and the government he represents are not well represented in court?

Mr. Sopha: I want the best counsel to be on the staff of the Attorney General, to report to him regularly and daily. Perhaps in the prosecution of these people, in The Department of the Attorney General there would be a meeting every morning at a quarter to nine, in that magnificent library at the end of the hall, around the big table. The Attorney General and his staff would meet there in the morning, and they would discuss the prosecutions that are presently at bar in the courts.

Mr. Singer: And not next week be defending the criminal—

Mr. Sopha: Yes, as my hon. friend from Downsview says, the man hired by the Attorney General to prosecute, the next week is working for the criminals. He is hired by them.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Could I ask the hon. member again? As a member of the legal profession has he not one day or one week perhaps defended a criminal and the next day or the next week defended someone on the opposite side of the case?

Mr. Sopha: No, I have never prosecuted anyone in my life. I am a defence lawyer.

Hon. Mr. Crossman: And he is a QC.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The hon. member is always a defence lawyer?

Mr. Sopha: That does not detract from my point, which is a valid one. I have to repeat it for the benefit of some.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: I will not bother to repeat it. I have made the point.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Sopha: One of the things that bothered me in the recent action of the Law Society of Upper Canada, of which I am a member, was their calling into question the activities of certain members of the legal profession, because I like to try to see things analytically—I like to try to see the whole picture, not just part of it—they called into question the activities of certain lawyers and found them to be guilty of unethical conduct in that they associated with criminals beyond what the responsibilities of being their solicitors or their counsel required.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: And rightly so!

Mr. Sopha: Yes. They found them to be guilty of unethical conduct in that regard. Well, when the hon. Attorney General says rightly so, perhaps he will agree with me that there is an all-pervading question there about where do you draw the line? Where do you draw the line?

Mr. MacDonald: There is no doubt where they drew the line.

Mr. Sopha: Yes. True. Perhaps these people did associate too much with their clients, but really, here is one the hon. Attorney General might take home to go to sleep on.

If a person is defending a criminal who engaged in the sale of narcotics, or gambling, or bookmaking, or prostitution and so on, I suppose one might say that is pretty bad. But what if the lawyer is engaged in the defence of someone charged under the anti-combines Act and that client takes the lawyer to dinner at the National Club, or the Granite Club, or the York Club—

Mr. G. H. Peck (Scarborough Centre): Or the Albany Club!

Mr. Sopha: Or the Albany, yes. Then on the one hand I suppose the conduct of the association with the bookmaker is proscribed, but it is all right for the person who runs the combine to take the lawyer to one of these clubs or invite him for a fishing weekend at his farm and let him view his herd of Black Angus cattle. That would be all right. I wonder myself, because not only am I a lawyer, but I am a member of this Legislature, sir. I wonder if the Law Society of Upper Canada thought about this problem through to its ultimate and necessitous conclusion before it gave the ruling on that subject. Well, that is enough about lawyers.

Another problem that I want to draw attention to, which has been lightly touched upon in this House this afternoon, is the problem of the amalgamation of police forces and the increasing of the efficiency of the police forces which we have. As a result of my reflection, your Honour, I come to this conclusion. I have held this conclusion for more months than some people might believe. It is that I think that with the Ontario Provincial Police we have to come to a state of affairs where that police force acquires the sole responsibility for the investigation of serious crime in the province. I qualify that by saying quickly that one might leave out Metro, the Metropolitan Toronto area, which has a large and efficient police force and indeed a police force which is larger in number and better paid, I must say, than the Ontario Provincial Police force itself.

But on the other hand, throughout the province and in the smaller centres and in those centres where we know that organized crime flourishes as well as it does in Metro, because this report says so, I do not see that there is any efficacy in leaving investigation and law enforcement in the hands of municipal police forces. For one thing, municipal police forces, and this ought to clinch it, have not got the scientific facilities that the Ontario Provincial Police have to detect crime in its modern form.

I have always thought it rather silly that if a homicide, for example, occurred in an unorganized township, the next day there would appear on the scene an inspector from the CIB. But if, on the other hand, the homicide was within an organized municipality, no matter how large or how small, no matter whether it was the town of Capreol or the city of Sudbury, as long as there was a municipal police force, the Ontario Provincial Police apparently are without jurisdiction to handle it. It was left in the hands of the municipal force, with its limited facilities for investigation, detection and prosecution.

I say this, I can put it in a nutshell. We can leave to municipal forces, if we have to have them, the matter of the regulation of highway traffic and such things as arresting drunks—arresting drunks which, sad to say, they do with tremendous facility, only they pick the places where they arrest drunks. They arrest all the drunks in the part of town where the lower economic orders live, where the people without much money live. That is where they arrest the drunks; they do not arrest them outside golf clubs and curling clubs and other places; none from there. A very selective law.

But we can leave those things with the municipal forces and put the responsibility for the enforcement of the Criminal Code in the hands of the Ontario Provincial Police, which would then become a greatly expanded force, a much more effective force in the administration of justice in this province.

There may be some who do not know that the government of this province tomorrow, tomorrow as far as I am concerned, could say to the federal government at Ottawa, "Come and enforce your own statute; bring your mounted police in here, we are getting out of the field." We might have to pay for the mounted police to come here, but constitutionally the Criminal Code is a federal statute and the provincial government could say to the federal government, "You come and enforce your own statute, do not ask us," because section 92 of The British North America Act does not say anything about the enforcement of the criminal law. It gives to the province the responsibility for the administration of justice which is an entirely different concept from strict enforcement of the law. But there must, I feel—and this is the second branch of my argument—there must soon come a time when we dispose of and dispense with the small police forces in this province.

Recently, the reeve of North Grimsby wrote us a letter and he pointed out to us that within a radius of ten miles, ten miles of his home, there were no fewer than seven different police forces. No fewer than seven. We must, I say, do away with those smaller and inefficient forces and replace them with Ontario Provincial Police so as to reduce greatly the number of departments working in this province and increase the efficiency that the smaller administrative unit would thus entail.

I think, Mr. Speaker, it is so plain a proposition that the government ought not to hesitate to embark upon it, because truth to tell, the only way in which we are going to combat these crafty and clever and evil people that are the subject-matter of this report, is to meet them with intelligence and efficiency, with unity, with forces that are of manageable proportions and able to combat them.

I do not want to leave it without saying that I agree wholeheartedly with what I believe to be the philosophy of this government in regard to control of police forces. I believe it to be their philosophy from the printed utterances, and I say this: I will never support any proposition while I am in public life, I will never support any proposition in a democracy that removes the control of the police forces of this province from the political heads. It is fundamental to democracy.

I vehemently and entirely disagree with that recommendation of the police commission found in this report which is put in a very high place. Let me read it to show you that with which I disagree. I quote:

I will never support that proposition. The police force, the police arm, in a democracy is much too fearsome a weapon that the day should ever come that the Attorney General or the head of the government might stand in his place in this House and say with impunity, when the abuse of police power is called to his attention, that, "the member knows that the police are under the control of an independent commission, I will get the answer tomorrow for him. I will ask the head of that independent commission."

No, sir. The police are too powerful a weapon to be used at the behest of the unscrupulous, that our democratic tradition could not tolerate such an answer from the Attorney General. Sir, the Attorney General must, at all times, be responsible for police action and if there is an abuse of police power then the reply the Attorney General makes is that "I have looked into that matter and I have found that (a), (b), (c) and (d) have been guilty of a gross abuse of their powers and I have suspended them." That is the proper democratic answer. That is the answer that is consistent with the philosophy of parliamentary government as the tradition to be found in the United Kingdom over these 200, 300 or 400 years, which I hope will continue to be the tradition in this province and in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with all of those remarks made by my friend, the hon. member for York South and those of the hon. member for Downsview about civil liberties and the threat to them that comes on the one hand from evil and the lawless and on the other from the misuse of arbitrary power that was granted by a government. I agree with Thomas Jefferson when he said: "I have a right to nothing that another has a right to take away."

So our problem as we discuss this—and I have advocated two areas in which I think that we might join the fight with great alacrity and greater vigour against the lawbreakers—our problem is a dichotomy. I recognize it and in conclusion I want to pitch my tent on higher ground. I want to look over at the hon. leader of the government and say to him as man to man and gentleman to gentleman, that in dealing with this problem, in attempting to combat it, I say to him in a spirit of friendliness, let us get away from the realm of frenzy, let us get away from the atmosphere of panic, let us keep it on the plane of reason. Most of all, I say to the hon. leader of the government, the government has the responsibility first to advocate in this Legislature and this Parliament the measures that must and can and should be taken in order to combat this evil and to destroy this cancer, to turn the searing rays of radium upon it. As I said before, let us keep it out of the realm of inflammation, out of the realm of emotion. I say to the hon. member for York South, let us not liken it to everything bad that has happened in our history before because we have a great society here.

And finally, I say to them through you, Mr. Speaker, that if they exercise their strong intelligences that I know them to have, if they approach it in a spirit of moderation and devise some type of legislation that can combat this—and most of all, when they introduce it in the House, do not introduce it, I say to them, the way the former Attorney General introduced that Bill No. 99, but come to us and make an explanation and say: "Here is what we propose and here are the reasons and here is why we think we need the exercise of these powers."

Take it out of the realm of emotion and frenzy and lack of reason. Come that way and we will examine it, we will examine what is needed in this province and we will examine it as gentlemen would. We will turn our analytical powers upon it and our experiences and try to do the right thing. We will all join battle; all of us, on every side of the House, will join battle and we will say to these people that make the creation of that report a necessary thing, we will say in a unified voice as if we were a veritable coalition, we will say: "Look, you people, you are not coming into this province and exercising your lawless activity, you are not going to beat Bluestein in the centre of our city downtown here, you are not going into the house of the Clergyman Hord."

Is that forgotten? That the hoodlums went into Hord's house and beat him and his wife because they had mistaken the identity of the people they wanted?

We will say to those people with a strong and united voice that this is a decent society in Ontario and people as individuals have a right to keep the law and enforce obedience to it. We will not tolerate the activities of any that either were born and grew up here or any who come from outside as aliens into our society and seek to warp it and torture it and bend it and pervert it. We will keep this society in Ontario strong and free, governed by lawful people of dignity and reason.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Mr. Speaker, I unfortunately am not a lawyer. In some ways unfortunately, because I wish I could speak with the abilities of my two hon. colleagues here who practise in the law, and could have the sense that they have with respect to both defending and prosecuting criminals, the experience that they have had. But I am just an ordinary citizen from the riding of Dovercourt and as I have looked at this situation, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the dilemma that the government has had to face—and I think the hon. Prime Minister has expressed it—on the one hand he has had to face the serious threat of organized crime, as a government he has had to face this, and on the other hand he has had to face the necessity of protecting the ancient rights of the people of any British Commonwealth country, the people of this country.

I would like to briefly deal with both sides of this and I am going to take the first aspect, that of facing the threats of organized crime, because I feel, sir, this is where the government has given priority in connection with this balance. I feel they certainly gave complete, almost hysterical, priority to the threat of organized crime when they brought forward the bill which they did.

Now what I would like to say is that we have heard the hon. Prime Minister, when he was talking about the threat of organized crime, emphasize a number of times that he was going to be, and that he always was, with respect to protecting the individuals from crime, ever vigilant, I think was the term he used; ever vigilant and ever alert to the protection of the people in respect to having a strenuous and vigorous police action.

I would ask: if you are a hunter can you really shoot a bird if you do not see it? I say this because as we look back on the situation of a government ever alert and ever vigilant, can they really be ever alert and ever vigilant to organized crime when we have a situation of a man who is the official guardian of the protection of the people against crime, telling us not so long ago that there was no organized crime? In saying this, if I am using the quoted remarks that he might have made to the press, I apologize, but I just suggest that there seem to be a great number of misquoted remarks in connection with his emphasis on the fact that there was no organized crime in Ontario.

So my first point is, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Prime Minister of this government suggesting that they have been ever vigilant in the protection of the people rings somewhat hollow when on the other side of the fence you hear the official guardian of the protection of the people suggesting that there was no organized crime, or being misquoted on a number of occasions as saying there was no organized crime.

So what do we see with respect to this ever-vigilant approach? We see, for example, as we look through previous Hansards, that there has been the suggestion that the soul of crime is organized gambling. Yet we see that the charter of one club which was obviously a centre of organized gambling for 19 years was permitted to continue. For 19 years, when the police of this province wanted the club to be closed down, when the deputy Minister of the hon. Provincial Secretary's (Mr. Yaremko's) department made requests that the charter should be rescinded. I am talking about the Atlas Club and referring to the report that was made both in the Roach commission and the reports in Hansard in connection with it.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Is it operating now?

Mr. Thompson: I am talking about the 19 years in which it did operate.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Is it operating now?

Mr. Thompson: I have never attended it, but I would certainly hope that by now it is not operating. But I would say that if this is the ever-vigilant approach, then I think again it would ring hollow. We look again at the approach that has taken place with respect to becoming aware of the dangers of crime, and I think again to a man who is no longer in this House. I think that in the light of the contribution that he has made, and the contribution that he could make, I think perhaps the people of Ontario will be having second thoughts in connection with the way that they did vote, in that there was a man who suffered gibes and jeers for a courageous stand; a man who is the cause, the cause of this whole situation being brought before the floor of this House; a man who is the cause of getting a lethargic and apathetic, a government with ineptitude, to suddenly size up that there is organized crime and they have to do something about it. That man, as I know everyone in this House recognizes, is John Wintermeyer.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thompson: After the government was forced into having a report—and I say that with great sincerity and I think that a previous Attorney General sitting across from me on the government benches will recognize that the commission was one into which he had to be pushed—into accepting the fact that it should take place.

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): Tell us how they operate in Ireland. That would be really helpful here. Tell us how they operate over there.

Mr. Singer: That is as relevant as the speeches the hon. Minister made during the crisis.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well, all right, he is an Irishman.

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate that in many other areas we may have a warmth of sympathy, but at the moment I am not talking as an Irishman talking to the representative of St. Patrick, I am talking of a situation that applied in Ontario.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thompson: That is the problem. Is there—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: May I ask the hon. member a question? The hon. member has spoken before about the position of Mr. Wintermeyer and the Royal commission and the Roach commission. Is it not true that in making his speech he made accusations against individuals which were found in the report to be inaccurate? Is this not correct? Was this not part of his reason in asking for a Royal commission?

I read the terms of reference of that commission this afternoon and in the findings of Mr. Justice Roach, I refer to page 10, Mr. Wintermeyer in his speech said that he accused no one. I do not so read his speech. I am only asking if Mr. Wintermeyer was not motivated by something other than the tremendous lofty ideals that are given to him by the hon. member in his remarks to this House. After all, there was more in the Royal—

Mr. Singer: This is a speech.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I am asking the question—

Mr. Bryden: I would be glad to answer the—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I listen to quite a few long questions—occasionally I like to ask one.

Mr. Singer: Yes, but Mr. Speaker, alas, comes to the hon. Prime Minister's aid.

Mr. Thompson: Sir, I would be quite happy to answer that and I wish I could pull this from it, Mr. Speaker. I am quoting from Mr. Wintermeyer himself in Hansard of 1961. He says:

Mr. Speaker, the essence of the speech I made was that there was organized crime in Ontario.

The essence, Mr. Speaker, of the misquoted remarks by the then Attorney General who was representing the whole approach of the government was, and as I say it may be misquoted, that there was not organized crime in Ontario. Because of this, sir, I say again that the people of Ontario thanked the leader of the Liberal Party during that period for the courageous fight he had made in waking the conscience of this government to finally take some action.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I have already had one question which I think turned into a statement. Knowing that my hon. friend also suffers from the same tendencies as I do I think I will wait until later for his question.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I wish only to say to the hon. member that I owe him one long question.

Mr. Thompson: Sir, let me continue, if I may. As I say, the question that the leader of my party at that time raised was to find out if the government recognized that there was organized crime in Ontario. Let me quote what Mr. Wintermeyer said after the Roach commission came before the House:

Now that we have the report, what are we going to do about it? Are we going to wait for another 20 years and simply have a repetition of this sort of thing—

By that I mean lethargy and ineptitude and blindness on the part of people to recognize organized crime—that is my quote, incidentally. I continue with Mr. Wintermeyer's words:

—or has the report served its purpose and has it put into the hearts and minds the conviction that this demands action and immediate action?

That, sir, was said by Mr. Wintermeyer in 1963, on March 27, in this House.

"Ever vigilant," says the hon. Prime Minister after he sees that organized crime is in the province. Then what does he do? He listens to a police commission, to study and to look into the report that was made. And so we wait again with respect to getting immediate action. We are still waiting for immediate action.

Sir, I say this, that the police commission in this report, it seems to me, has shown that there has not been an approach of "ever vigilant". I say this because the police commission—and it has been enunciated much more ably by my friend, the hon. member for Sudbury—as I have read the suggestions it makes, sir, is obviously suggesting that we need to have many efforts. It enunciates a number of them and I will not go through them. I hope that people have read the commission report. It has also been explained and elaborated by others. But it is quite clear that if we are to be ever vigilant, we need to take some action to get a more effective and a more able police force.

We need to have other approaches made. Therefore I say, why have we not had that before? If the hon. Prime Minister of the province is telling us that he is ever vigilant of the protection of the rights of the citizens against crime, why are we waiting, sir, until this date when we have a report to debate remedial action in order that we can have proper protection against crime? Why were not some of these measures done before?

I think if you read the report, for example, and I will do that if you like, I will go through it myself—but I think my hon. friend has enunciated and I will not go into it in detail. As a simple fellow from Dovercourt, as I read this report—I am not a lawyer, sir, so that I cannot dwell on the innuendoes in connection with it—one thing that struck me was, why do we have a report that goes in for such definitions of semantics? I could not help thinking, sir, of what would have happened to Mr. Blustein as he lay there beaten up at the Town Tavern, if the Attorney General had happened to approach him at the time. I could see the Attorney General leaning over his battered body and saying to him, "Remember, it is not organized crime, it is syndicated crime. It is syndicated crime."

Is that a comfort to the people who are the victims of crime to know the semantic approach? Let us get on with the job. That is what we have been asking.

An hon. member: Tell us how to do it.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Thompson: I think the police commission has made some suggestions and I want now to talk about this other area. This is the situation that has taken place. I would say this, that in connection with the better protection of the individual from crime, it has been a hollow call from the hon. Prime Minister, standing up here and bleating ever vigilance. But we hope it will have a stronger sound to it in connection with action after this debate.

Sir, as we come to the other area, let us see the kind of approach taken by those people who felt there was no organized crime, even though they were misquoted, those men who felt there was no organized crime. Calm, capable men, feeling the sense of the responsibility of government—what did they do? They had the dilemma that the hon. Prime Minister said he was faced with. He said on the one hand, "There is the threat of crime and I must protect the people." On the other hand he said, and he had emotion in his voice, as though it went right through his sinews, "The thing that I will never stand for, will be that the rights of any citizen in Ontario will be in any way trampled on." And yet, sir, he hugged to his bosom for as long as he could, a bill that was repugnant to every civilized, democratic country in this hemisphere.

I, sir, felt there might be some reason for this. I have thought, why have men such as the hon. Prime Minister, who personally is a very decent person, in public office given me the opportunity to question whether they understand the true meaning of democratic rights? And I said, why, sir, would he hang on to this abhorrent bill? I say this, because I find this situation—

Mr. Speaker: I would advise the member now that we are really not talking about the bill. I realize that the bill arose out of this report and it has some relevancy, but I would ask the member to try to confine his remarks to the order that is before the House, and that is the consideration of this report. So, if he would leave the bill until it goes to the committee, it will be discussed in its entirety and also when it comes back to the House. I would rather he would leave that part of his remarks until that time.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I always respect your advice to me. I also would like to follow the remarks that were made by the hon. Prime Minister, whom I noticed you did not ask to sit down when he mentioned that he had this dilemma. These were his opening remarks. On one hand, he said, we had the dilemma of trying to protect individuals against the present crime. I have dealt with that. And now, if I could deal with the other statement of the hon. Prime Minister, that he said that we will always—"I personally will see that the rights of individuals will never be trampled on". In view of the hon. Prime Minister's having introduced this important area of discussion of the bill and recognizing your advice to me, I will continue with respect to this latter point to be discussed.

Sir, I wonder if, in respect to the abandonment of these great principles that have been in our democracy, I wonder, sir, if we could not have an analogy with a situation of the great general who recently died. I am speaking of General MacArthur, a great general. And yet General MacArthur, when he was fighting in Korea and needing the troops there, there was also a small man in a sense—but a great man, because he understood democratic principles. I am speaking of President Truman. No matter the expertise of a general. The President knew that the general had to answer to the political powers. President Truman told General MacArthur: "You do not advance further." Somehow, sir, I feel that this has been the problem in connection with this bill. It has been that these men and other generals and other magistrates, or the magistrate and a policeman, somehow, sir, they, like General MacArthur in their eagerness and enthusiasm, wanted to advance into China in connection with battling crime. But the test of a government of representative people was to stand up to the enthusiasm of these men and tell them: "You are going too far." I, sir, suggest that the administrators took over from the representatives of the people. That is the only explanation I can make.

I, sir, say this, that we have seen, and the hon. Prime Minister has said, that this government will always respect the rights of the individual. I presume, sir, he feels that having brushed an Attorney General aside and had an Attorney General resign and a new Attorney General come in, that all will be forgiven and we will assume a new faith on the part of the government. But I would like to emphasize, sir, because all this is part of this discussion, that the men on those Cabinet benches, on those Treasury benches, collectively, are responsible for the philosophy and the attitude that took place in connection with this overdrastic approach in presenting the police bill—all of them.

And if I could suggest this, sir, there seems to be irony in it.

It is irony in this way: I was looking through some of Hansard before. It is rather like a history of the wives of Henry the Eighth—Catharine of Aragon and Anne Boleyn. Some beheaded, some divorced, and so on. But let me go back to Catharine of Aragon. The Attorney General from St. Patrick, no longer the Attorney General, but the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests, Mr. Speaker. I disagreed with him in many things in connection with his period as Attorney General but I suspect it may be because of the Irish tradition that he inherited. I suspect that he, sir, was one who quickened to the need for the rights of the individual. I suspect this from having watched him as that bill was presented, and from remarks that he had made himself in connection with a book by Mr. Keaton, I think it was. He was talking then about tribunals and the rights of the individual and having a proper procedure.

But he was no longer the Attorney General. They had removed him and put another man in there. I think, sir, that the irony is that this later man is probably—among that Cabinet group there—one who strongly opposed the abhorrent parts of that bill. He came out and told the press, "This is terrible; this is new." And he told them the kind of thing that would be approached and I suspect there had been an argument in Cabinet and he was told, "You put that bill through," and he came out and said, "These are the things that are wrong with the bill." Because how could a man who is as intelligent as the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Cass) and as politically astute as he is, tell all this to the press and then present it? To me, that is political suicide. I think he was forced by other Cabinet members to present that bill.

So, sir, the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas has gone. The hon. Minister of Lands and Forests is no longer there and I think that he, sir, as Attorney General would have stood against this. What is the situation in connection with what the hon. Prime Minister said about the balance between the threat and the aspect of preserving the rights of the individual? The men who are least guilty in connection with it have been dismissed or have been moved to another position and the men in the Cabinet who are really responsible, still sit there.

May I say, sir—and I am not going to go into this at length—once again, as the hon. member for Sudbury has said, Mr. Speaker, we have strongly emphasized that there should be efficient and aggressive action in connection with tackling crime, but I would also suggest that in connection with the rights of individuals, we believe, as has been said on a number of occasions before, the rights of the individual are paramount to the threat of crime.

Let me put it as a British Prime Minister did—and I have used this quote before, because it struck me that a British Prime Minister, William Pitt, in the 18th century, could give you advice on this. William Pitt said: "Necessity is the plea for every infringement of human freedom. It is the argument of tyrants. It is the creed of slaves." I am going to repeat that, because I had hoped that this might sink into those people who are suffering the dilemma of the threat of crime and preserving the rights of the individual. Let me repeat what William Pitt, one of the youngest Prime Ministers of Great Britain, said in the early 18th century: "Necessity is the plea for every infringement of human freedom. It is the argument of tyrants. It is the creed of slaves."

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, three of the five speakers who have participated in this debate are lawyers. I think it appropriate, sir, that lawyers should give us the benefit of their knowledge and advice in matters of this kind. I would say that two of the three lawyers who have spoken in this debate have made useful and constructive contributions. As for the hon. member for Sudbury, who I presume, is now sleeping peacefully on the train to Sudbury—

Mr. Oliver: He must have gone to sleep in a hurry if he is.

Mr. Bryden: Well, at any rate, he is not here. I can only say that his apparently irresistible tendency to add irrelevancy to irrelevancy and multiply the whole by irresponsibility, greatly limits the usefulness of the contributions which I think his ability would otherwise lead him to make.

Mr. Oliver: That is about as clear as mud.

Mr. Bryden: I would like to say to all of the lawyers who have spoken, and to any others who may be interested, that whereas we welcome their contributions in discussing matters of this kind and benefit from them, I think that it might be in order if they looked to their own profession. I would like to refer, Mr. Speaker, to pages 38 and 39 of the report of the police commission, as follows:

A lawyer in Ontario whose name he did not know is a member also of Cosa Nostra, Valachi said. We obtained from him—

"We", that is the commission:

—obtained from him further information which enabled us to be reasonably sure of the identity of the lawyer to whom he referred.

We have not attempted an interrogation of the lawyer mentioned because of the doubt as to our powers of doing so in private session, and as Valachi's statement is based upon hearsay evidence, such an inquiry should be conducted in camera, lest serious and unjustified harm be done to a professional man's reputation. We feel obliged, however, to refer to this allegation, because Valachi did not know the lawyer personally and there was no particular reason apparently why he should volunteer such a statement.

This fact had also apparently made a deep impression on him, because he said: "I was amazed, I was shocked." And he added that he knew of no New York lawyer who was a member. The source from which he obtained the information undoubtedly convinced him as to its truth. This is one of two Ontario lawyers' names that have come to our attention as having more than a professional relationship with members of the Cosa Nostra.

Mr. Speaker, in fairness I think I should also state without quoting in detail that at another place the commission commended the profession and the Law Society of Ontario for taking prompt action with regard to certain conduct reported to them on the part of certain counsel appearing before the Roach commission.

However, to elaborate on the picture I would like now to quote briefly from an article by Allan Phillips which appeared recently in Maclean's Magazine. My hon. leader (Mr. MacDonald) quoted some extracts from this article this afternoon. I wish to quote one or two other extracts.

Some of the strongest opponents of the police on such civil rights issues appear as lawyers time and again on behalf of syndicated mobsters. They distort continuance, delaying and winning adjournments till they get the judge they want. They devise gambling club charters, set up dummy corporations and often act as fronts through whom the racketeers hold control, hiding the racket behind the lawyer-client privilege of secrecy.

In Toronto and Montreal lawyer-politicians draw large fees that buy not only their talent but their influence. These lawyers are the most important cog in the Mafia machine, the godfathers of every

North American syndicate. In Quebec City, Montreal, Hamilton, Windsor, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver, there are lawyers who hang out and holiday with the racketeers. They advise in the planning of rackets. They dictate statements in case of arrest.

The Montreal ring that pulled off the 1961 bank robbery at Havelock, Ontario, had been advised by their lawyer to dress so that no skin was showing. In a robbery in Montreal's St. Laurent suburb in 1961 the robbers drove to the bank in their lawyer's car.

A Montreal lawyer, pleading with police director Adrian Robert to reduce a gambling charge against his client, burst out, "You don't understand the rackets in this city. I am afraid, if I don't get him out I don't know what they will do to me."

Says Robert: It is not a case of a lawyer advising a client any more, it is the mob telling the lawyer what to do. He is an employee.

A Winnipeg lawyer is one of the heads of a gambling combine. A Hamilton lawyer masterminds a robbery ring. Another Hamilton lawyer is the son of a Mafia Don, well off, influential, clever, experienced.

The prosecutors in many cases are seldom as skilful as syndicate lawyers. In federal cases the prosecutors are picked by the justice department usually from the list of party acceptables. They seldom have experience in syndicated crime. The department has even put corporation lawyers on criminal cases.

Mr. Speaker, the former Attorney General, once removed, now hon. Minister of Lands and Forests has frequently expressed the view, in my memory, that we can place absolute confidence in the integrity of professionally trained men. I believe that is true in the overwhelming majority of cases; I believe that most of these professional men are men of integrity, but I can also say, Mr. Speaker, that too many people have been rooked by too many lawyers in recent years for the public to believe that it is universally the case.

I think that it is time the law society and the members thereof gave much more active consideration than they have apparently given today to ways and means of cleaning up the profession and getting some of the bad apples out of the barrel. It would certainly appear, on the basis of information provided by people who have studied this subject, that corrupt lawyers and lawyers with criminal associations are an essential part of the web of crime that exists in this province at the present time, and even worse perhaps, is threatening it in even more virulent forms in the future.

We have often heard of the mouthpiece—I think is the term that is used, in the United States. I was one of those who assumed that the mouthpiece was an institution that existed only in the United States. There is some indication that it is an institution that already exists and may be on the increase in Canada and Ontario as well as in the United States. I think there is a clear responsibility on the profession to make sure that it does not extend any further.

One of the unfortunate consequences of the government's entire handling of the problem that is now before us is that by its ineptitude—and I will use that word because I do not think anything more sinister is involved—by its ineptitude it created public apprehension on the question of civil liberties which has detracted attention from some of the very serious problems involved in the development of organized crime, and I may say in the development of petty racketeering in many fields some of which may not yet be within the ambit of organized crime, although if one can believe the reports of the police commission and others some of these other fields such as the used-car racket and the moneylending racket are frequently areas to which criminals look in expanding their activities.

There is, in my opinion, a serious inadequacy in law enforcement in these fields. The government, for reasons that are difficult to understand, has blundered in with measures that perhaps might be less effective in cleaning up the problems that we face than they would be in threatening the liberties of citizens. This has created a state of public apprehension that makes an intelligent discussion of the whole problem difficult. It has left the field wide open for demagoguery which, unfortunately, attempts to play on quite well justified public apprehensions for political purposes. In fact, as I listened to some Liberal speeches during this whole unfortunate incident, I began to wonder if some of their supporters really wanted to return to the laissez-faire philosophy of the 19th century.

That produced liberty all right—it produced liberty for the rich to ride on the backs of the poor and liberty for aggressive, predatory and unprincipled centres of economic power to prey on the rest of society. I think we have to bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that the positive state is here to stay. The state has a positive role to play in improving the conditions of individuals and in protecting individuals from interference and destruction of their liberties by irresponsible elements within society.

The hon. Prime Minister has stated this afternoon that he would never be a party to anything that destroyed civil liberties—or words to that effect; I am not purporting to quote him. I believe him. I believe that he is most sincere. He believes as sincerely in the defence of public liberties as any person in this province or this Legislature. I believe that everybody on the beaches opposite believes sincerely in liberty and in the protection of civil liberties. Yet we had legislation brought in not very long ago which I think that in their hearts of hearts they must now realize posed a genuine threat to liberty.

The hon. Prime Minister stated this afternoon that he is now in consultation with the Dean of the Law School—I believe it was, he said—to consider some of the implications of these problems. They are difficult problems and it is proper that he should discuss them with men with special knowledge in the field. I would like to suggest to him and to the government that he might also give some consideration to a resolution of which the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party has given notice, and the text of which appeared in the votes and proceedings of yesterday. I would suggest that if this House would consider that resolution and act upon the suggestions contained therein, we might develop guide lines which would be an indication to those who are drafting legislation for the House as to the lines of demarcation over which they should not extend. I think that the ideas contained in that resolution would also provide guarantees that even if legislation did inadvertently slip through this House, which threatened civil liberties, there would be remedies for the citizens.

For example, it is proposed that there should be in this province an adequate bill of rights. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that if we had a bill of rights which specifically set forth the basic political and civil rights which form part of our common law tradition, and which also declared that no statute of this Legislature unless it specifically states otherwise can be construed as contravening those basic rights, there would be a guarantee of protection so that even if the Legislature slumbered, no legislation would pass that would infringe upon our basic rights. I think it is necessary, especially as the role of the state continues to expand, and it is bound to do in areas such as are indicated in this report and in other areas. It is necessary that we consider and devise means of guaranteeing that in the development of its more positive role, the state will not infringe on basic liberties.

I will not at this late hour attempt to outline in detail some of the proposals that this group thinks should be accepted in combating the problem of organized crime and of racketeering generally, sir, without at the same time infringing on civil liberties. I think our hon. leader earlier today gave a reasoned, and I think intelligent, proposal for at least a line of approach to this problem. I think he made suggestions that are worthy of consideration by the government.

For example, there was the suggestion that we should have a continuing investigation into organized crime, but that that investigation should not be in the hands of a police commission that is also responsible for the administration of the police force. I think there is a legitimate separation of functions here. I think we should have a commission investigating these matters at all times and in studying the adequacy of our police protection. I think that that commission should have the same sort of powers as a commissioner under The Public Inquiries Act and I do not think that it needs to have the powers to commit for contempt. But I think it should have powers to require the production of evidence and compel witnesses to give evidence under oath. I think that it should have the power in certain circumstances to take evidence in private. But if it wants action taken against recalcitrant witnesses, then I think we should be prepared to go to a superior court and let the court take such action as in its wisdom appears appropriate on the basis of the facts placed before it.

I think it is advisable and desirable to have a commission of that kind and I think it is also desirable that it should not be the police commission. There is perhaps a natural reluctance on the part of the people of the province to see the police or an agency of the police given this kind of power to compel witnesses to give evidence under oath. They regard that as more properly, and I think rightly, power that belongs to a court of law or a similar agency.

I think there should be a police commission that has solely the function of administering and consolidating and developing the police forces of this province. I think the two functions should be separated. I think that might be a way of allaying some of the public apprehension that has been created and which will otherwise make a constructive approach to the problem of organized crime more difficult in the future.

I think, above all, it is incumbent upon the government at this stage to come forward with an overall statement of policy, certainly something much more comprehensive and meaningful than the statement the hon. Prime Minister gave us this afternoon. He gave us a very interesting historical review—not an entirely unbiased or accurate one—but he stated very little in the way of government policy. Yet a statement of government policy is absolutely vital. What have we had so far, Mr. Speaker? We have had a bill that created the greatest public uproar produced, I imagine, by any bill ever introduced into this Legislature, and what happened? The government abdicated its responsibilities entirely, its responsibility of making policy and of presenting policy to this House for consideration. It instead transferred the whole matter to a committee and placed upon a committee of the Legislature the responsibility of making policy.

I think that if we are going to return to responsible government in the British constitutional sense, the government should re-assume the policymaking role. It got off on the wrong foot entirely in this matter through haste, ineptitude, what-have-you. It brought in a report from the police commission, a special report, an important report, and on the same day it brought in a bill which was to implement important parts of that report.

Surely the government would have been much more sensible if it had brought in the report, had a debate on the report, considered the views of the Legislature in regard to the report, and then brought in its legislation. Now it is in a hopeless mess and I can see real difficulty at this juncture of getting any sort of rational approach to the problem. I view with the greatest apprehension the committee hearings on Bill No. 99. I can see them turn into a real donnybrook which will produce friction and heat and practically no light at all.

I would suggest to the government that it should now, since it has had a few weeks for sober reflection, reassert itself in its rightful role. I am not saying it should bring in a bill or any bills tomorrow or the next day, but this House is going to be sitting here, I think, for at least a month. I think the government should sit down and consider its basic policies, should put those policies frankly before this House and then should bring in its own bills to implement those policies. And, having learned by experience, it will know enough to avoid the kind of provisions that it had in section 14 of Bill No. 99. I am not saying that section 14 was totally wrong but there was so much wrong with it and what was wrong was so totally wrong that this section became totally unacceptable.

I think the government now should be prepared to come forward with sensible and intelligent policies. As far as I am concerned, and I think I can speak for my group, we would not hurl any taunt of any kind at them if they forgot their ridiculous proposition of trying to shift responsibility to a committee. If they just forgot the whole thing and stated frankly that they had got off on the wrong track, we could all admit that everyone can make a mistake. Mind you, it takes quite an effort to make the sort of mistake, and the series of mistakes, that were made on this legislation. But so what? Let us forget about the past. Let us wipe the sheet clean. Let the government come in now and state its policy. Let it bring legislation in that is its own legislation and not a committee's legislation, for the consideration of this House. I think this is the only way in which we will get rationality restored to this situation. I would urge the new hon. Attorney General who does not carry with him all the difficulties of the past and can start with a clean sheet, to consider a return to responsible government in this province by adopting that procedure.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, this is perhaps not quite the first word I have spoken from this seat in the short time since the Legislature resumed its sittings. I believe I did have the pleasure of answering a question put by the hon. member for York South yesterday, but I believe it is almost the first and I have a suspicion it may rather be the last word in this debate. It is not often, some of my friends tell me, that they get a chance to offer the last word. I appreciate the opportunity.

I thought as I sat here and listened to my hon. friends opposite that I might wish for a moment to be in their position where, for some time past, although I was not here to hear them, some years back and over some two or three years, they have shouted allegations and made charges that crime was rampant, that organized crime was in this province in the ranks of the government and the police and in our society.

Having clamoured in this matter, and having shouted it to the roof tops and having repeated it and repeated it and having had two reports now to pretty much dispose of those shouted charges, they now stand up, particularly the hon. member for Downsview in the beautiful position of being able to quote the wonderful speeches of Burke in the defence of liberty and to stand forward in the guise of the champions of liberty. What a wonderful position to be in. I wished for a moment I could have changed places. I could have quoted those beautiful passages almost as well as the hon. member for Downsview.

But it is a much different thing and a much more difficult task to face a situation, a job which has to be done and to do it. Something that may not be altogether understood and may not be—as some words in the commission report said—may not be “popular” with some persons and may cause apprehension, and be blamed for perhaps overzealousness in trying to do with the best of intentions a good thing. At least trying to achieve a good result in the protection of the public, which the government has a duty to do and to be blamed for overzealousness because it would appear that the rights of the individual were being taken away or being trampled upon.

I would like, Mr. Speaker, to make one or two general remarks, before dealing with the report. Reading the report of Mr. Justice Roach and reading the report of the commission and the recommendations and the conclusions, and having the benefit of the debate which has gone before me today and the debate on Bill No. 99, I have arrived at this conclusion as a general statement—that in the province of Ontario, or in any society, where you have an independent and a capable and respected judiciary on the benches of all the courts from magistrate up to the Supreme Court of Canada, as I submit we have, and where you have a competent and capable and trained police force, as I submit we have in this province, and where you have those two things based upon a society, upon a people, who have themselves a high sense of moral values, who are intelligent and aware of their rights and privileges, as they have shown themselves to be and who demand of public persons and of civil servants, persons in public office, who demand a high standard of conduct—when you have that type of society, then I submit that crime, organized or syndicated, is not likely to be able to invade very far into the body politic or to affix itself on that body politic and to fester and grow there. This is the kind of Ontario and the kind of society which we have.

I further suggest, and I say this without any political connotation or interests. I ask you to believe me in this. But I think, this is my conclusion, that the people of this province, among other things, on September 25 last, indicated at least to me, that they were not too much alarmed, that they did not take too seriously, that they did not believe too much, the charges that were hurled about and publicized that this province was in danger of being taken over or invaded and destroyed by organized or syndicated crime.

That was one of the things among others that was answered by the people of this province on September 25 last.

But having said that, I would say this: Both these reports, the Roach report and the Macdonald report, as I shall call it, indicate and establish the existence of syndicated and organized crime upon our borders, amounting in some respects to a government of crime, a criminal government, within a government, in certain of the states which lie upon our borders. This is an ever-present threat, ready to invade, to come into this province and to take over the government, as it has done, and as the report indicates as it is doing, in states that lie very close upon our borders.

I would refer, if I might for a moment, to page 118 of the commission report. This may have been quoted before. Let me read it to the House. This is page 118 and it is marked (h).

It is admitted that the law enforcement agencies in the United States have extreme difficulty in coping effectively with organized and syndicated crime in that country, that conditions in the years since the Kefauver report of 1951 are worse rather than better than they were at that time and that criminals have gained control of many aspects of legitimate as well as criminal operations in the fields of business and labour and influence in politics and law enforcement.

The report goes on:

That Mafia-like syndicated crime controlled by American gangsters manifested itself in the province of Quebec especially in 1953 to 1955 and its activities there have been noted in the same fields as in the United States. Reorganized police forces, supported by an aroused public, are progressing in their efforts to eliminate it. While the situation has improved, organized crime still presents a challenge to constituted authority in some parts of the province.

This I know one of my hon. friends has quoted, but I would repeat it.

That once syndicated crime has obtained a foothold in any large community, it is almost impossible to eliminate it, but that it cannot gain such foothold without police laxity, inefficiency or corruption.

Then the report goes on to say:

That law enforcement agencies in Ontario are for the most part not lax or corrupt, but frequently, for reasons beyond their control, vary in their efficiency.

Now if hon. members doubt that there is a threat of organized and syndicated crime on our borders and that it is poised and ready to pounce and to invade, read, I suggest to them, the book written by the Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Robert Kennedy, "The Enemy Within". It is a good book.

He reports, as hon. members read in the newspaper a day or so ago, that the threat exists and continues to exist and continues to grow and that they have not been successful in dealing with it. I have had the opportunity of having him say that to me a day or so ago. Curiously, someone quoted Jefferson this evening. Here is the man, the Attorney General of the United States, who has been fighting this type of crime and it is a fascinating story of his efforts to fight it.

We are accused of destroying in our proposed legislation, the liberty of the subject. The quote on the fly-leaf of this book is from Thomas Jefferson. The Attorney General uses it and this is how it reads:

I have sworn upon the altar of God eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man.

This is Thomas Jefferson. This is in the fight against crime.

May I then concern myself with the recommendations which this report contains, bearing in mind that this problem exists; and as has been said by my hon. leader, this is the problem we face, to prevent this invasion, to defeat it before it comes in or to destroy it and drive it out should it gain access to our province.

Here are the recommendations of the commission and I can give you some comment upon them and then indicate to you what the policy should be, in my opinion, in approaching this problem and dealing with it.

The report, at the foot of page 119, recommends that provincial and municipal police should be under the immediate government of an independent and non-political authority.

I would like to say this: perhaps the suggestion is good. I welcome the thought that functions of commissions might be divided, that the investigative side and the administrative side might be in two separate bodies, but I would say this, that I think a real effort and a real result has been achieved in removing from the political arm, and I am sorry my hon. friend from Sudbury is not here, that there has been a real effort and a real result, I think, achieved, in removing from the influence of the political arm the operation and the administration of the police forces; the Ontario Provincial Police and the municipal bodies of this province, by placing them under a commission which is charged with the administration and with the control and with the education and with the direction of the police force. In the case of the Ontario Provincial Police, there is a further separation by placing it under a commissioner of provincial police who reports through the commission to the Attorney General.

The hon. members of this House will appreciate and be aware of the fact that there must be—separate the force as far as you can from the political influence—but there must be a responsibility to government through some officer.

Mr. Singer: Indeed so!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Indeed so! But the separation, the control, the administration by the commission formed, or by a commissioner, I submit to the House, is a good thing and as long as the line of control is retained these two somewhat opposed ideas, must work together.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. Attorney General would permit a question?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes.

Mr. Singer: In view of what Judge Macdonald said in the annual report of the police commission tabled in this Legislature two weeks ago, does the hon. Attorney General believe that the police commission has any control, any longer, over the OPP?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I could refer my hon. friend to the present Police Act and the answer I think is there. I think my hon. friend is aware of it. I could find it for him.

Mr. Singer: Yes, but the judge said that since August, as I recall his words, after two requests to the hon. Attorney General's predecessor, who apparently paid little attention to them, he had come to the conclusion it had no role to play insofar as the OPP is concerned. I quoted that this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am saying that the law, The Police Act, provides for and sets out the power of the commission over all police forces of Ontario and that the Ontario Provincial Police commissioner is reporting through and with the commission to the Attorney General. This is the status.

The next recommendation is that smaller police departments, where geographically feasible, be amalgamated. The hon. Prime Minister has said this is being done, insofar as being feasible it is being considered. But I would add this, that such a policy, such a recommendation, is one that cannot be quickly or lightly brought about. Many problems present themselves. There are many difficulties, but I think the recommendation is one that is worthy, and in many ways and to a large extent perhaps feasible, but it is one that will have to be pursued with care and with regard to the difficulties that present themselves in attempting to amalgamate the police forces of small communities and large and small municipalities.

The third recommendation, item (c), is that police recruits be trained. This is being done and assistance is being given at the Ontario Police College. I am able to inform the House that the staff is being augmented with the best type of police instructors being obtained, and that assistance is given to the members of municipal police forces. Just as an instance, the course is a three-month course. The registration fee is $10 per applicant. Through The Attorney General's Department, and the funds made available there, that is the entire charge. The travelling expenses, the board, the lodging of the entrant are paid throughout the course for the charge of $3. The staff, as I have told you, is being augmented with the best persons who can be found. These things are being done.

Telex system of intercommunication is item (d) and I am glad to be able to say that the tenders for that system are already called, so that it may be installed in the provincial police force.

The next one is that the Ontario Provincial Police highgrading squad be renamed gold thefts squad, or some other more appropriate name. That was done, even before the recommendation was made. It is known as the precious metals theft squad.

The next one is the appointment of a criminal intelligence officer. This has been done by the Ontario Provincial Police and an intelligence department has been set up. The information is being obtained and it is being made available to the municipal police forces, as is recommended in this report.

At the foot of page 121 is the recommendation that the Ontario Police Commission, the Ontario Provincial Police force and the Metro Toronto police department co-operate in the formation of an intelligence clearing committee. I can tell you that the Ontario Provincial Police force and the Metro Toronto police force have this arrangement in effect and consideration is being given, in accordance with the recommendation, to its expansion.

Mr. Thompson: I am sorry, sir. I wondered if you had gone from six to eight. Is that by omission?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am sorry I did not—

Mr. Thompson: I noticed you were going through these various recommendations. I wondered if you had gone from six to eight. Seven, in a way, is a part of six I guess, or have I got the wrong—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have no number seven. I am reading from an excerpt.

Mr. Singer: The page is 121.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Page 121, yes. The numbers on that page of my copy are two and three.

Mr. Singer: Six, seven and eight in the copy we have.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Excuse me then. Yes, I had different numbers on that, sorry. I think number seven is what I had in number two: that the Ontario Provincial Police establish and maintain for the benefit of its own forces a central criminal office. This is being done. This is well under way. I had thought that was included when I described the intelligence office and the records which are being obtained. Now, my numbers are different.

I am not able to comment on items 9(a), (b) and (c). Although I believe that action has been taken under (b), I am not in a position to confirm it.

On item (e) I would have some reservations as to what might be done there, but I think it is well worthy of consideration, and the same with (f) and (g). I have some reservations as to how far the police should be entitled to go in identification. These are things which are being considered and more than that I am unable to say at this time.

Mr. Bryden: What about items (a) and (c)? They seem to be perfectly reasonable.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think perhaps I can answer the hon. member by saying that they may be all right. I am not, at this moment, prepared to make a statement as to what my policy and the policy of the government would be. I know they are noted and they are being considered. That is as much as I can say at this time.

Likewise with most of those recommendations which follow down under the number nine.

Now we come to the one item (j), of which much has been said. I must say that I have some reservations, I think, on the matter of wire tapping. I know it is employed in certain jurisdictions, as the hon. member for York South has pointed out, but I am certain, as I stand here, that if that had been included in Bill No. 99, the outcry that we heard—I will not say that the hon. member for York South would have joined in it—I am sure would have been ten times the volume that we did hear with the other provisions about which so much objection was offered.

Mr. MacDonald: What about the necessity of it in view of the new electronic devices?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would say that my own thinking is this: It is not a question of whether you have to tap a wire physically, and tap on to it. That is not in my mind the question at all. I do not think I can distinguish in my thinking between tapping the wire or having some electronic device that you can listen to by getting close to it. I think the principle is that you do not invade the private freedom of an individual to that extent. At least I have not reached that stage in my thinking.

Mr. MacDonald: Even with the safeguards of specific uses and occasions and so on?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: How can the hon. member throw safeguards around it?

An hon. member: Good for the Attorney General.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Perhaps one can. Perhaps one can.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Are the police not using it now?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, the Ontario Provincial Police are not using it.

Mr. MacDonald: Are the Metropolitan Toronto police using it?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not know; the chief says not. But how can one distinguish between tying this wire to my telephone line or putting some device against it that will listen? To me the principle is, at the moment, repulsive. Maybe I will change my thinking but I cannot overlook the suggestion that I feel that if it had been in that bill, we would have heard a tremendous uproar not only from hon. members opposite, but from all over this province.

Mr. Singer: Is that a statement of government policy?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have just said to the House that in my present state of thinking I cannot quite bring myself to insert that in the bill. I think I am entitled to say that I am open-minded enough if I could be convinced that it is necessary and that it does not violate a principle of the individual's right to some privacy, if I could reach that stage in my thinking, then I might go forward. But I cannot see that.

Item (k). This is a federal matter. I think it is plain to all hon. members. It comes within the section as noted there, 169 of the Criminal Code.

Now, item number 10. This is a respectful request to the courts as to how they impose sentences and as to the nature of the sentences they impose. This is something that is not within the field of legislation and perhaps if the commission feels that our courts need some encouragement, perhaps they may be allowed to do that.

Now we come to item number 11. This is the section, the recommendation for legislation which brought about the preparation of Bill No. 99. I do not propose here to discuss the bill. We will have ample opportunity, I am sure, to discuss it in the standing committee on legal bills and again in the House in the committee of the whole. All I would say is this, that I feel it is the duty of every hon. member of this House to approach that committee and the discussion of that bill with the feeling that he has a duty and an honest duty, apart from any political considerations to try to arrive at an effective piece of legislation which will achieve two things, the two objectives we have before us. One, to control, to prevent the invasion of organized or syndicated crime or the single criminal into our society and at the same time, in striving for that objective and achieving it, to make certain that the rights of the individual are not destroyed or taken away. I think these things are quite compatible and can well be done.

If I were permitted to discuss Bill No. 99, I think I would say that those two objectives were not too badly attained in that bill. I have some matters to put before that committee and I am saying this simply that we should approach it simply with the idea of achieving those two objectives, to control and prevent any invasion of crime, and to make certain that the rights of the individual are preserved in the doing of that. These, I think, can be done and these, I think, we shall do.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the hon. Attorney General I should like to ask him another question arising out of his last remarks. Is he of the opinion that there are not sufficient procedures available to carry on investigations within the present legislation; or to phrase it another way, does he not agree with the remark of Commissioner Harvison that there are sufficient tools available to allow proper enforcement at present?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think this is verging on a discussion of the legislation which should come out of this report. I am aware, as I know the hon. member is, that the present rights the commission has are under The Public Inquiries Act. I think my hon. friend will perhaps agree with me that there are some dubious areas there with respect to the recommendation number 11 of the commission as to why the hearings are necessary. These things, I think, deserve our full consideration and I think, in considering what powers we should give to carry out the recommendation we have, as I have said also, to make certain that there are all the safeguards put in that any individual as a witness should have if he approached such a hearing under the control of the commission.

Mr. Singer: I will wait for the hon. Attorney General to come forward and discuss it after.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might be permitted to ask a question, sir. I have been interested in reading the report by the Ontario Police Commission. I have been interested in the way in which it was presented to the House. My question is that, in the way it was presented to the House by the former Attorney General, I wonder, sir, whether you would—and I am not saying this to put you on the spot in any way, my question is whether the hon. Attorney General would have considered—I am sorry, I would like to ask the question, Mr. Speaker, but there are interruptions.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Let me have the question.

Mr. Thompson: Would the hon. Attorney General have considered this report in bringing it before the House in this manner? If I could clarify why I am asking this question—I wondered with respect to names that are placed in this—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Thompson: I assure you, Mr. Speaker, I have great respect for the hon. Attorney General.

Mr. Speaker: Order! Would the member just ask the direct question?

Mr. Thompson: I ask if the hon. Attorney General would have followed the procedure of bringing forward the report in this manner, which includes names of private individuals and others about which there does not appear to be substantial evidence concerning activities which they are alleged to have done.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I thought the commissioner was very careful in saying that there were individuals whom he did not name who, it was suggested in the evidence before him, had been perhaps involved or associated with criminals. It was one of the reasons that he asked for the very legislation in section 11 of the report. But I think this also, if there are individuals named in this report—and the hon. member seems to think that would be wrong—certainly there are some criminals named there, a good many of them. I think that if we withheld this report from the House, however it read, that I would have heard a great deal from the hon. member.

Mr. Thompson: Could I ask a supplementary question? Could I ask, when the hon. Attorney General mentioned the names of two lawyers—in this report it suggests there are two lawyers in Toronto who are connected with the Cosa Nostra—does he feel that this might reflect not only on his profession but on certain hon. members?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: They are not named.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Of course, Mr. Wintermeyer did that in his crime speech.

Mr. Thompson: No; I say the very fact that they are not named, could this not be an embarrassment to people as a result of what might be inferred?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would answer a question whether he—

Mr. Speaker: No, I am sorry, I am not going to let the discussion get into a question-and-answer period across the floor. The member had a supplementary question and if the Minister cares to answer it, he may.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would just like to say this: I know there are some lawyers who are not worthy of the name and do our profession no good. I think that is true of persons in every walk of life. We should not condemn the whole profession because some go bad.

Mr. MacDonald: And the sooner we dig out the full facts—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would like that, too.

Mr. R. K. McNeil (Elgin) moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow morning there are a few speakers on the Budget debate and we will then return to the estimates of The Department of Energy and Resources Management.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11.00 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

FRIDAY, APRIL 17, 1964

The House met at 10:30 o'clock, a.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are pleased to welcome to the Legislature today, in the east gallery, students from Birch Cliff Heights Public School, Scarborough, and members of the Espanola High School Honour Society; in the west gallery, students from Bendale Vocational School, Scarborough.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE PUBLIC UTILITIES ACT

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Public Utilities Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE MUNICIPALITY OF METROPOLITAN TORONTO ACT

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there are four amendments to this Act contained in this bill: 1. It will provide for the payment by a school board of maintenance assistance payments in respect of children in hospital or under the care of a charitable institution; 2. We are extending the powers of the Metropolitan Toronto planning area to undertake special studies in conjunction with other governmental authorities, particularly CMHC; 3. There has been a problem in that it has been difficult for the Metropolitan corporation to obtain the information from the individual municipalities as to the assessment in relation to grants in lieu of taxes. We are providing that the clerks of the municipalities must provide the statement to the clerk of the Metro corporation within 60 days after the grants have been paid; 4. This section is to authorize certain payments to a number of charitable institutions, including the Canadian Red Cross Society, for the Italian Flood Relief Fund.

THE MUNICIPAL ACT

Hon. Mr. Spooner moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Municipal Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that this bill be referred to the legislative committee on municipal law. The amendments suggested are minor in most cases and I will go into all the various amendments during second reading and subsequent hearings of the committee.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, may I crave your indulgence? I thought the hon. member for Woodbine would explain the purpose of his bill. Would it be too late now to ask him if he would?

Mr. Speaker: We have passed that.

Mr. Troy: I know, sir.

THE HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT ACT

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Highway Improvement Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide a means of equalizing the basis of the contributions of counties on the one hand and of cities or separated towns on the other, toward the cost of work on roads under the jurisdiction of suburban roads commissions. I might say in amplifying this, that it is now proposed that the levy against the cities or separated towns by a suburban road commission shall be on the basis of the provincially equalized assessment.

LOCAL ROADS BOARDS

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to provide for the establishment of local roads boards in territories without municipal organization.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to encourage the development of the local roads in territories without municipal organization by methods that are more efficient and equitable than those provided in The Statute Labour Act. Local roads boards, elected by owners of land in local roads areas established under this Act, are given the power to collect taxes and determine what work will be done on their local roads. The Department of Highways will subsidize these local roads boards and perform the work on the local roads.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary) begs leave to present to the House the following reports:

1. Report of the Provincial Secretary of Ontario with respect to the administration of Part IX of The Corporations Act for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1963.

2. Report of the Statistics Branch of The Department of Agriculture of Ontario for the year 1962.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have two points of order that I would like to raise. One, since this is the appropriate time, I would like to put on record without any other comment, the exact quote from Hansard rather than a paraphrase, in the hope that I may satisfy the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests.

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): Just a moment, if the hon. member will—

Mr. MacDonald: Have I the floor, Mr. Speaker?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I am asking for it at the moment before the hon. member reads this.

Mr. Speaker: I presume the member is raising a point of order with regard to the remarks he made yesterday. Did the Minister wish to ask him a question about the point of order which he is raising or what was the point he wished to raise?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, my point is just this, if my hon. friend is endeavouring to put something on the record from Hansard at this time in relation to the NONG investigation, I do not want to be in a position of having to answer it, for this reason, that at the present time, there is a trial going on in this very city relating to many of the matters that are brought up inferentially as a result of this question. I think if my hon. friend will ponder, it would be better to let that stand until the trial is out of the way.

Mr. Speaker: Had the remarks which the member wished to make have anything to do about the Northern Ontario Natural Gas trial which is taking place at the present time?

Mr. MacDonald: No, they have nothing to do with the trial. The trial has to do with Mr. Farris and this has to do with the comment of the hon. Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Does the substance of the remarks which the member wishes to make, have anything to do with the trial that is on at the present time, insofar as the material is concerned?

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, it is with reference, you are right, to the erroneous comments of the hon. Minister on the question of the issue of promotional stock. But the hon. Minister yesterday rose and said that I was wrong, that I was paraphrasing him and that he had never said anything like that. I said at that time, "I shall put on the record precisely what he said, nothing more."

Mr. Speaker: The only thing I want to point out to the member is that this trial is now on, and we do not want any further remarks in the House about a matter that is sub judice at this time before the courts.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to argue with you, but we are now in a very peculiar position once again, that if we cannot quote back into the record what is already part of the record of this House because allegedly it is before a court, we are really crippling the operations of this Legislature, particularly after the hon. Minister has made a charge yesterday when I was paraphrasing. This is sheer obstructionism, what we have got this morning, under the guise of being an affront to what is going on in the courts.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, I do not want to let this matter go any further. The only thing the chair is concerned about is if these remarks, which the member is about to make, are relevant to the trial that is now taking place. Therefore I think perhaps it would come under our sub judice rule and I would ask that he desist from making them at this time.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Speaker, I shall put it out in a release so that the press will have it, because Mr. Speaker, I feel that some time soon we have got to make a protest in this House that we are denied the right even to quote the record and deal with facts, allegedly because they are before the courts downtown. This has nothing to do with the perjury charge that is now before the downtown courts, nothing to do with it at all.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): It has to do with an allegation that the hon. Minister made yesterday which was quite wrong.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Just by way of getting this clear. As I understood the statement yesterday, it has very much to do with the end result and the reopening of this investigation. I have quite a number of items that I would quote in reply to anything that my hon. friend could bring. I would not want to do that while this trial is on. I would appeal against any attempt to do that while this trial is on.

Afterwards, I will deal with it just as free and just as easy and just as hard as my hon. friend wants it dealt with. But right now, this thing should not be brought up. I would be immediately put in the position of having to answer in this House, which of course is open to reporting, while this trial is on, and I ask my hon. friend, not with any idea of any reason why at a later date, if he wants to get anything on the record, he should not get it. But right at this moment, I think it would be very unfair and if anything of that sort was released in the press at the present time I would ask the presiding judge to call the hon. member before his court to explain it.

Mr. MacDonald: I will draw to attention the absurdities of the position we are in. I am now going to be placed in the position where it is quite conceivable I cannot read from Hansard to this House what has already been in Hansard for a period of two or three years. Because what is downtown before the courts is surely going to be appealed, so that for two or three years, I cannot read into Hansard what the hon. Minister said and—when I paraphrased it yesterday—he denied it. I am not going to argue the point any further, Mr. Speaker, but I just want to draw your attention once again to the absurdity of a rule which denies this House—a place which has special privileges in dealing with matters of public concern—the right to deal with matters that are being discussed on the streets and being discussed in the papers.

Mr. Speaker: I just want to point out that the reason I am making this ruling is because we have this rule of the House. It is not as if I am making the rule at this time. We just want to follow the rules of the House.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I have a second point of order, that I want to raise. I asked a question in the House on April 14, last Tuesday, of the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond). I inquired as to the report concerning the health conditions faced by workers in the Allied Chemical Plant near Sarnia, and the fact that some of them have been hospitalized. The hon. Minister of Health replied as follows, as found on 2011 of Hansard:

The Department of Labour and The Department of Health have had the new Allied Chemical of Canada plant near Sarnia under close supervision during construction and since it commenced operation. There have been no incidents of health problems relating to phosgene used in the process.

I have here, Mr. Speaker, a copy of the Windsor Star. Nothing appeared in the Sarnia paper on this matter at all, rather significantly. The Windsor Star of April 15, under the heading,

SEVEN HOSPITALIZED BY GAS LEAK

There is one paragraph in the story, and I am quoting directly:

Today, plant manager S. G. Anderson confirmed that six or seven plant workers were at different times taken to hospital and treated for exposure to gas.

Mr. Speaker, this is either the second or the third time this year, that a question has been put to the hon. Minister and in reply to it, or in another statement, the hon. Minister has misinformed this House. I think the time has come when it is not too much to ask the hon. Minister of Health, that he examine the information that is given to him by his advisers a little bit more carefully, so that he will not perhaps unwittingly become the purveyor of misinformation to this House.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, I think this is a dastardly charge for any hon. member of this House to make against any Minister. The information, sir, which I placed before you and before the hon. members of this House is a statement, directly prepared by my staff, who are charged with the responsibility of looking after this.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, the hon. Minister's staff were in error.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, would you ask the hon. member to wait, please? The statement which I read to him, and to this House, I did not alter in any single word or detail. Because a highly scientific matter was under discussion, I took the words as given to me by my staff, without any alteration whatsoever. If they have been misinformed, or if the cases have not been reported to the division of industrial hygiene of The Department of Health, then I cannot give any reason why that should have happened, other than to undertake to you, sir, and this House, that I will order the division of industrial hygiene to investigate this more fully and find out why one report is given to the newspapers and another report is given to The Department of Health.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, if I may just add one bit on the point of order. This is not a technical matter. This is a simple fact of workers being hospitalized. The hon. Minister was given a report which he now says, presumably, was in error because the plant manager denies it. All I am asking is that the hon. Minister not accept carte blanche what is given from his advisers because this is the second or third time he has given the House misinformation.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, I think it is very, very reasonable that any Minister would accept what is given to him, as my hon. friend blandly calls carte blanche, by his staff who are experts in the field, rather than take a report from a newspaper, with all due respect to newspapers.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Mr. Speaker, I wish before the orders of the day, to make a report to you that might bring a little lavender and old lace into the debates this morning. The Department of Mines is pleased to report that as of this date there has not occurred a fatality in Ontario in mines, metallurgical plants, pits and quarries, over a two-month period, since February 6, 1964.

This involves in heavy industry a working force of over 46,000 men and is a new record of safety in this group over many years and shows the safety work being done. I wish to compliment the industry and my men for that announcement.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree).

Would the hon. Minister please inform the House when he will be making a full statement on minimum wages for the province of Ontario? We have sent notice to the hon. Minister.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on an earlier occasion in this House, and certainly in other places, I have stated that I would make a statement with respect to minimum wage orders during the present session of this current Legislature. Nothing has happened since I made the statement which would alter the commitment which I have made.

Mr. Bukator: A supplementary question, if you will, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: You wish to ask the Minister a supplementary question?

Mr. Bukator: Yes, I would like to, if he would answer it. I do not know how to ask a question, Mr. Speaker, without a bit of a—

Mr. Speaker: Sir, you will have to make—

Mr. Bukator: I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this House is stifled. How can you ask an intelligent question without a word of explanation before it? They have two lines in Hansard that I would like to quote, if you would permit me to. I think this would make an intelligent sort of a discussion.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, you cannot dictate to me.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Speaker, may I anticipate what is in the mind of the hon. member and elucidate on the answer which I gave? I thought it was quite clear. I shall deal with the minimum wage question during the next day or so, within the period of this present session, but I am not able nor do I propose today to state the exact day on which I will make that statement. I think it is the exact day that the hon. member would like me to name at this time.

Mr. Bukator: I would like to thank the hon. Minister for that comment, that we will have it in the session.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The 2nd order; resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair and that the House resolve itself into the committee on ways and means.

ON THE BUDGET

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Mr. Speaker, when I was ending my speech before, I think I was talking at the time about the hospital bed situation. Sir, at that time I think everyone appreciated that there was a really quite serious bed emergency situation, particularly with active treatment beds in the Metropolitan Toronto area. As I recall, this situation was being put before the public by aroused newspapers, by ministers of the gospel, and even by, I would say, members of Parliament from every side. But the only person who did not seem to be putting forward anything was the man who after all is most responsible for it, and that was the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond).

Sir, since that time once again an inactive government has been moved to some action in that with this pressure it became aware that a crisis had developed. We find that the hon. Minister did come through with what I would call a partial answer to one of the problems of the hospital situation.

I would say that it struck me as somewhat ironical that the person who was providing an answer, a considerable time before we got an answer from the hon. Minister, was the hon. member for Forest Hill (Mr. Dunlop). The hon. member for Forest Hill has suggested to us what I would have felt was a long-term approach to this. I think, sir, the hon. member for Forest Hill recognized that private philanthropy cannot answer the problem of raising funds for a modern technological hospital, and he suggested that a system should be set up by the provincial government which would provide funds that could be guaranteed to be paid either by the raising of hospital premiums or by the Ontario Hospital Services Commission guaranteeing the cost of interest rates and principal.

I would say, sir, that this is surely fundamental. I appreciate there should be a role for private philanthropy and I would think this should be, if I could say it, on the frills of a hospital, but the basic necessity of hospitals surely should be carried by the level of government responsible for health and that is the provincial government.

I had suggested myself that there should be a fund set up for needed hospital construction. I suggested a revolving fund of $25 million. I think, sir, that such a fund would provide low interest loans for hospital construction approved by the Ontario Hospital Services Commission. I think that the low interest rates would remain stable, and I should add that I notice where the hon. Minister, in connection with the loans that are going to be provided, has given a low interest rate, I think of three per cent. I would feel, sir, that the loans could be up to $10,000 a bed with a payment over 20 years. I would hope that the hon. Minister, also in connection with these loans, would be working steadily for negotiation with the federal government, that it again might be asked to play a role with hospital grants.

I think that the repayment would be possible by provincial hospital grants being increased to include debt charges. The advantage, I feel, in connection with the proposal I make over that of the hon. member for Forest Hill, is that a revolving fund can replenish itself continually and it meets not only the present construction needs but also the forecast need of 3,800 beds which we understand has to be available by 1970. Sir, the heat in a sense, has been off the hon. Minister of Health because he has given a partial solution to one area of the problem, but I would hope that having had a sense now of the urgency for providing adequate health facilities for the people of Ontario that this government now has realized that this is its responsibility.

I notice the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) is kind enough to be listening to me. He, I think, realizes that when you take money from people through premiums and tell them they will get a service, they expect that the government will be honourable enough to provide adequate service. I would suggest that there are many other areas that have to be looked at in order to provide adequate service. I am thinking of staffs. I do not think we can tolerate glib replies in connection with the shortage of nurses. I think we want a deeper approach to that situation—a deeper approach to look at the working conditions of nurses; a deeper approach to look at the situation of the married nurses who obviously, it would appear, are not taking part in hospital work.

Sir, I am so sensitive to the rulings of the hon. Minister or the rulings of Mr. Speaker after the situation this morning, that I almost have a Pavlov reaction of sitting down quickly if I even see him twitch a muscle.

My hon. friend, the hon. Minister of Public Welfare (Mr. Cecile) perhaps might have mentioned this area to us, and that was in connection with the co-ordinated approach which I am sure he is going to take with respect to war on poverty. This is perhaps a too-clichéd term now but it is still a very vital term. One of the things he might, I think, have thought about was the need to get married nurses to continue nursing. They have taken a great deal of training. That is why the question about the placing of day nurseries. I, sir, have always had a great deal of faith because this image I see is of the hon. Minister of Public Welfare, as they say, on the white horse. I was so pleased to see that he is prepared to push for a medical insurance plan for the people of Ontario, as he says, based on an approach similar to the hospital insurance plan.

That, sir, shows a remarkable vitality in connection with welfare, compared to what it has been before. I thought that when he had thought of this, of the medical insurance programme, he might have also considered the point that a way to attract the married nurses to work again in the hospitals would have been to consider placing day nurseries in hospitals so that married nurses who have children would have been able to have their children at the hospital in the day nursery while they worked.

Sir, I would never suggest that the hon. Minister did not have the imagination to see this solution. In fact I notice him looking into a brief now. I am sure he is probably figuring how this can be arranged and I will be the first to congratulate him when he will announce it.

One of the things that I think we should all appreciate is that there has been an extraordinary situation in the House. For the sake of the hon. members of the back benches, who I think possibly feel and wonder about the way that they are, on the whole, ignored by the government, I would like to say that I find a most refreshing contribution from a number of them. I wanted to call to the attention of the Treasury benches the remarks of the private hon. member for Forest Hill because I think his remarks and suggestions may go unnoticed by the government. I am sorry that he is not here because I wanted to tell him that at least the members of the Opposition recognize this brightness that suddenly takes place in the government circles when you have a private hon. member making a suggestion with respect to a crisis.

He was not the only Daniel who—there were others—I think there is a song and I think you will probably recall it, Mr. Speaker.

Dared to be a Daniel,

Dared to stand alone,

Dared to have a purpose firm,

And dared to make it known.

The hon. member for Forest Hill, I think we should call him the Daniel of Forest Hill—but if you will recall the Bible, sir, when Daniel went into the fiery furnace there were three others who went in later. There were Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego and there are also Shadrachs, Meshachs and Abednegos here. The hon. member who sits next to the lady hon. member (Mrs. Pritchard), I am sorry I cannot—

An hon. member: Armourdale!

Mr. Thompson: Armourdale, the hon. member for Armourdale (Mr. Carton); there is the hon. member for St. George (Mr. A. F. Lawrence). Now these men, sir, have dared to be Daniels. I do not know how far this will advance them, whether they will just have to take the loneliness of the fiery furnace or whether they will be recognized for their courage and abilities. We, sir, at least recognize them.

The other thing I would like to say—because when we see a contribution being made on the part of the government, and I may say that for my own part it is rare that I see it, but when I do see it, I want to give credit when it is due. Now, sir, for many, many years, one of the things that I felt has been bleak and forlorn has been The Department of Reform Institutions. It was something like the situation with the hospital beds—it had to be an outraged, persistent war by the community and by the newspapers and by the Opposition, Mr. Speaker; and by people who work in the hospitals; in connection with nurses; by doctors, until we got action out of the inactivity.

And, sir, with the prison reforms, I can recall when I first stepped into this Legislature as a member—that was not so long ago either—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): It seems long!

Mr. Thompson: But I recall that at that time, reading just before I came in, that the then Minister of Reform Institutions admitted that there would no longer be whipping in the institutions of Ontario. As I recall, I read that it was because the press had pushed him to see that there needed to be some reform here. I think the way the press did it was by a column describing the horrifying situation of a young man who was going to face the scientific torture of the whippings administered by certain kinds of instruments to make the most acute pain without breaking the bones of the people. This young man, unable to face it, had hanged himself.

Well, that was the slow advance that was taking place in reform institutions. This particular Minister had admitted in Parliament the outraged outcry of the newspapers forced this reform.

So, sir, it was with considerable delight that I read—and unfortunately I have not got some of the notes that I had wanted—of some of the reforms that the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman) is starting to instigate. I would say that if he can keep on in that approach that we really will have a reform taking place in Ontario institutions. I congratulate him on doing this. We will be watching because we have seen this moment of brightness and, of course, you cannot prevent us being cynical, considering that we sat and watched the way things went for years. So we will watch this to see, sir, whether you will still progress and eventually this will really be a reform institutions department. But in having made a first step, I would like to say that I congratulate the hon. Minister on what he has done.

Now I would like to turn to a problem which concerns us in this Legislature because not only are we representatives of the people of our various ridings but we are also citizens of Canada. I would feel, particularly in these times, as citizens of Canada and realizing that some people are suggesting there is a crisis in Confederation, it behooves every one of us to look toward measures that are measures of unity for Canada, and that we should try to mould those measures across Canada in a similar fashion to the early Canadians who made Canada a nation by building a railway across this country.

And I would suggest that one of these plans which can build the fabric of unity, one of the approaches surely, is a social measure providing equality of benefits, providing for a mobility across this country for people, in fact, indeed encouraging it. And I am pleased that the hon. Prime Minister of this province (Mr. Roberts) agrees with me, agrees with our party. We must stress the great principles to develop a unity across this country. He agrees on the principle of a Canada pension plan rather than separate plans.

I am sure that we all agree that if we could get a Canada pension plan it would provide a mobility far better and encourage mobility between the provinces, far better than having the portability of pensions where there will be inequality with areas of lower standards of pension between the various provinces. I would say that we should think about mobility. We should think of the fact that in this nation—I think one of the tests of a nation is that people are permitted to live in one area and spend their old age in another and so on; I think one of the tests of nationhood is that young men, if they see a better opportunity in one part of a nation, can go there freely to work. If they get a chance of promotion, they can return to another province, and so on. And I think therefore that the idea of a Canada pension plan is vital in connection with the unity of our nation.

And I would say that as I have looked at the proposals about a pension plan—and I notice that the hon. member for Forest Hill is now with us, and I would like to say that amongst the other contributions which he has made to this House, he said one of them was that there was too much fuzz, and misunderstanding and ambiguity about the proposals of pension plans. I agree with him, but I would like to come to why I think such ambiguity and confusion exists.

I noticed, sir, an article—I think it was the Toronto Globe and Mail, in which it reported a resolution passed by the Ontario Teachers' Federation. They were calling on the Ontario government to withdraw from the proposed Canada pension plan. And, sir, I phoned someone at the Ontario Teachers' Federation to discuss the reasons why they were considering withdrawing. Now I do not know if I spoke to the author of the resolution or not.

The person to whom I talked certainly seemed to be able to speak with some authority about it. I noticed that the first point raised in this article is that "you feel you should not be in the Canada pension plan because teachers would be forced to pay what is called a disguised tax on salary under the Canada pension plan, and could not qualify for full benefits under it". And I said, "Does that mean that you are concerned about the one per cent?"—which at the present anyway is proposed under the Canada pension plan to be taken from salaries. And I said, "Well now, if you are concerned about the 1 per cent, does it mean that you are really for private pension plans rather than a public plan?" I was told that they were for a public plan. And I said, "Well, I fail to see how you can have a public plan unless you are going to have to make some contribution." And I suggested to them that with the Quebec plan they would have to have 2 per cent taken off. So we had our discussion about this and then we moved on to the next problem which they had raised.

The next problem was that they said that the board said that most teachers retire before 65, but could not draw a pension until 65.

This is one of the reasons that they wanted to opt out of the Canada pension plan. And I said, "If you are for a public plan, and you are annoyed about the fact that you cannot opt out before 65, do you want the age of a public plan to be 60 or lower than 65?" And again they said, no, they did not want that, they felt it should be at 65. As I say, I do not know if I was talking to an authority but we moved on to the next point.

The next point they had apparently raised was that they were concerned that the depletion of the unemployment insurance fund demonstrated the federal government's inability to administer properly any Canada-wide social security scheme. It seems to me that—and I certainly do not want to get overly partisan in this—but it would seem to me that the unemployment insurance fund was not set up for periods of widespread unemployment.

And I think that if we look at the recent period in Canada, we can understand there were periods of widespread unemployment and the unemployment insurance fund did go broke. And I would say, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the Canada pension plan or with any pension plan, surely it is more predictable to assess than the contributions in a situation of unemployment—I am sure the hon. Prime Minister will forgive me this little remark—a situation in connection with unemployment when you might have a federal Conservative government in power. It is not always predictable that you will have full employment at that period.

But I would say that we can surely predict the numbers of people generally, people who are going to move into a pension plan, far better than we can the number of people who may be unemployed due to world situations and many other things.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): It is the amounts that are paid out of the funds we have to be careful of—it is not only the prediction or the number of people who may be unemployed, but it is the extension of benefits which is always politically popular with any party, it is no partisan approach I am taking on this. It is the extension of benefits without a corresponding increase in the fund which I think is at least partially responsible for the fate of the unemployment insurance fund.

Mr. Thompson: Sir, I appreciate the contribution—

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): The unemployment insurance fund got into the mess because of national unemployment.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, there are several elements involved in it.

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate the point made by the hon. Prime Minister. I still think that the basic problem was the widespread unemployment that caused this strain. And I would suggest that the point the hon. Prime Minister makes is certainly valid in connection with any plan. If he is going to increase the benefits over contributions, that also would be a cause of a fund being depleted. But I think it comes to us again that when we asked the teachers about their concern over the unemployment insurance fund and tried to show there was a different aspect with a pension plan, they then said that they do not have much faith in a federal government investing money, but they do in a provincial government. Well, this seems rather odd to me that you cannot have faith in your nation and in your federal government but you prefer to have faith in the provincial government.

So what I am really coming to is the point that was raised, I think, by the hon. member for Forest Hill that objections and pros and cons to pension plans are often based on inaccuracies and on confusion. Now, I would like to suggest that perhaps one of the reasons for confusion in connection with this and one of the reasons certainly in the minds of these people—because I asked them. I said, "Well, now, you are for a Robarts pension plan?" and they answered me; they said, "What plan? What does Mr. Robarts stand for? What does he want?" And I, sir, as always, forgetting partisan politics or anything, I said, "Well, there is one thing we know he stands for; he is for the principle of a Canada pension plan"; but apart from that I am afraid—and I hope in this House we will get clarification—because I am afraid I am like many others. I do not really know what he does stand for in connection with a Canada pension plan.

I would say, sir, that if you look at the past approach that has been taken by the hon. Prime Minister, in connection with whether he will be within a Canada pension plan or whether he will have his own plan, we saw first of all, his own plan, which he was suggesting. His own plan, sir, was going to provide — and I am quoting from the Toronto Star, which has done a comparison between the two plans—his own plan, sir, the provincial plan, will build up over 40 years, since it will only apply to work done on or after January 1, 1965 and after attaining the age of 30. Anyone retiring at 70 in the year after it comes into effect will receive $2 plus the $75 flat rate pension. And after 40 years of payment into the plan, which will build up by $2 a year, a man receiving the maximum will get $80 plus the $75, for a total of $155. That was the hon. Prime Minister's original plan.

It was a plan which was based on private insurance companies. I am not saying "with influences" by private insurance companies. I would say I do not adhere to that. But what I did notice, sir, with respect to the hon. Prime Minister's remarks were that he apparently had gone to the federal government and he was concerned about a public plan. He was concerned about a public plan because of the government taking over large investments and how this would affect the private sector.

I may say that it appeared to me that the hon. Prime Minister agrees in one sense with the federal plan, which would have had a fund of $300 million with the amendment which the hon. Prime Minister appears to encourage, the federal plan would have a fund of $2.5 billion in ten years. Then sir, it seems to me that with the hon. Prime Minister's concern about the public plan interfering with the private sector with respect to investments, if he has an interest, a keen interest in the Quebec plan—I understand he wants 100 per cent of the funds now to be in the provincial government's hands—surely it seems that he is abandoning the concern he had with respect to the influence of governments taking such large investments into their own hands and what kind of effect it would have with respect to the private sector.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, if I may, I think the question then was a very basic question of what effect a public plan would have. I can assure the hon. member that my concern was not expressed in order to block it. I was interested to know whether any investigation of this had ever been made, whether this question had been studied. I can assure my hon. friend that my interest was shared by a great many people, a great many economists. Now the answer may be that it is perfectly all right, but in those early days when this plan was thrust upon me in the middle of an election campaign and I was issued an ultimatum to either accept it or reject it, and an attempt was made to force me into a position where I was to say I am either for or against this before there was even a bill in the House of Commons, there was nothing there but a resolution. I mean, you understand this.

These points were raised so far as I was concerned, not with any idea that we were going to block the Canada pension plan. But I was very interested to find out whether these things had been considered when the legislation was in the formative stage. That is why it was raised. The hon. member knows himself that there have been so many shifts in the meantime. For instance, originally the federal plan as I understood it, was a pay-as-you-go plan and part of the pay-as-you-go was going to be an additional $10 on old age security, which was going to be paid out of the money collected under the Canada pension plan. When Quebec indicated it was not going to come into the Canada pension plan, the federal government then could not funnel an additional $10 on old age security into the province of Quebec, if the people in Quebec were not going to pay under the Canada pension plan. So we had a reversal right there.

In the overall picture, what has happened in this whole question of pensions is that there have been public debates and positions taken. It is a very fluid situation. Even in this past week there has been change, because Mr. Pearson is negotiating with Quebec and has telephoned me and told me this. Eventually there will be results from that. I can assure my hon. friend the chances are we will come up with something in the final analysis that we have not even seen yet.

This is not an unhealthy way to develop the best piece of legislation that we can find in this area for all of Canada. In the affairs of men, this has happened to develop in this way. I personally am convinced that as men of goodwill and co-operation, we can work these things out, but it is impossible to know from day to day what developments are going to be.

Mr. Thompson: Sir, I would like to suggest while I am discussing it that I am not by any means suggesting you are blocking the plan. I am simply suggesting that it seems to me that you yourself have moved from various positions. Now, I am not criticizing that. I am just tabling it.

I am constantly emphasizing the point you have made that you are interested in a Canada pension plan and I am just going through some of the approaches that you have taken because—

Hon Mr. Robarts: Well I am just trying to help you.

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate that, I really do appreciate your contribution. If I could, just to clarify, to show that I have watched your approach on this, say I know you wrote, for example, to Mr. Pearson last February in connection with this area of private investment, that you were concerned and you had written. If I can quote this:

That one of our main concerns throughout has been the impact of the Canada pension plan on existing private pension plans in this province and the adverse effect on the formation of investment capital upon which the growth of our economy greatly depends.

I think you said that at a meeting, rather than wrote that.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, in any event, I have expressed the viewpoint.

Mr. Thompson: But I would suggest that it seems to me that one problem in this—perhaps I will not go on in this area much more—but one problem to me has been to know where you really stand. Perhaps you frankly have no stand, you are watching to see what is developing and your interest is both for the people of Ontario and for a broad pension plan. But it seems to me, sir, if I could say this, that you have a wealth of technical brains, both yourself personally as well as your civil service. The hon. Provincial Treasurer told us that there had been negotiations between your people—I speak of our people, rather, the Ontario civil servants—and the federal government technical people, and I had asked him about it—it is recorded in Hansard; I have not got it here but it is recorded in Hansard. This was several months ago when his estimates came out, and you had worked out the problem of existing plans. Well, sir, the hon. Provincial Treasurer had given me that impression.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, if I can correct the impression, there were meetings held at the technical level. They were, I would say, completely unproductive. In other words, we did not get the answers we wanted in those meetings. There were meetings held after the meetings held in September, I believe, and some at a later date than that, these by technical commissions. From our point of view those meetings were not particularly satisfactory.

Mr. Thompson: Could I ask this, sir, and I appreciate the hon. Prime Minister giving us answers on it: I understand the federal government constitutionally cannot legislate for existing private pension plans to fit into an overall plan. Now, the provincial government could do this; it could set certain standards for the private pension plans.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, Mr. Speaker, I suppose the adjustment comes one place or the other. You have two things that you want to put together. Constitutionally I cannot answer the question. I do not really know whether the federal government has power to legislate for a private pension plan, but it certainly has power to tailor its plan to fit the existing plans in this question of integration, which is a technical matter. If they cannot legislate and change the existing private plans, certainly they can arrange their own legislation so that it will fit at least with existing plans. This is what I think they are attempting to do, for instance, with their own public service pension plan in Ottawa which is a large, complicated pension plan.

Now, somehow or other it has to be. At one conference one man spoke for half an hour without taking a breath on some of the things that they were doing to co-ordinate that. I am afraid his speech ended in a general round of laughter because there was not a single person there who understood what he was saying other than himself. It was a very complicated matter indeed. That was the result of the work the federal government was doing to integrate its own public service pension plan with its own universal pension plan.

Mr. Thompson: Thanks, sir. As I say, if the hon. Prime Minister looks at the situation in the States where they have a contributory pension plan, it does seem that this can be worked out for—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, the point about the United States really is that if we had introduced a universal contributory pension plan 20 years ago, of course our problems would not be as great. On the other hand, the problems are put before us to be solved; there is an answer to it, and certainly that would not be a sufficient reason to block a universal plan if in the thinking of all of us a universal plan is a proper social need in our country and I think there is great room for it. We simply have to find an answer to these problems. We cannot say, "Well, there is a problem, therefore we will not proceed." The problem is there and it has to be dealt with, but what we have been seeking along the way is how, because a lot of people ask me, for instance, "What is going to happen to my pension?" just as the teachers made this statement. I think they are concerned basically as to what is going to happen to them and the pension arrangements they presently have, and this is a proper concern for them to have and we have a responsibility to see where we are going and how they will be integrated.

Mr. Thompson: Sir, this would happen whether you had a provincial public plan or a federal plan, and it would seem to me also, sir—I appreciate this because the hon. Prime Minister is much closer—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It becomes a problem for Ontario if we have an Ontario-operated plan, but when it is to be a Canada-operated plan then it is their responsibility and that was why I asked the question.

Mr. Thompson: Well, I can appreciate this, sir. If I could ask this, it seems to me that the situation still would be that the Canada pension plan would set a certain standard with respect to contribution and to benefits. The individual plans surely vary a great deal, and I am talking about the private pension plans. So it would be a matter of the private pension plans with all their individual characteristics working to adapt themselves to the federal plan or to the provincial plan rather than the federal government saying to each one, "Well, we will work out how you adapt." I think of looking, for example, at Professor Clark's brief. I am not in any way a person who is familiar with these figures or statistics, but I was interested in the statement he had made, saying that the problem of integrating existing plans to a public plan is not a deep problem, it is one that can be worked out by technicians. I find it hard to understand when the hon. Prime Minister is suggesting the federal government should say how these existing plans are going to fit in. Is he asking that they call all these together—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: No, no, no, but if this is the approach they are going to take they have never said so. This is a problem which will have to rest with the private pension plans; those who participate in them; those who sell them and those who administer them. If this is to be the basic approach to integration, why, that is it, and we would then know.

Mr. Thompson: Well, sir, the next question is for the hon. Prime Minister. It seems to me that there has been confusion that the representatives of the provincial government, I think including the hon. Prime Minister, have suggested that his provincial plan and the Quebec plan would have the great advantage that it would include widows and survivors. Yet as I understand, that with a change in The BNA Act, which would have to come at the initiation of the provinces, and I would say, sir, particularly the hon. Prime Minister's province, as he is the leader of the wealthiest province, that the federal plan will offer this coverage if he would agree to it.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We are apparently going to have a debate here. We agreed some time ago; I wrote to the federal government and signified that we would agree to an amendment to The British North America Act to provide for this. As a matter of fact, I think that point came up originally in the Diefenbaker government, and we signified then that we would agree. At that time the province of Quebec—I believe their approach was that they required more information. In other words, there was not unanimity among the provinces.

Mr. Thompson: There is in Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, there is relative unanimity in the last short period of time as the result of negotiations that have taken place, and as a result of various developments in the whole situation. Now, our position has been and always has been that we would agree to such an amendment to The British North America Act, but the fact was that there was not complete agreement between the provinces, and of course without complete agreement you cannot have the amendment. Therefore, until that agreement came about we constitutionally could provide something the federal government, I have no doubt, wants to provide, but simply is unable constitutionally so to do. Now, they can and they speak in the legislation of survivors, but a survivor there must be 65 and that brings it into another area and that is as close as they can come. I think a pension plan without survivor benefits is rather like a bird with one wing. It is a part of the plan that should be there. Certainly we would never block the federal government in their attempts to provide this in their plan, but the real fact was there was not agreement at that time. Perhaps there will be now out of these current negotiations—I would hope there would be.

Mr. Thompson: Well, sir, I thank the hon. Prime Minister again. If I could for my own thinking clarify what I feel the hon. Prime Minister has said, first with respect to the existing plans and the integration of the existing plans. He feels that one of the quandaries has been that the federal government has never made a clear statement in connection with how they are going to integrate these plans.

And he would feel—I realize that over the floor of this House we are not asking you to make commitments but that one of the things that you would wish is that they would say: "We will proclaim the policy for the contributions and the benefits and any existing plans have to adapt themselves to that." I am not saying that you would agree to this but at least you think they should come out with some such statement.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well, if that is going to be it.

Mr. Thompson: Yes. And then, sir, the next thing that I would like to clarify is with respect to the widows and survivors, that the hon. Prime Minister is saying that a problem had been—and we refer to Quebec—that Quebec possibly might not have given permission, and it would have to be a unanimous consent by the provinces?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well, in fairness to Quebec, I must say that it was not put that way.

Mr. Thompson: No.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: It was put on the basis that they wanted more information. The net result was that the amendment could not take place.

Mr. Thompson: I now appreciate that it is clarified that Quebec would include widows' and survivors' allowances, then for your part as the representative—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Does the hon. member mean in the Quebec plan?

Mr. Thompson: No, I am not speaking of the Quebec plan. Again I have been trying to keep in touch with this, but I understood that Premier Lesage had mentioned that—I read this in the Globe and Mail during the discussions—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I think if things worked out well for him in these negotiations, I am quite sure that he will agree to it.

Mr. Thompson: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: And I do not think that he is trying to block it. Nonetheless, I am just giving you the facts as I saw them and as I knew them and I will not make any comment on it other than that. I think he has intimated, at least I have read in the press where he said that he is satisfied to agree to such an amendment.

Mr. Thompson: Might I say that another point that I felt that the hon. Prime Minister had wanted to get clarification on with respect to the Canada pension plan was in connection with who was going to handle the investment funds. As I understood it, the hon. Prime Minister was saying that the federal government with his approach would give 50 per cent to provincial projects for the provinces to invest, or the federal government would handle the funds but 50 per cent of the funds would be in provincial projects. The hon. Prime Minister has suggested that he wanted 90 per cent for provincial projects, and if this condition was met would the Prime Minister have a great warmth toward the Canada pension plan?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well certainly, my approach on this particular point was based upon what the province of Quebec stated very clearly. Mr. Kearns, the Minister of Development there, said they wanted a personal plan because of the investment, because they wanted the investment funds.

The federal government has access to all kinds of money for financing. Its fiscal capabilities, if I may put it that way, are much greater than those of any province. Here they are going to come into this province and collect one or two per cent from the employee, and one or two per cent from the employer. Now, why should that fund not be left in the province to work on behalf of the people who are paying it in? Then if the federal government wants various national projects that it must finance, it has all the other means of financing these things which we, as a province, simply have not got.

This is the point, I said 90 per cent. There is an element of arbitrariness in these figures, but I thought if they were operating the plan and since it was their plan perhaps ten per cent would be all right. Roblin from Manitoba says 100 per cent.

Mr. Bryden: Does the hon. Prime Minister not concede that a national project may be of benefit to Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Oh my dear sir, I certainly do concede so, but do not draw that red herring across the trail. I am pointing out to the House that the federal government over a great many years has had available to it in the fiscal setup of our country, money. It has the Bank of Canada, it has all sorts of things that we provincially do not have. I see no reason why, if we are going to institute a plan where we are going to collect from the employee and the employer in this province, and only in this province, that money should not stay here. This is not going to cripple any national plan because the federal government has, in my view, plenty of financial capability to deal with national plans without saying: Well, we want this too. In effect it is a collection of money in this province. Why should it not stay here?

Mr. Bryden: But the legislation the hon. Prime Minister piloted through this House last year did not guarantee that any of the money would stay in the province.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Perhaps not, but it was not controlled by any government either.

Mr. Bryden: It was controlled by people responsible to nobody.

Mr. Thompson: I would say that I talked to my hon. leader (Mr. Oliver) and other of my colleagues and that from our point of view, we would feel that the basis of 50 per cent—of if you were suggesting more than this—has a very plausible argument to be handled by the provincial government. And this, sir, if I could add—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I missed the last point. Were you giving us a statement of the position of your party on this matter?

Mr. Thompson: Yes, sir. I, as I say, have talked to my hon. leader and to my hon. colleagues, and from our point of view, if you are going to the federal government and suggesting that you want a larger extent than 50 per cent to be provincial investments, we are in accord with this. Our great concern is, and indeed we hope you feel, that with these difficulties we can work out something which will be a Canada pension plan.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Right!

Mr. Thompson: And I would say with this—and it seems to me that this is the caution of a man skilled in legal debate or working in the courts of London or wherever it is, I do not know—that your approach seems to me on this to be one not of coming out and suggesting this is what we stand for, these are the conditions we want met, but it has been one of something like a skilled football player who swerves and twists and dodges in connection with it. I say this not critically because the thing that we are all after is to get a touchdown for the national pension plan. I would suggest, sir, that the hon. Prime Minister seems to have swung from the private plan to a public plan and we certainly have followed that situation.

I am not saying this in a critical sense personally because I think the hon. Prime Minister has watched developments taking place. The thing I think that interests us is that we are working toward the Canada pension plan. I would say if I could that this is meant to be a sort of continuation of my Budget debate, but frankly for my own part I have learned much more in connection with this. This is a very valuable contribution which the hon. Prime Minister has been kind enough to give us in elucidating some points.

Mr. E. A. Dunlop (Forest Hill): The hon. Prime Minister has made these points many times. Why do you not listen to them or read them?

Mr. Thompson: I was saying, sir, if you had been in the House when I first started, that the hon. Prime Minister at first appeared to be keen on a private plan. We were conscious of the benefits of the private plan. Then he seemed to swing toward wanting the federal government to change the amount of funds that it would have, and then he changed that and he was in favour of the Quebec plan.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: The federal government changed along the way too. This is the point I make. There have been so many shifts. And this is the other point that I make, it is only in the last six weeks that we have ever seen a piece of legislation.

Mr. Thompson: Well, sir, I appreciate that.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Up until that time we have been talking about—

Mr. Thompson: Perhaps the hon. Prime Minister would talk to the hon. member for Forest Hill then, when he is making his statements.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I am not criticizing the federal government on this account. All I am saying is, we have had a real public debate over the whole question of pensions. Much of this I suppose could have been done in the back room but in the events of this particular piece of legislation and in the fact that it was thrown into the provincial election campaign last year, it resulted in public debate on matters that under different circumstances might very well have been solved in a much less public and quiet way.

I do not think it is necessarily a bad thing, but if you are going to develop something like this you cannot take rigid positions and say that from this position I will not budge. The second you do that then, of course, in my view, you destroy the possibility of eventually coming up with refinements and changes which will give us in the final analysis, a better plan.

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate this very much. One of the problems—perhaps one of the opportunities—has been that there has been a fluid approach taking place on both sides. But at some point, it would seem to me, in the horse trading or in anything, you have to know what both sides want.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I realize, Mr. Speaker, this problem and I have said this before, that really at the Quebec conference I think it became finally and unalterably clear to everybody that we were not going to be able to achieve a national plan as it had been thought of up to that time. This was the very positive idea I brought away from that conference. Then immediately we started to look at the possibilities of developing a plan here ourselves, having been satisfied from that conference that Quebec was unalterably out. Even since that time, to show you how this changes, there have been further negotiations taking place between the federal government in Ottawa and we may very well come up with something different. In the meantime, we are going ahead in the province and will, in due course, if things remain as they are, we will in due course, come up with a concrete position based upon the fact that we were able to decide at the Quebec City conference that finally we were convinced that Quebec was not in.

But even prior to that conference there were reports of government spokesmen saying that Quebec may be in, but I came away from that conference firmly convinced that they would not be. But as I point out to you, even at this very moment, negotiations are going on which may bring yet other changes, so it behoves us all to maintain a pretty fluid position so that we are not backed into any corners and committed to any course of action we might find difficult to change, always within the context of the best for Ontario and Ontario within the larger scope of Canada.

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate this and I appreciate that your position is still one of watching developments.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: At the same time we are building up our own positive position—

Mr. Thompson: Yes, but I think something that concerns most of us, like you: Does this mean that we are working toward a Canada pension plan? In a statement which you made recently, you said that even though Quebec would come into a Canada pension plan you may still not come in.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I do not recall making that statement. I really do not. My position has always been that if there was a national plan we would be in it. If there was a plan for all of Canada we would be in it and as I have said, perhaps it might not be so advantageous to Ontario as something else but that we would accept just as at the conference in November last—there were things which came out of that conference which were not necessarily advantageous. In fact, they were anything but advantageous to this province but I said then, if that is the price Ontario pays for Canada, we pay gladly, and we do not want any other province to feel that this is their right; this is what our country is, we must have this type of sharing.

Mr. Bryden: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. Prime Minister would bring in the bill of which he gave notice on March 4, we could all get in on this dialogue.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, this is getting into too much question and answer. I think I shall have to confine it at least to the member who is making the Budget speech.

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that you have provided the leniency which you have and if I could say, sir, in connection with my Budget speech that one of the things that certainly has concerned us is this terribly important thing to Ontario and to Canada and, frankly, I think that there has been confusion on this and, if I could come to another area, that it seems to me that when we are thinking of Confederation—I can understand that when the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario goes to Ottawa and when he negotiates, perhaps he does not want to show all his hand to this Legislature and consequently it would go up to the people with whom he is going to negotiate, and I think that the hon. Minister of Public Welfare, when we were asking him what points he was going to make in connection with shared costs agreements, said that he did not want to show his hand when he goes to Ottawa and so he would not tell us.

I would suggest, sir, that particularly in connection with Confederation and the discussion that is taking place on federal government and provincial rights, I think it would be helpful not only to the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario, but to the people of Ontario. It would be helpful to him if he would tell us more of what his approach is going to be, because he may find, for example, that from all sides of this House he is going to get a unanimity in connection with this approach. I think this would give him a more solid bargaining position. As he says, "I speak for the whole of Ontario—for every party in Ontario."

I would say again that I appreciate he does not want to do this because he wants to go there playing things close to his chest. With respect to this, and I will come again to the hon. member for Forest Hill, because I would say I thought he had a very fine idea, perhaps I am inclined to say it was a fine idea, because I also had the idea. But I would say I think it is this idea of having a permanent office set up in connection with experts studying the situation of federal-provincial negotiations. Surely this would be most beneficial. I read with interest his article in the Toronto Telegram. One thing I was not clear about and I guess I am not allowed to mention—making a speech here, not asking questions—but I am not sure whether he wants the office set up federally, and I assume he would, but I also assume that his emphasis was to have some such office set up provincially for the province of Ontario, Mr. Speaker, and as I suggested to the hon. Provincial Treasurer, I thought this should be done and I think this might be helpful if there was the technical ground work being laid out, because when we really get down to it, apart from the sentiment that we have toward Confederation, the basis for continuing that Confederation is that we should be able to work out the financial relation, the responsibility between the federal government and the provincial government.

Sir, my speech has not quite taken the pattern that I intended it to, but I sit down saying this, that I think we all, on all sides of the House, understand that the hon. Prime Minister is working toward the best for all of Canada and he still wants to see that the conditions for the citizens of Ontario are sufficient that they will also benefit but his priority is that we are Canadians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Our party seems to have a one-two punch today.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): The hon. Prime Minister made most of the previous speech.

Mr. Troy: I must say I have enjoyed very much the tête-à-tête between the hon. Prime Minister of the province (Mr. Robarts) and the hon. member for Dovercourt (Mr. Thompson) and I am sure many of us are appreciative of the information we have had this morning.

Some of the hon. members, I think, too, are appreciative of the question that I asked the other day of the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrobe) and in his answer he said that there would be a statement issued the following day. I asked him by whom and he said then, Texas Gulf Sulphur Ltd. Whether that sparked the drive towards the brokerage offices, I do not know, but I understand some of the hon. members of the House were very happy yesterday because of events. I should think because of these capital gains and unearned increment that the possibility is good that there might be a little commission to the one who asked the question. So I am ready for any advances in that regard.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Ten per cent?

Mr. Troy: Well, ten per cent will do, it will help me pay the bank for my election debts.

Seriously though, the announcement by Texas Gulf of the very fine strike in Kidd township in the Porcupine area, is very, very welcome news not only to the people of northern Ontario, who will benefit by it most, certainly to the town of Timmins and to our Ontario government-owned railway. There is no question about it, that it will mean a great deal for the ONR and I hope that very soon, within the next year or two anyway, that there will be production and that then, the chairman and his members and the hon. Minister responsible for the operation of that railway (Mr. Simonett) will be quite happy that they can reduce their deficit or wipe it out entirely.

Mr. Speaker, I will say something later on in this speech about the operation of the Ontario Northland. At the moment, I just made that reference to Texas Gulf and the mining industry, and I certainly think, sir, that we should make changes in our mining laws in this country, at least in this province.

It is my understanding that many of the townships of Ontario, northern Ontario particularly, are patented land and in a great number of them no work is done at all. It is much different in the province of Quebec where there are no patents. A company gets concessions and it must work on them a certain amount of work yearly, and then each year I understand that parts of these concessions are reduced, so they must continue work. Surely, if there were amendments to our mining laws so that these companies that have these patented lands and not doing anything with them, if they were compelled to do a certain amount every year, there is no question about it in the minds of those who know—and judging the geological formations and other conditions—that very likely there are in northern Ontario even more valuable ore bodies than have been uncovered already. And probably some day, too, as the hon. Minister of Mines pointed out, there will be diamonds discovered in northern Ontario. The formation seems to be there and so other sections of The Mining Act should be changed also. It seems to me, judging by the people in the business, that is, the operators, that it takes a lot of red tape in regard to registering of claims and that sort of thing. Of course, the old-time prospector has a difficult time now because the helicopter and the airplane are in the business and so it affects the man on the ground. But I say again that since mining is one of the great industries of Ontario, particularly northern Ontario, anything that will advance that particular phase of our industry, is all to the good, not only for the section of the province in which I live, but for all Ontario.

Now, the tenor of the debate so far on the Budget is quite different from the Throne debate. I notice in the Throne debate the young hon. members who came into the Legislature last September were sometimes quite critical of certain phases of government policy. However, I must admit that the hon. member for Armourdale (Mr. Carton) was very critical about The Department of Highways. Unfortunately, through other circumstances, I was not able to be present when The Department of Highways estimates were on, because I had certain problems to discuss, but that will have to wait until another day.

But I notice that no longer do we hear the critical and the very healthy observations. Now it is almost paeans of praise for the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan), and there does not seem to be any qualms of conscience at all for the support they gave to their hon. leader in the campaign. I remember at the end of the last session, we had the hon. Prime Minister up visiting and talking about each thing being done, after each statement. Now, probably at the end of this session, he can go up and say “done” but it will be spelled a different way and it will have a different meaning. It will be an extra bill for those who ride the automobiles and the trucks and also those will pay hospital insurance.

The hon. Provincial Treasurer used a very appropriate day to present his message to the country. It was the first day of Lent, Ash Wednesday. And that period is only 40 days of fasting but it will be 40 months or more of fasting for us because of these increases.

The increase in hospital insurance has been roundly criticized by my hon. leader, the distinguished representative from the riding of Grey South (Mr. Oliver), and I shall limit my comments to just one sentence, that this new type of hospital tax which will be increased on the 1st of July of this year will fall heaviest on those of our citizens who are least able to pay, the low-income groups, the underprivileged in our communities. Other speakers from this side of the House have already made cogent arguments against the latest imposition, and sad to relate, these apparently fell on deaf ears. I was interested—I just happened to get back to the hotel last night after the closing of the House in time to hear “Viewpoint” on the CBC featuring the hon. member for Oxford in the federal House. He pointed out that the Opposition in any parliament has a very definite role and its role is correspondent to the government in one way, that it is important and it must offer criticism and it must offer it where it is justified. I certainly think on many occasions in this House the criticism made by the hon. members of the Opposition, particularly some of the debates so far, has been definitely justified. And again I say it has fallen on deaf ears because we have had these increases in taxes. I noticed an editorial in the Globe and Mail, I think it was, about the province and its burden, and that the Premier had the courage to announce that there would be necessary increase in taxes. It is unfortunate that he did not have that courage during the campaign because it might have made some changes in the result. At least they would have known beforehand just what they were going into.

Now, hard on his return to power, he warned of new taxes and many of my constituents heard the message and they figured, “If there are going to be new taxes, let us tax luxuries,” and we did get the increase in the liquor control board. I do not know who is getting it, but at least I know the government is getting a certain amount and also the distilleries.

Then the gasoline tax. An automobile nowadays is no luxury. Certainly in this Metropolitan area, most of the people who come to work in the morning would never get to work unless they had automobiles. The same in my own area. The people that work in the industries, the people that work in the Ontario Hospital come from all over. A lot of them come from the riding of Parry Sound and the western areas. They would never get there unless they had the automobile. They say it is a mode of transport nowadays and it certainly is not a luxury. There might have been some justification throughout the years for the gasoline tax item.

I think it was imposed by the federal government throughout the war. I was not here, but I understand it was and then afterwards the provinces took it over. Originally my understanding was that the gas tax was for the improvement of our highways but then the former Prime Minister of this province changed that and now it goes into general revenue. If it had been for our highways there would be some justification. We would get it back, the trucking industry and the motorist, in highway improvements, but now it is channelled into revenue. My understanding from those that were here at the time and know more about it than I say that the former Prime Minister of this province said this is it, and of course when he said anything that was it. Now from reports I have received from my colleagues who were on the committee on accounts and public accounts, it is doing a very good job of digging. No holds are barred and the committee is given free rein and the privilege of sitting between sessions. It is quite possible and certainly not improbable that they will find how money has been wasted in government operations and that is one of their purposes. Certainly with this great amount of money that it costs to operate this province nowadays, any savings are worthwhile. Possibly some senior officials may have been waxing fat. It gets them back on the road again, with a chance of showing the leadership they should have.

Again, Mr. Speaker, this brings up the point that the hon. member for Dovercourt, the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald), and the hon. member for London South (Mr. White), I think it is, brought up about commissions. There should perhaps be some official who would let people know their privileges and their rights in all things. It seems to me though, it would be much better if the members of the Legislature had more or less a full-time job, not necessarily in the House here, all the time, but that they meet far oftener.

There are all kinds of commissions operating in this province, and boards. This session, it seems to me, would be an ideal time, with so many new hon. members, to give the new members some idea of the workings of the various departments of this province. We have the committee on commissions. Before the committee came the ONR for an hour or two, the liquor control board for another hour, the liquor licensing board another hour, and that is all. But we get no idea how these bodies operate; not a chance to delve into conditions of these operations. If we had sittings oftener as committees and with commissions for two or three days at a time, then we would know the workings of the departments.

There are very few in this House, for example, who know much about the Ontario Northland Railway. They know very likely that the hon. member for Rainy River (Mr. Noden) is the acting chairman and the hon. member for Cochrane North (Mr. Brunelle) is also on the commission. They know there is a line that runs from Toronto and goes north, but very little about the operation of the board. I think if we had more time—as I say, the members should be full-time members, not, as I say again, not necessarily sitting in session all the time, but taking a much more active part in the operation of government. I have other things to say about the ONR later.

In Medicare and in the medical bill, there is as you know, a committee sitting, or it has been sitting. It is the Dr. Hagey committee. I do not know when it is going to make its report. I understood this bill was to go in operation in 1965, is that it? It probably is postponed.

Then, in this morning's Globe and Mail there is a report about the Ontario Medical Care Plan. The headline is, in this Globe and Mail of Friday, April 17, "Ontario Care Plan Cost to Cities Staggering." The head of the welfare department for the Metropolitan area said this. One of the reasons is because this suggested bill will not include coverage for prescription drugs, dentures, glasses and other items relating to welfare costs.

I know in my discussions with doctors in my own riding in regard to Medicare, one of their great concerns was in regard to prescription drugs. I know there are all kinds of doctors, particularly the country, who have on their books probably $50,000 or $60,000 and more but they may never get paid. They have to have deliveries of babies and the doctor is there. The appendix is taken out and so on and the doctor may send a bill but in many cases he may never get paid. But if you get a prescription, you go to the drug store, and in most cases it is cash on the line. Nowadays with the new drugs—they are very, very expensive—and there is nothing as far as I know in the Medicare bill that will make provision for drugs.

It is the same way with the optometrists. The situation is absolutely ridiculous as far as I know it. The great bulk of optometrists, under the provisions of the suggested bill, have no privileges. If a person wants glasses and wants them under the bill, he can only go to an ophthalmologist. Now there are very few of them compared to the optometrists. After all, the optometrist gets four years of training. He is able to provide the refraction benefits. He is denied that privilege under the bill.

Then the whole committee seems to me overloaded toward the medical profession. I have all kinds of headings here. They all want to be in Medicare. This is from the Telegram of January 7, 1964. This says: "Medicare should be compulsory and paid for through taxes, the Ontario government was told today."

This brief was from the Ontario Association of Social Workers and a brief was presented by the president of the Canadian association, Dr. Elizabeth Govan. She said the government's proposed health plan would divide the province into two classes, first- and second-class citizens, based on the ability to pay premiums. Some people would go without medical care rather than ask for help, she declared.

Then the optometrists, and I think they had a most valid point, submitted a brief through the president of the association, who happens to be very well known and comes from the city of North Bay, who claimed that the oculist, that is the medical specialist in eye care, was favoured by inclusion in the bill, while optometrists who were not medical doctors were being overlooked. I certainly hope that when this committee makes its report to the hon. Prime Minister—I presume it will be to him or to the Cabinet and not the Legislature—there will be recommendations for including services other than just medical, because the government's bill, it seems to me, is not a health bill, but a medical bill only. These services provided by the dentists, by the optometrists, by the chiropodists, by the chiropractors and the osteopaths, are all health services. In the compensation board, a person is directed by the board to go under certain conditions to the osteopaths or chiropractors and the account is accepted, so these services should be considered also when the final bill is drafted and presented to this House.

As E. F. Attridge, president of the College of Optometry, said to the committee, Bill No. 163 is just what the doctor ordered. One of the members of the committee, also one who apparently asked an awful lot of questions, was a representative of PSI. In fact, at times, from reports, he got so insistent that he had to be brought to task by Dr. Hagey, the chairman. Incidentally, I do not think he is a medical doctor. He is a doctor of philosophy, the president of the University of Waterloo. So I certainly urge the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) and the Cabinet as a whole that when the bill, whatever the number will be, is presented to the House that certain of these conditions will have been considered.

Now, on legal aid, I have a motion on the order paper that says that legislation be enacted to provide in Ontario a reasonable system of legal assistance modelled after the methods now employed in the United Kingdom. The hon. member for Lakeshore (Mr. Eagleson) has already spoken on that subject. I understand, too, there is a special committee now sitting to consider legal aid, and I will not dwell on this too long, but it is an important thing in my mind that everybody should have an opportunity to get legal aid if necessary.

I will just read into the record here certain things. This is from Canada Month, and the heading is:

WHY LEGAL AID IS NEEDED TO STOP COURTROOM INJUSTICE

The principles that weld a democratic state are few and simple. Among them is the right of the individual to equality before the law and the protection of the law specifically guaranteed by the Bill of Rights.

And they say that unless the accused can be assured of counsel then the law does not fulfill its purpose. Certainly in recent days we have found all sorts of conditions; people languish in jail not realizing they can get legal aid, no bail allowed, or not having bail, and these things cry to heaven for some justice. I know that the county of York Bar has for some time considered the changes in the system of legal aid, and I say again that there is a committee sitting. As a layman I have studied the provisions for legal aid in the United Kingdom and the city of New York where they have legal aid and the public defenders system of the United States. It seems to me the British system is by far the best of the three. The public defender, to my mind, particularly when a public defender is appearing against the Crown attorney, they are both employees of the government and there might be a possible conflict of interest there. In the British system the most important thing, it seems to me, is that when a person is apprehended or summoned, there is attached to the summons and posted also in the jails articles or bulletins indicating just what his rights are under legal aid and what he can get. In our country I do not think there is that provision. So the important thing is that every person hailed before the courts should know that he has the privilege of getting assistance.

Then I think in the past it has been that a great number of those who appear for a client are just young lawyers with not much experience. Again in Britain it is now changed and the legal profession applies the ways and the state applies the means, and there is a fair remuneration for the legal profession in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Speaker, I just call to your attention from the publication Obiter Dicta, which is the newspaper of Osgoode Hall for the profession at large. I presume that means everybody, not the profession at large outside about which I am talking now. One of the headlines is: "Haines Raps Aid System". The Haines referred to is Mr. Justice Edson Haines, long an outspoken authority, as it points out, on legal aid. He delivered a strong and very thought-provoking address to the large audience and drove home with resounding force that the present legal aid service provided in this province fell very short of the mark.

So, maybe I am presumptuous as a layman in telling the Legislature what should be done, and whether it should accept this system or that system. The main point, I think, that we want to get across is that we are all concerned with the rights of the individual. Certainly every man should be considered innocent until he is proved guilty, and he has a much better chance of not being proved guilty if he has qualified counsel. I am sure the new Attorney General, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Wishart), is a very reasonable gentleman, I certainly have been very much impressed with his attitude both in committee and in this House so far, and I think that he is quite receptive of ideas. Anybody with experience of life in northern Ontario knows that we respect very much there the dignity of the individual and the dignity of man, and I am sure that he will some time soon bring in legislation which will change the present conditions.

During the debate so far there has been much talk of hospitals, the scarcity of beds and so on, and one of the hon. members—I think the hon. member for St. George (Mr. A. F. Lawrence)—mentioned that we should, in regard to Sunnybrook Hospital, with all the vacant beds there take some action. That brings up the matter of veterans' hospitals. One of the main reasons that there are vacant wards in Sunnybrook is the fact that they have not got the staff. That is one thing. I understand negotiations are going on very satisfactorily with The Department of Health and with Metropolitan Toronto and the federal government to take over certain sections of Sunnybrook so that arthritic patients of the Wellesley Hospital will be admitted; that is, the patients will be put in Sunnybrook for the time being until Wellesley is ready.

Now I do not think there is any veteran in this country or any member of any veterans' organization who wants to keep Sunnybrook or any other veteran hospital just as the sole preserve of the veterans, if there are a great number of wards vacant, but a veteran who has a pensionable disability by his very right must be admitted into our veterans' hospitals. But there is another section of the treatment regulations which is most important and which gives us the most concern. That is section 13 of the treatment regulations which helps and permits a veteran who has no pensionable disability, to be admitted to hospital. If he goes to Sunnybrook or any veterans' hospital, his income is considered and adjusted and when he gets in the veterans' hospital the important thing is not only that he gets the hospital care, but he also gets the medical service of the doctor. It is included. He does not have to pay for that singly. It is included in the whole bill. Then afterwards, with the adjustment, he gets the bill from The Department of Veterans' Affairs and in some cases he pays, and in a good many cases he does not.

Now if the veterans' hospitals were taken over as community hospitals, the question is, what is going to happen to that particular type of veteran? You say they can be admitted under the Ontario Hospital Services Plan into a community hospital. Sure they can be admitted because they have the hospital insurance. The only thing they get in the community hospital is ward care and the hospital services, but they would have to pay the doctor's bill. That is the "if," the stickler between the veterans' organizations and The Department of Veterans' Affairs. Certainly I think it is quite right that the veterans' organizations should know definitely where they stand on this matter.

Now I come to another project which is of great concern to the people of this province and the people of Canada and also to the people of the United States. There are many, I presume, in this House who have read recently of the suggestion of a canal from the Pacific Ocean across to the Mississippi River and in fact right across the United States. There is also talk of a canal which would bring the waters of the Pacific, by various methods and existing rivers and so on, into Lake Superior and then down into the Great Lakes system.

There is another scheme—another very important scheme. It is called the Grand Canal—Great Replenishment and Northern Development. It is the scheme of Mr. T. W. Kierans of Sudbury. It also envisages a canal and the main purpose, of course, is to bring water to southern Ontario to fill up the great reservoirs of the Great Lakes. But it also is so that this water eventually can be sold as an export to the United States.

Some day one of the resources we have in this country which will be among our greatest assets will be water. There are 40 million people in the central United States now and as industry develops there and the country grows, they will need more and more usable water. In the next ten or 20 years probably, and maybe the next generation, there will be an increase in population up to more than 80 million in that area.

At the present time, I understand, the levels of Lake Huron and Georgian Bay are away down and the only two ways of increasing the level are by precipitation, and that is in the lap of the gods, and by diversion. I understand though, that last year when water was very scarce the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Sargent), the mayor of Owen Sound, was able to produce water. I do not know if he was the rainmaker, but I understand that the rain came. Then the trouble was that it continued and they wanted him to stop it. But the magician can sometimes bring things but he cannot stop them. So there are two ways in which you are going to get water; by precipitation or by diversion of the waters that now flow into Hudson Bay and James Bay so that they flow down into our Great Lakes system.

It is a fantastic scheme, the scheme that has been presented so far, but of course things that now are commonplace were fantastic a few years ago. Who would ever have thought before the last war that we would have men now revolving around the earth, and that very soon we would be going up to the moon? All these fantastic things have come about, with Telstars in space sending back pictures from other lands. Who would have thought you could pick up your telephone and in seconds talk to Tokyo, or Timbuktu, or Saigon, or Timmins, or wherever you want? It is fantastic, and so is this particular project fantastic to the uninitiated, Mr. Speaker.

But I understand that to those who have studied it, that it is quite possible. I strongly urge the hon. Prime Minister of this province, when he meets again with the other Premiers across Canada and with the leader of the federal government, that they discuss the water.

The United States of America has spent millions and hundreds of millions in this country on defence installations which are situated in Canada but they are primarily for the defence of North America, particularly the United States. This project that envisages the diversion of the waters that flow into Hudson and James bays, I understand, is going to cost millions—perhaps $1 billion or more. But eventually, through the power that is developed and the sale of the water, it can be repaid. So I strongly urge that some study be given to it. Involved of course, are the province of Ontario, the province of Quebec and the states that border on the St. Lawrence and our Great Lakes system.

The Great Lakes in our country are one of the greatest reservoirs of water in the world, and probably one of the reasons why we have such a high standard of living in this country. I understand now even up in the Collingwood area they are concerned about the shipbuilding industry because of low water. It is the same in other regions.

They say there are two ways of getting the water, either from the rain itself or by diversion, and the latter is something which must be given some thought. The only thing that can be done first is to have the conferences, at least to get it on the road and to start it. Then there is a possibility that something may be done. I say again it is a fantastic scheme but things that were fantasy before are now commonplace.

Another thing that will arise out of this scheme also is a water route. There is no question about it if the dream of those who lived in Nipissing 50 years ago—if the Georgian Bay Canal had been effective the economy of northern Ontario would be entirely different from what it is today. Envisaged with this scheme is a water route all the way from the Gulf of Mexico right through, with a canal up to Georgian Bay, the French River, the Mattawa and the Ottawa. This great canal would be for barge traffic.

Just note here that Mr. Kierans was speaking to the Northeastern Development Association in North Bay recently. He said, with regard to getting shipments of goods from Germany, that he can ship from Germany via the Panama Canal to Vancouver and it costs only half as much as it does to ship directly by rail from Sudbury. I will read that again:

Mr. Kierans said it cost his firm about half as much to ship a product from a plant in Germany via the Panama Canal to Vancouver, as it did to ship directly by rail from Sudbury.

Water transportation is cheap transportation and with this scheme of the Kierans brothers we can have not only water but also an artery of commerce.

The Ontario Northland Railway will be discussed, I presume, with the estimates of The Department of Energy and Resources Management. However, there is a certain matter I just want to touch on briefly now.

On April 24, Train 47, which operates out of Toronto and goes north to Timmins, will make its last run as a passenger train. Then on April 25, Train 46, which comes south from Timmins, makes its last run as a passenger train. There are to be great changes in the transportation system of northern Ontario beginning April 26, and naturally there is a great amount of concern in various quarters.

Among those who have concern are the railway mail clerks because no longer will the fast mail be operated, I think, by train. The bulk of it will be done by truck. It means that something will have to be done about these 11 or 12 or more railway mail clerks who operate on the Ontario Northland. Some of them probably will have to be uprooted from their homes and moved to other places. I know there has been correspondence between the railway mail clerks and the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett) in this regard.

One of the concerns is the efficiency of the new service. The railway mail clerks will come off the mail cars and, I presume, will be brought into North Bay to the general post office there. Some of these smaller places will be terminals. For example, Cochrane will be a terminal. Now there certainly is no question about it that the railway mail clerk is far, far more qualified than a postal clerk in a small town because every year these railway mail clerks must pass very, very difficult examinations and they must get a percentage between 90 and 100 in order to stay on the job. I think that maybe—of course, time will tell, whether the new service is going to be as effective as the CNR and the ONR consider it.

And I understand we find divergent views.

The post office department said it was not their initiation, it was the initiation of the railways, and I presume that the ONR was moved because the CNR wanted to make the change. Naturally they found, because of their experience in the Maritime provinces, running from Montreal to the Maritimes, with their red, white and blue fares, they had much better traffic, in the way of passenger traffic, particularly in the coaches. As everybody knows, the passenger traffic in parlour cars and sleepers is not much of a paying proposition. So I presume the ONR was forced into the thing by the CNR. No doubt the change in the mail service has been forced by them, and since there is a change in rail transportation then the federal Department of the Postmaster General has decided to use the trucks for mail service.

There was a letter written to the secretary-treasurer by the hon. Minister on March 6, and I will read just certain paragraphs of what the hon. Minister says in his letter to the secretary-treasurer, Mr. J. A. Belland of Hull, Quebec.

From my understanding of your letter it is the feeling of the Canadian Railway Mail Clerks Federation that the changes presently being brought about in the express-freight programme in the Ontario Northland Railway will drastically reduce postal services for the public, and also that the Ontario Northland Railway will experience a considerable loss in revenue.

I am pleased to comment on these two main points.

—the hon. Minister writes. And now the effective change of postal service:

With the exception of the territory between North Bay and Temagami, all points being presently served by trains 46 and 47 are accessible by truck. It is my understanding through the Ontario Northland Railway Commissioners that The Post Office Department intends to provide service which is at least equivalent to, if not better than this service in effect today by either using trains 49 and 50 or the new express freight being placed in operation by the end of April, or by trucks between North Bay and Temagami. On the railway where those affected are almost entirely Ontario Northland Railway employees, the railway will make suitable adjustments for this service.

With all respect, therefore, I feel that the statement that delays up to 24 hours will occur in the delivery of mail is not entirely fair, at least as we see it at this stage of planning.

And then he says about the effective change on the revenue:

The annual report of the operating costs of trains 46 and 47 is between $550,000 and $1,200,000, depending on the amount of the indirect costs. Revenue from the mail is approximately $122,000. Part of this latter figure the Ontario Northland Railway expects to retain, because a portion of this mail will be carried on the new express freight train service. Any additional revenue resulting from the transport of passengers would not be nearly sufficient to pay the operating costs of these trains.

And the railway hopes to improve its revenues by the change.

Then he goes on to say just what happens with the removal of these trains 46 and 47. There will be no more RPOs on these trains and the handling of local mail will be done by highway vehicles, to be arranged by the post office authorities. So that apparently the hon. Minister and the ONR commission really believe that this will speed up service and the railway mail clerks, of course, have their stand that it will not, that it will be more costly, so I presume that time will tell.

The third vice-president of the railway mail clerks—Mr. K. G. Leason of Toronto—said in his letter of March 13. He answered the hon. Minister's letter. I will not read that into the record. But certainly the railway mail clerks take issue with both the hon. Minister and also with The Post Office Department. They feel that the changes will not speed up service, in fact that it will cause confusion in service, because there will be people working at terminals, particularly in certain sections of the north, who will not have the experience, and that it will eventually cause confusion. Whether that is true or not, I do not know. But in any event, it is now an accomplished fact. The advertisements have been out that on April 26 there will be a change in their service, so we will have to see whether that works out or not.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): How long is the hon. member going to be?

Mr. Troy: Well, I am just about finished now.

Mr. Oliver: If you can finish by one o'clock, I am not urging you.

Mr. Troy: No, that is right. Well, I had just better close. I have a clipping in front of me. I do not know whether I should touch it or not. I will use my own judgment.

It is something that rankles me. Just around the time of the visit of the people from the province of Quebec, the members of the Legislature and the distinguished Premier of that province came here and there was harmony everywhere in the House and in the meetings afterwards, the entente between Quebec and Ontario was very noticeable. Somewhere around the same time, I picked up one of the Toronto newspapers and I find this heading: "The Quebec clergy inspired separatism, says Saunders." The Saunders referred to is Leslie Saunders. I, unfortunately, have to admit that he was formerly a resident of North Bay. He is an East York councillor and at one time mayor of Toronto. He is reported as saying that the Roman Catholic clergy planted the seeds of discord when they came to this continent as missionaries.

Well, to me this is a strange stand, hon. members of the House. Why then, are we recognizing the contribution that the Jesuit missionaries made to the history of this country? As already pointed out by the hon. Minister of Tourism and Information (Mr. Auld), we are going to spend hundreds of thousands and maybe millions of dollars in the restoration of Fort Ste. Marie which was founded during the days of the Jesuits and I cannot see that they have inspired separatism. In fact, it seems to me that one of the things they have inspired is a union. So when one sees headlines like that, it always makes one wonder how far we are getting in our co-operation between various races and various creeds.

I will again, Mr. Speaker, refer to the fact that some of the hon. members made a little killing yesterday. I am not saying I was responsible, but at least there was a question asked and an answer given. I will close with that. I will have something to say later on the other matters as the estimates come up.

Mr. N. L. Olde (Middlesex South) moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): On Monday we will proceed with the estimates of The Department of Energy and Resources Management.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

MONDAY, APRIL 20, 1964

The House met at 3 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are pleased to welcome to the Legislature today in the east gallery students from Roden Commercial School, Toronto; in the west gallery, students from Forest Hill Collegiate and St. Francis of Assisi Separate School, Toronto.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Orders of the day.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to ask a question of the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman). He has had notice of the question.

Have the recently advertised vacancies on the staff of the Guelph Reformatory been filled, and is any consideration being given to increased salary scales for the staff of this institution?

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given notice of this question.

Question 1: Regarding the recently advertised vacancies having been filled; the answer is that most have been filled.

Question 2: Is any consideration being given to increased salary scales for the staff of this institution? The answer is that salary scales are set by the Civil Service Commission of Ontario and are uniform for the various classifications throughout the province. They are not scaled for any specific institution or locality.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts) for which, in the words of the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Troy), all the amenities have been met. I understand there is a similar question from the hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer).

What action is contemplated by the government in light of the Ontario Civil Service Association's allegations of "extreme bad faith" on the part of the government, leading to a breakdown in negotiation procedures?

Hon. J. P. Roberts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps this one answer will serve for this question and the question from the hon. member for Downsview which was: What further arrangement is the government making to negotiate with the Ontario Civil Service Association? I think this answer will meet both hon. members' questions at one time.

I was surprised, Mr. Speaker, to learn of the action taken by the civil service association in suggesting that there is a breakdown in negotiation procedures because I personally am not aware of any such breakdown. In fact, the members of the Ontario joint council, which you will recall we established last year, met as recently as this morning, in an official session attended by all members. It adjourned at noon today on a motion from the staff side.

I think the hon. members of this House should realize that the joint council derives its authority from this Legislature to negotiate any matter put on the agenda by the chairman at the request of a member concerning the terms of employment of public servants, including working conditions, remuneration, leaves and hours of work. If you will recall it was last year that we established in this Legislature the joint council, which consists of four men appointed from the staff side, as it is called, and four persons appointed from the official side. They serve under an impartial chairman who is non-voting. He is the chairman of the civil service commission.

As I say, included in the authority that we gave this council by legislation is the right to negotiate any matter put on the agenda by the chairman at the request of a member concerning the terms of employment of public servants, including working conditions, remuneration, leaves and hours of work. The rules of the joint council, and the reason we established it, are to provide an orderly method whereby members could place matters on the agenda of the joint council through a steering committee. The government does not participate directly in these discussions. The official side is composed of four representatives of the rank of deputy Minister within the civil service, who negotiate in good faith with the staff-side representatives.

The fact is that this council has met a good many times since being established and has come to a number of decisions with a far-reaching effect on such matters as overtime pay, superannuation Act amendments, compensation for standby time, and conditions of employment for unclassified staff. I think these matters that it has discussed indicate the council is taking its work seriously.

The last decision was approved by the council at a meeting held on March 12, and the council is continuing to consider matters on the agenda which have not been resolved up to the present time. I have asked for a report and I have been advised that the staff side has no submission before the joint council concerning rates of pay, and has placed no request for negotiation on such matters before the civil service commission which should precede the consideration of these matters by the council.

We in this Legislature approved of the bill containing sections 19(a) and 19(b) which constituted the collective negotiation arrangements. I personally do not interfere with the function of that council. Its activities and its proceedings are managed by the council itself.

Questions relating to the determination of pay for positions in the civil service come within the jurisdiction of the civil service commission, which alone has the authority to recommend to the Lieutenant-Governor in council on the revisions of salary rates.

I am informed that the association is wrong in suggesting that the government should interfere with properly constituted statutory authorities under The Public Service Act and with this I agree. I am advised by the commission that the rates of pay are constantly under review and salary schedules are maintained up to date. An example given to me is:

Two submissions dated by the commission March 18, 1964, effective November 1, 1963, approved by the Treasury Board and in turn ordered by the Lieutenant-Governor in council. They cover revision of salaries for forest rangers, conservation officers and other like classes in The Department of Lands and Forests, as well as the salary rates for engineers' assistants, survey technicians and highway construction inspectors, with a total cost of $449,920 in regard to the first group and $456,190 in regard to the second group. These pay increases affected approximately 3,000 employees.

In addition, salary rates for building cleaners were revised, effective September 1, 1962. This revision was made on March 26, 1964, and gave retroactive salary adjustments to 1,800 employees in these categories at a cost of over $355,000. These rates are based upon proper salary research. I am certain that the hon. members of this House support the work of the commission in this regard, and the foregoing apparently announced by the commission in a directive being sent out today in the regular method.

So, sir, I think that is an answer to the question. The machinery is there for negotiation. I would not interfere in it unless I felt there was something there that was not being properly handled. I am informed that these questions have not been put before the joint council.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, on a point of privilege. I would like to refer to a statement last week by the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrope) in answer to a question of mine. I had asked on that day for any pertinent information regarding the reported strike in the Porcupine area. The hon. Minister said that the next day a statement would be made. I asked by whom and he said by Texas Gulf Sulphur, the company.

According to a story in today's Telegram by Mr. Peter Bruton, a member of the press gallery, the statement was released by the hon. Minister of Mines, or at least The Department of Mines, before the stock exchange opened. It also went on to say that a number of hon. members on the other side of the House were able to make a little killing that day. Is that statement of his correct that it was to be by Texas Gulf Sulphur and not, as I now find, by The Department of Mines?

Mr. Speaker: Does the member wish to ask the Minister if he wishes to clarify or to answer the question?

Mr. Troy: Yes, would he clarify; and would there be any possible chance that there was advance information to some who made a killing?

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have all that information from the hon. member, because I had no knowledge of it previously. Texas Gulf gave the report to the Northern Miner,

I think sometime early in the morning, for release at 11 o'clock in that paper. When I discovered that I thought that the local papers here should be given some information so that they would not be left out of the picture and have the Northern Miner with the only release. So Mr. Mollison gave me the release that the papers got.

Now I think it was taken over to the press gallery. I do not know at what time because I gave it to my deputy to see that it was delivered there. This was Mr. Mollison's statement, not mine, and if it got out before the market, I know nothing about it. I read Mr. Bruton's story and I do not know who could have made any money, or who did.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Maybe the press gallery!

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I hope they did! That is the answer, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member. I know nothing about it other than that.

Mr. Troy: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. D. A. Evans (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I would like to bring to the attention of this House, some of the outstanding hockey achievements of the town of Bradford. Bradford is situated 40 miles north of Toronto on Highways 11 and 88. It is the centre of the vegetable-growing industry of Canada. It is also situated in the great county of Simcoe.

I had the honour of being Bradford's first mayor and now I represent them in this honourable House. We have a very small population, just a little under 2,500 people, but we have had many champion hockey teams.

In 1957-58, we won the Ontario intermediate "C" championship; in 1960-61, we won the Ontario intermediate "C" championship; and in 1963-64, we won the Ontario intermediate "A" championship, defeating Dundas in four straight games in the finals.

I would like to compliment Mel Irving and his team for bringing such fine entertainment and sportsmanship and honour to our town.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary) begs leave to present to the House the following reports:

1. Report of the board of governors of the University of Toronto for the year ending June 30, 1963.

2. Report of the president of the University of Toronto for the year ended June, 1963.

Hon. J. A. C. Auld (Minister of Tourism and Information): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I would like to rise on a matter of privilege just to set the record straight again. The letter I am speaking about is one to which the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) referred on Thursday last, but unfortunately I was a little late entering the House and heard only the last few moments of his statement. Without taking too much of the time of the House, I will just repeat from Hansard what my hon. friend said, and I quote:

Yesterday in the estimates of the hon. Minister of Tourism and Information when the hon. Minister was asked how much Dalton Camp and Associates got from his department for advertising purposes, he told us that in his opinion this was the only government agency from which Mr. Camp received money.

Actually, Mr. Speaker, the question from, I think, the hon. member for Bruce, was this:

Mr. Chairman, would the commissioner explain what the $67,000 was spent for on Dalton K. Camp and Associates?

And I replied:

Mr. Chairman, the commission's advertising programme was handled by D. K. Camp and Associates and probably has been as big a part in making the operation of the commission successful from the outset as any other thing. The breakdown—

And then the hon. member asked a question as to whether this came under tenders and I explained that one cannot call tenders for advertising but proposals had been submitted and Camp's had been selected. Then I gave the breakdown and my hon. friend thanked me.

But after the House rose, members of the press asked me further questions about this matter and I think the matter to which my hon. friend was referring was not what I had said in the House but what was reported in the Globe and Mail. Just taking the last paragraph, I quote:

He said the agency was chosen in 1960 from about four or five which had submitted presentations. The commission liked its work and has continued to use it. It is the only work the agency does for the province, Mr. Auld said outside the House, this allocation has nothing to do with Mr. Camp's political activities.

I think that is correct and the question that I was asked was for the current fiscal year and it was to that I was referring when I answered the question.

This is not a vital matter, Mr. Speaker, but I did want to have the record correct.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I would like to make a statement to the House concerning a telegram which I received from the Rt. hon. Prime Minister of Canada on Friday last. Mr. Pearson asked that this be kept confidential until this afternoon. I believe that he has tabled it in the House of Commons. I have respected his wishes as far as the contents of this telegram is concerned, of course, but I feel that I am now free to place this telegram before the Legislature in order that everyone may be aware of its contents. It reads as follows:

DEAR PREMIER:

SINCE THE CONFERENCE IN QUEBEC CITY AT THE BEGINNING OF THE MONTH, MY COLLEAGUES AND I HAVE CAREFULLY REVIEWED THE PROBLEMS THAT WERE DISCUSSED THERE.

AT THE CONFERENCE I REAFFIRMED WHAT I HAD SAID AT OUR PREVIOUS MEETING IN NOVEMBER: THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT FULLY RECOGNIZES THE INCREASING BURDEN OF PROVINCIAL RESPONSIBILITIES. THIS IS ESPECIALLY TRUE, AS MANY PREMIERS HAVE EMPHASIZED, OF EDUCATION. WE ALL AGREE THAT, WITH OUR INCREASING POPULATION AND WITH THE EFFECT OF ADVANCING TECHNOLOGY IN REQUIRING HIGHER LEVELS OF KNOWLEDGE AND SKILL IN MORE AND MORE JOBS, THE IMPROVEMENT OF EDUCATIONAL FACILITIES IS A PRIORITY NEED OF THE COUNTRY. OUR TAXATION ARRANGEMENTS SHOULD RECOGNIZE SUCH PRIORITIES. THIS MEANS, AS I HAVE SAID, THAT IN ORDER TO MEET THE NEEDS OF THE PEOPLE AS EFFECTIVELY AND ECONOMICALLY AS POSSIBLE, THE RANGE OF TAX RESOURCES AVAILABLE TO THE PROVINCES SHOULD BE INCREASED.

IT WAS IN THIS SPIRIT THAT, AT THE NOVEMBER CONFERENCE, THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT UNDERTOOK TO MAKE CHANGES IN THE FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS WHICH WOULD OTHERWISE HAVE OPERATED IN THE CURRENT FISCAL YEAR, 1964-65. THESE ARRANGEMENTS RESULTED IN INCREASED REVENUES TO THE PROVINCES OF $87 MILLION.

IN THE SAME SPIRIT, IN SPITE OF OUR OWN FINANCIAL NEEDS, THE PRESENT GOVERNMENT AGREES THAT THE ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE FOLLOWING YEARS, WHICH WERE MADE IN 1961, ARE INADEQUATE.

I THEREFORE PROPOSED AT THE QUEBEC CONFERENCE THAT WE SHOULD JOINTLY UNDERTAKE A REVIEW OF THE NATURE AND EXTENT OF FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL TAXES IN RELATION TO THE FINANCIAL RESPONSIBILITIES WHICH NOWADAYS HAVE TO BE CARRIED BY CANADA AND THE PROVINCES. THIS IS INTENDED TO BE A THOROUGH REVIEW, WHICH MUST TAKE INTO ACCOUNT THE FINDINGS OF THE VARIOUS ROYAL COMMISSIONS AND OTHER INQUIRIES INTO TAXATION WHICH ARE UNDER WAY AT PRESENT. IT THEREFORE CANNOT BE HURRIED.

ON THE OTHER HAND, AS WE SAID IN THE COMMUNIQUE OF THE QUEBEC CONFERENCE, THE TAX STRUCTURE REVIEW SHOULD NOT PREJUDICE THE EARLY SOLUTION OF FINANCIAL PROBLEMS. AFTER REVIEWING WHAT WAS SAID AT THE CONFERENCE, THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT HAS COME TO THE CONCLUSION THAT IT WOULD NOT BE IN THE BEST INTERESTS OF THE COUNTRY TO WAIT FOR THE RESULTS OF THE JOINT REVIEW, OR FOR THE END OF THE PRESENT FIVE-YEAR FISCAL ARRANGEMENT, BEFORE INDICATING TO PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS THE SCALE OF THE ADDITIONAL TAX ABATEMENTS AND EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS WHICH WE ARE PREPARED TO PLACE AT THE DISPOSAL OF THE PROVINCES IN FUTURE YEARS.

THE SCALE WHICH THE GOVERNMENT IS PREPARED TO RECOMMEND TO PARLIAMENT, IN DUE COURSE, IS EQUIVALENT TO AN ADDITIONAL ABATEMENT OF THE FEDERAL PERSONAL INCOME TAX OF TWO PER CENT COMMENCING IN JANUARY 1965, AND A FURTHER TWO PER CENT COMMENCING IN JANUARY 1966, IN ADDITION TO THE INCREASES AT THOSE DATES ALREADY PROVIDED IN OUR LAW.

THE OTHER MAJOR TOPIC DISCUSSED AT THE FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE WAS PENSIONS. TWO FEATURES OF THIS DISCUSSION SEEMED TO ME ESPECIALLY IMPORTANT.

ONE WAS THAT THE QUEBEC PLAN, AS OUTLINED TO THE CONFERENCE AND SINCE MADE PUBLIC, WAS IN MOST RESPECTS NOT GREATLY DISSIMILAR FROM THE FEDERAL PLAN.

THE SECOND FEATURE OF THE DISCUSSION WAS THE GENERAL SENSE, EXPRESSED PARTICULARLY CLEARLY BY THE PREMIER OF ONTARIO, THAT IT IS IMPORTANT TO THE UNITY OF OUR COUNTRY THAT OUR PENSION ARRANGEMENTS ACROSS THE COUNTRY SHOULD NOT SET UP OBSTACLES TO THE MOVEMENT OF PEOPLE, AND THEREFORE SHOULD BE NATIONAL IN CHARACTER.

IT THEREFORE SEEMED TO ME THAT I WOULD BE ACTING IN THE SPIRIT OF THE CONFERENCE IF I EXPLORED TO THE FULLEST EXTENT WHETHER THE TWO PLANS WHICH HAVE NOW BEEN FRAMED—THE FEDERAL PLAN AND THE QUEBEC PLAN—COULD BE BROUGHT TOGETHER.

I AM VERY HAPPY TO REPORT THAT DISCUSSIONS WITH THE GOVERNMENT OF QUEBEC DURING THE PAST TWO WEEKS HAVE SHOWN THAT THIS IS POSSIBLE.

UNDER THE PROPOSAL WHICH I NOW WISH TO PUT BEFORE YOU, AND IN WHICH THE GOVERNMENT OF QUEBEC CONCURS, THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT WOULD PROPOSE TO PARLIAMENT LEGISLATION WHICH WOULD ESTABLISH A CANADA PENSION PLAN AND PROVIDE THAT ANY PROVINCE WHICH SO WISHES MAY TAKE FULL RESPONSIBILITY FOR APPLYING THE PLAN TO EVERYONE EMPLOYED IN THAT PROVINCE. SUCH A PROVINCE WOULD PASS ITS OWN LEGISLATION TO ENABLE ITS GOVERNMENT TO ADMINISTER THE PLAN IN EVERY WAY, COLLECTING THE CONTRIBUTIONS, INVESTING THE FUNDS AND PAYING THE BENEFITS.

ALTERNATIVELY, IN PROVINCES WISHING THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT TO ADMINISTER THE PLAN, THE LEGISLATION WOULD PROVIDE THAT THE FUNDS ARISING FROM

THE PENSION PLAN SHOULD BE AVAILABLE TO THE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS FOR INVESTMENT. THEY WOULD BE DIVIDED AMONG PROVINCES IN RATIO TO THE PENSION CONTRIBUTIONS FROM RESIDENTS OF EACH PROVINCE. THE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT WOULD BE REQUIRED TO GUARANTEE TO THE PENSION FUND A RATE OF INTEREST AT LEAST EQUAL TO THE RATE ON LONG-TERM FEDERAL SECURITIES.

AS PART OF THIS PLAN, THE GOVERNMENT OF QUEBEC WOULD BE WILLING TO SUPPORT A CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT, TO WHICH OTHER PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS HAVE ALREADY AGREED IN PRINCIPLE, ENABLING THE FEDERAL PLAN TO PROVIDE BENEFITS TO WIDOWS, IRRESPECTIVE OF AGE, TO ORPHANS AND TO DISABLED CONTRIBUTORS.

THE FEDERAL PROPOSAL, CONCURRED IN BY QUEBEC, WOULD PROVIDE THAT PENSIONS SHOULD BE 25 PER CENT OF EARNINGS UP TO $5,000 A YEAR. THIS LIMIT WOULD BE ADJUSTED, AS WOULD THE EARNINGS ON WHICH BENEFITS ARE BASED, IN ACCORDANCE WITH CHANGES IN AVERAGE EARNINGS AVERAGED OVER A FAIRLY LONG PERIOD. BENEFITS IN PAYMENT WOULD BE ADJUSTED TO CHANGES IN THE COST OF LIVING, SUBJECT TO A MAXIMUM INCREASE OF TWO PER CENT IN ANY YEAR.

THE TRANSITION PERIOD PROPOSED, BEFORE PENSIONS REACH THEIR FULL RATE, WOULD BE TEN YEARS.

PENSIONS WOULD BE PAID ON RETIREMENT FROM AGE 65, BUT UP TO AGE 70 WOULD BE SUBJECT TO REDUCTION IF EARNINGS EXCEED SPECIFIED LEVELS.

CONTRIBUTION RATES WOULD BE DESIGNED SO THAT THE AVERAGE RATE IS 1.5 PER CENT EACH, FOR EMPLOYER AND EMPLOYEE, AT THE AVERAGE LEVEL OF EARNINGS. THIS MIGHT BE ACHIEVED BY PROVIDING THAT THERE WOULD BE NO CONTRIBUTION IN RESPECT OF EARNINGS UP TO $600 A YEAR, AND A RATE OF APPROXIMATELY 1.8 PER CENT WOULD BE PAID ON EARNINGS ABOVE THAT LEVEL, UP TO THE $5,000 MAXIMUM.

THE CONTRIBUTION RATE FOR SELF-EMPLOYED PEOPLE WOULD BE THE COMBINED EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RATE.

COVERAGE WOULD BE COMPULSORY FOR EMPLOYEES WITH SALARIES EXCEEDING $600 A YEAR AND FOR SELF-EMPLOYED PEOPLE WITH EARNINGS EXCEEDING $1,000 A YEAR. SELF-EMPLOYED PEOPLE EARNING BETWEEN $600 AND $1,000 MIGHT PARTICIPATE VOLUNTARILY.

I BELIEVE THAT THESE PROPOSALS ARE A SATISFACTORY COMBINATION OF THE TWO PLANS WHICH HAVE BEEN WORKED OUT IN DETAIL. I THEREFORE PUT THEM FORWARD FOR YOUR COMMENT. THE FEDERAL LEGISLATION WILL THEN BE PREPARED IN THE LIGHT OF THE VIEWS EXPRESSED BY YOU AND THE OTHER PROVINCIAL PREMIERS. WE ARE CONCERNED TO DO THIS AS SOON AS POSSIBLE.

THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT HOPES TO PROCEED SHORTLY WITH LEGISLATION PROVIDING FOR THE EXTENSION OF FAMILY ALLOWANCES TO CHILDREN WHO, EITHER BECAUSE THEY ARE NOT PHYSICALLY FIT TO WORK OR BECAUSE THEY ATTEND SCHOOL, REMAIN DEPENDENT AT THE AGES OF 16 AND 17.

BECAUSE THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC HAS AN EXISTING PROGRAMME OF A SIMILAR NATURE, THESE EXTENDED ALLOWANCES WILL NOT BE PAID TO QUEBEC RESIDENTS. INSTEAD, THERE WILL BE A COMPENSATORY FISCAL ARRANGEMENT SIMILAR TO THAT WHICH EXISTS IN THE CASE OF UNIVERSITY GRANTS.

IN THE LIGHT OF THE COMMENTS MADE BY PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS AT THE QUEBEC CONFERENCE, THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO PROPOSE ARRANGEMENTS WHEREBY GUARANTEED BANK LOANS FOR UNIVERSITY STUDENTS WOULD BE AVAILABLE IN EACH PROVINCE UP TO A DEFINED AMOUNT TO STUDENTS DESIGNATED BY SUCH AGENCY AS THE PROVINCE AUTHORIZES. IF ANY PROVINCE PREFERS TO RELY ON ITS OWN LOAN PROGRAMME, IT WILL BE ABLE TO RECEIVE EQUIVALENT COMPENSATION.

THE VARIOUS PROPOSALS IN THIS LETTER ARE MADE BY THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IN THE BELIEF THAT THEY WILL HELP TO UNIFY THE COUNTRY. I KNOW THAT ALL PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS SHARE MY BELIEF THAT THE WISHES OF ALL CANADIANS CAN BEST BE FULFILLED WITHIN A FEDERAL STRUCTURE, SO THAT THE RIGHTS OF THE PROVINCES ARE EXERCISED NOT TO THE DISRUPTION BUT TO THE ENHANCEMENT OF THE UNITY OF CANADA. IN THAT SPIRIT, I HOPE YOU WILL CONSIDER THESE PROPOSALS SYMPATHETICALLY AND LET ME HAVE YOUR VIEWS AT AN EARLY DATE.

(Signed)

Mr. Speaker, in commenting upon this telegram I would say first that it deals with two matters which were topics—it deals with four really—but two major matters that were topics of discussion at the federal-provincial conferences held both in Ottawa and subsequently in Quebec City in November of last year and March of this year.

The first of these matters is the increase in revenue required by the provinces if they are to carry out the responsibilities which fall to them and which grow constantly heavier. The government of this province welcomes the announcement that an additional two per cent of the personal income tax collected in this province by the federal government will be returned to this province commencing in January, 1965 and a further two per cent on top of that in January, 1966. These increases will be in addition to the one per cent increases in each of these years as provided for in the present agreements.

In other words, we have a five-year programme by which the abatement, as it is called, of personal income tax collected in this province increases by one per cent. What is being suggested here is that for the years 1965 and 1966 in addition to the one per cent, there will be an additional two per cent in 1965 and then an additional two per cent on top of that for the year 1966. We estimate that the new two per cent increases will bring to Ontario an additional $21 million in 1965 and $42 million in 1966, or an additional $63 million for the two years.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact, in answer to the question, Mr. Diefenbaker instituted the plan that provided for these increases in the first place and provided for a system of equalization payments, which was reversed by the present government in Ottawa last October or November.

Sir, this additional revenue, from our point of view, will assist us in meeting the ever-rising commitments we have—requirements for schools, universities, roads, health and, of course, our municipalities. We welcome this recognition of the needs that we put forward and have emphasized during the course of these conferences.

In this regard too I must say that we recognize and agree that the long-range studies decided upon at Quebec City will take time. At one stage there was something of a deadline being put on these and perhaps that deadline was related to the fiscal needs of the provinces. But in my opinion those inquiries over a long period of time are very fundamental to the future of our country and I do not think that those studies should be in any way hurried.

We are entering into a new concept of inquiry really, because this inquiry is not being done under the aegis of any government, it is being done under the aegis of a federal-provincial conference. Therefore it is being done at the direction of 11 governments acting in concert. This in itself is something completely new in the history of our country. If these arrangements will serve to give us what time is necessary—and I quite agree that these studies should be done as rapidly as possible, although on the other hand we have 100 years of history behind us and we have 100 years of history before us and I would not like to see the studies upon which these important decisions will be made hurried because of revenue needs of our province—but if it is expedient that this proposal of the federal government will lessen that pressure, apart from the fact that we are delighted to have the additional funds we can so well use here. I think the second effect of giving us time to do these studies is very important indeed.

The next matter in the telegram is pensions. I can say that I welcome heartily the announcement of the Prime Minister, sir, which indicates that it will be possible for us to have in Canada a pension plan with common terms, with common contributions, with common benefits which will extend across Canada from the Pacific to the Atlantic.

In our approach to this what perhaps could be termed a vexing problem in Canada in the last few months, we have always advocated and we have always proposed that a plan of this type would be the best for all Canada in that it would assure portability of benefits. That is where our pension discussions, at least in this province, started because we were seeking to provide portability of benefits for workers here. We were seeking also, of course, to help the older worker. In any event this type of plan will simplify administration for hundreds and hundreds of employers. It will provide the portability we all seek, and it certainly will simplify the whole question of pensions for many millions of employees. I am delighted that we have been able to find a solution that comes about in this way.

Mr. Sopha: Quite a change of heart—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I think not.

Mr. Sopha: I think so.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, while this telegram cannot be expected to set out complete detail—you will notice the wording of it: the Prime Minister has asked for comments from all the provincial Premiers—I would point out that there are several areas covered in it which agree with ideas which we have consistently proposed. The first of these, of course, is the one I have mentioned and that is that it be national in concept. The second is that through this proposal and through these agreements it will be possible to extend coverage under the pension plan to widows, to orphans and disabled contributors, and with the changes that have been made the plan will apply to even broader groups of our people. This, too, is something of which we have had some concern.

I might also say that under this proposal contained in the telegram, regardless of who might administer the plan, it provides that the control of the funds arising from the pension plan will remain in the hands of the government of the province in which these funds generate. We had a little conversation about this toward the end of last week and I believe we received some measure of agreement from my hon. friends opposite on the position we have taken in this regard.

These conclusions go a long way to meet the comments that we have made over the months concerning what should be included in a national plan, during the course of the very many discussions that have taken place.

Sir, there are details in the paragraph dealing with the amount of the pension and various questions of adjustment in benefits and contributions, and I can say in that principle what is set out here is agreeable to us. We are pleased with the basis on which the self-employed are included and we also agree with the compulsory features of the plan.

As I have said, the telegram asks for—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, when the time comes when we can make the necessary adjustments in order to produce for our country the kind of plan that we appear to be getting toward with this, I think that we will all have put ourselves in a much too inflexible position.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: To get back to the question at hand, I would say as far as I am concerned I am particularly pleased that it is possible for us in this country, by discussion and negotiation, to adjust our thinking in order that we may devise solutions to our problems which will be satisfactory to all of us and which will leave us with a sense of national unity and a feeling of confidence that while we may have differences, we are able to settle them in the best interests of all.

There is another matter I would like to refer to in connection with the pensions. The hon. members will have noticed as I read the telegram that provision is made to permit any province to administer the plan if it so desires. It does appear as one examines this situation that the question of administration will not affect the national character of the plan nor its availability to our citizens from coast to coast. Certainly the administration by a province of its own plan offers certain definite advantages and in particular it offers the right of consultation and discussion with the federal government in the event of any alteration in the terms and conditions of the plan. This might be achieved by a firm agreement between any participating province and the federal government that the conditions of the pension Act would not be changed without prior consultation and a reasonable measure of assent.

who are, in the final analysis, going to pay for it. It is vital, I think, too, to all the people of Canada in the other provinces, and it may be desirable and it may even be considered imperative that the participating provinces should have some discretion in the amendments that may be made to the plan in future. I think this is a matter that causes a good many people concern, as to whether we can devise some means whereby we can have stability in this plan so that it will not be altered every time we have a general election. This is a matter which will be discussed no doubt and I do not think any decision on this point is necessary at the present time.

I would like to deal very briefly with the final few matters that are contained in the telegram, the first of which is the extension of family allowances to children not physically fit or at school during the ages of 16 and 17, and loans to university students. Both matters were of concern to the province of Quebec, the first one because they have such a system of their own under which they are paying allowances, and then, of course, we all know what their attitude has been toward assistance to the universities. However, in each of these matters we have accepted the position of the federal government and have promised again co-operation and our organization to facilitate implementation of both these programmes in this province.

Finally, I would like to make it clear, Mr. Speaker, that we in the government of Ontario feel that this telegram and the culmination it represents of a great deal of effort and discussion and negotiation brings us a long, long way toward the national plan of pensions that we have sought. We offer our fullest co-operation in order to make it a reality and I feel perhaps even more than that, that we are pointing the way for methods and approaches which we can use to solve many more problems that will face us in keeping our country united and whole.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. Prime Minister would permit a question relating to the statement he has just made?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Yes, I would be happy to.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. Prime Minister would consider providing an opportunity at a reasonably early date for some or all of the matters referred to in the telegram and his statement to be debated in this House, and more particularly, the question of pensions, although I would suggest that some of the other matters are rather important too.

We have heard a great many statements from the government, as we should, but the House itself has had little if any opportunity to express its views on these very important matters. I wonder if the hon. Prime Minister might see fit to make some opportunity for us to do so.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I recognize what the hon. member is discussing. There will be an amendment brought in to our Pension Benefits Act which would provide some—

Mr. Bryden: The hon. Prime Minister is still planning to go ahead with that, is he?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We are going ahead with the portion of it that is applicable to the portability of pensions, which will be over and above any pensions covered by a national scheme. In other words, we have never ceased in our efforts to achieve true portability of pensions, not only in what might be a minimum scheme provided by the federal government or by the government of the province, but in those schemes that will be above that and which are financed privately. What I did undertake to do was to introduce an amendment to remove the lower area of pensions in that bill. In other words, on January 1, 1965, according to that bill, there are certain requirements placed upon those people in the province employing 15 or more people. That will be removed. I will introduce an amendment to the bill in order to achieve that. This may provide an area for debate on pensions, but I would be happy to make what arrangements are necessary to permit the matters to be discussed, because they are of importance to all of us.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): It could be done on that occasion.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It could very easily be. As I say—

Mr. Singer: By unanimous consent.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: There is an order of business that will deal with the whole question of pensions.

Mr. Sopha: I wonder if the hon. Prime Minister would also grant me the opportunity, the indulgence, of asking him whether he intends to make his views known to the government at Ottawa expeditiously and to continue negotiations with that government to the end that the pension legislation of the federal government will be dealt with this session at Ottawa?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I will deal with it as expeditiously as possible. I do not know what their plans are. This obviously is going to require, I would say, a complete rewriting of the bill presently before the House of Commons. Mr. Pearson says in his telegram that he will make the changes after some form of discussion with the provinces. I do not know what form this will take. I do not know whether this will require some form of conference again. I rather doubt that the thinking has gone so far as to make those decisions. But certainly we will press on and make our position known, and the answer to this telegram will go forward as quickly as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: Twenty-ninth order, House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY AND RESOURCES MANAGEMENT (continued)

On vote 601:

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I will not take too much time of the House this afternoon because, as I explained before, we will be asking many questions under the various headings that come under this particular department of government. But I might say that I was rather disappointed in the remarks of the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett) the other day when he did not dwell to any great length on his water management programme.

I think it was only two or three days ago in this House that the hon. leader of the NDP (Mr. MacDonald) suggested that the greatest single problem facing this government at the present time was organized crime in the province of Ontario. But I would suggest that an equally serious problem, and in my opinion, even more so, is the level of the Great Lakes and water tables throughout the province of Ontario. There are literally thousands of people who are very worried about the fact that the water in the Great Lakes has gone down so greatly, particularly this year. There are thousands and thousands of people whose livelihood is concerned in this—not only those people in the tourist business, but also in the shipping business, commercial fishermen and people such as that. I know in my own area it is an exception for one to see a tourist dock or a cottage dock that is now in the water. During this past weekend I visited some of the tourist areas in the Bruce Peninsula area and the water was down farther than I have ever seen it in my life.

Mr. Chairman, I am not suggesting that it is necessarily the position of the Minister of Energy to keep the water at a respectable level in the Great Lakes, as far as the province of Ontario is concerned. But I do suggest this, that it is a problem that must be faced not only by the federal government but by this government. We were disappointed on this side of the House that nothing was said about it in the comments of the hon. Minister in his report the other day.

I would like to read an excerpt from the Toronto Telegram which deals with this problem, to show the hon. Minister just how worried we are about it on this side of the House. It is dated April 4, 1964 and it is entitled:

LOW LAKE LEVELS COSTLY

Great Lakes water levels are critically low in some places, again bringing gripes and grief from the Lakehead to Montreal. Lake Huron, three feet below normal, has dropped to its lowest level on record dating back to 1860. The Lake Michigan level is almost as low. Lake Ontario was down two feet, Lake Erie about a foot and a half below normal, and Lake Superior one foot. The St. Lawrence river has plunged to its lowest point in 30 years between Kingston and Iroquois. Montreal harbour is thirsting for water.

The recent and unusually low amount of water, rain and snow, an unusually high amount of evaporation over the 100,000-square mile Great Lake basin, and water levels as fickle as the weather that controls them, have puzzled scientists, cheated shipping companies, played hob with hydro power and angered cottage owners for more than half a century. Scientists measuring lake precipitation say it has been eight inches under the 60-year average in the last three years. Evaporation has been correspondingly high. Low levels are expected to start rising in June before hitting a midsummer peak.

The low level repercussions are familiar and costly. Big cargo vessels cannot get into ports early in the season without cutting tonnage. Captain Bert Bazeley, fleet manager for Upper Lakes Shipping Limited, Toronto, says each of the company's ten large carriers is shipping 1,000 tons light every trip. It is the same story with other fleets.

Tourist operators, commercial fishermen and cottagers on Georgian Bay have literally been left high and dry. Heavier boats will have to be dragged to water which once lapped at boat houses and docks.

The water is so low at Collingwood that the town's main industry, Collingwood Shipbuilding Limited, may have to shut down, throwing 1,000 persons out of work. Says company general manager Alexander Webster, "The lake has dropped four feet in the last three years and if it falls another foot this year, we could go out of business." The company is hesitant about building new ships, afraid there won't be enough water to launch them. Two boats ran aground trying to dock this week. The town, company, and chamber of commerce are pressing the federal government to dredge the harbour, not done since 1932, to beat the low level crisis.

The situation is also serious at Owen Sound and Parry Sound. Georgian Bay residents blame the crisis on the dredging of the St. Clair River to eliminate navigation hazards.

Mr. Chairman, I think that this editorial or article describes the situation very well. I would hope that when the hon. Minister comes to that part of his department entitled "The Water Management Programme" that he might say something about this. This is something, as I said before, that affects the lives of thousands of people in the province of Ontario, not only in the problem of making a living. It affects thousands of cottage owners who have built expensive cottages, many of them, and who have built docks out into the water that are today completely high and dry.

In my own town of Wiarton, the federal government last year, or the year before, had an expenditure of roughly $100,000 in building a dock there and at the present time no boats can go into it at all.

I think that this government and this hon. Minister must have some answers as to the studies that are being undertaken, so that this problem can be looked into and perhaps something done about it. There have been various answers given, of course. It has been said in this House that there should be perhaps a diversion of water from Hudson Bay which would be terrifically expensive. It has also been suggested that there should be a dam or locks at Port Huron and Sarnia, but we would be interested to know what the hon. Minister has to say about this problem.

Mr. Chairman, I understand that the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Boyer) is going to say something about Ontario Hydro. The estimates for rural hydro come up under that particular department and at that time I will have something to say about hydro in the province of Ontario, too.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, before I commence my remarks, I wonder if I might have some clarification on an announcement that was made earlier and about which some uncertainty seems to have grown up.

Am I correct that the conservation estimate, 604, is to be left until The Department of Lands and Forests estimates?

Hon. J. R. S'monett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): No, I understand that they will come up under our estimates.

Mr. MacDonald: It will come up under this estimate?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): I think I was in the House when the hon. Minister made his opening remarks, Mr. Chairman, and apparently I misunderstood the procedure, so what I said was incorrect.

Mr. MacDonald: Fine, if it is coming up now, that clarifies that; and of course the Ontario Water Resources Commission and water management programme will be dealt with under this estimate now?

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Yes, but it will be dealt with by me as water resources Minister.

Mr. MacDonald: But under this estimate?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Correct; by this department at the right time.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I want to divide my remarks into roughly three parts. First, some comment on the department as a whole, since it is a new department; second, reference to our handling of natural gas, and particularly storage in the province of Ontario; and third, the Ontario Northland Railway.

Now if I may come back to the first one, this new department and its scope and its function, I want to say at the outset that my reaction is not one of agreement with the comments of the hon. member for Bruce. The fact, Mr. Chairman, that only a small proportion of the money that is being voted here is actually going to come under the immediate direction of the hon. Minister; that a great proportion of it is going to come under the direction of various agencies that report through him to the Legislature, it seems to me is irrelevant. It seems to me that the important consideration is that in this department we are seeking to provide for a co-ordinated and an organized approach to energy and resources management in the province of Ontario and in my view this is extremely useful.

As a matter of fact I can recall, Mr. Chairman, the early years in which I was in this Legislature, when natural gas was emerging as a new source of power, not only across this nation, but particularly in eastern Canada, and the policy issues related to the handling of natural gas were the orphan children of this government. They were bounced all over the lot. They were handled by one man, Dana Porter, who happened to be in a succession of departments, just because he had been involved with some of the early negotiations with regard to pipelines.

But there was no real study and concerted action by the government in terms of thinking through basic policies, with the result that something of an emergency situation developed and the government placed it under the direction of that human dynamo who has turned his energies in another direction—for some reason or another—the hon. member for Riverdale (Mr. Macaulay). Under his direction the department was organized and there was, for the first time, some serious coming-to-grips with this problem.

Now in my view, in the province of Ontario today the whole question of energy, basic not only to the needs of the people as residents but basic to our industry, the whole question of resources management and their husbanding for this generation and future generations is a matter that is of extreme importance. Rather than have them lost in the shuffle with other departments which are not charged with the specific responsibility of looking after resources, I think that this is a good move to have it co-ordinated within one department, particularly if we have a Minister who now becomes answerable for some of the major emanations of the Crown like Hydro, along with the hon. member for Muskoka who is on the Hydro commission, and the water resources commission and others, too.

I wanted to make that comment at the outset—if this Minister does his job, if the department does the basic studies for the formulation of policy, then this department can play an extremely important role, even though it may be responsible in the first instance for spending only a relatively small percentage of the actual money that we are going to be voting on when we complete these estimates.

If I may go to my second major point, with reference to natural gas and its handling in the province of Ontario, and perhaps for a moment place it in the whole broader concept of our basic policy with regard to power. Now the puzzling thing here, Mr. Chairman, indeed I would add the tragic thing, is that we in the province of Ontario have a traditional policy with regard to power. It is a policy that was laid down by the government of this province, indeed another Conservative government, but a government which faced up to the fact that power at cost is one of the major contributions to the economic development of the province. Therefore they moved, more than 50 years ago, to establish a publicly owned Hydro system across the province of Ontario in conjunction with the municipalities.

Tragically, when we moved toward the public policies for the handling of this new source of power from natural gas, the modern breed of Tories had forgotten the basic validity of the policies that were laid down years ago and they moved pretty directly toward a policy which would leave the handling of natural gas in the hands of private enterprise.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, I think leaving it in the hands of private enterprise is rather a weak way of putting it. They shaped a policy which directed that it would be handled by private enterprise. In other words, they were flying in the face of the very successful experience with the public ownership of power through Hydro.

I can recall, for example, the debates we had in this House, some seven or eight years ago now, when the government at Ottawa refused to consider the proposition of public ownership of the whole trans-Canada pipeline. Even, indeed, when the then leader of the Conservative Party, George Drew, insisted, after the serious mismanagement of that whole affair, that this was the only answer, that we should have public ownership.

Indeed, when the promoters of the trans-Canada pipeline refused to build the line in the one area that did not look immediately profitable—through the rocky and less heavily populated areas of northern Ontario—this government was willing to participate with the government at Ottawa in establishing public ownership for the development at least of the northern Ontario link of trans-Canada pipeline, and to do so in an arrangement which gives the private interests the right to be able to reclaim this whole development built on public funds at its original price, with any rentals payment in the intervening period to be deducted. So they are going to get a developed, highly valuable economic enterprise some years hence at the original cost price, all of it being developed on the monies of the people of the province of Ontario and the Dominion of Canada.

It is this kind of confused approach to the basic policies of public ownership or private ownership that we have seen. I remember, too, that this government was opposed to public ownership at the local level—for the local distribution systems. Indeed, the role of some of the men who sit today on the front benches of this government on this score is a rather intriguing one.

There was a meeting, in the formative years on this whole issue, held in the town of Timmins—a meeting chaired by the then mayor of Timmins, who sits today as the Minister of Municipal Affairs in the province of Ontario. That meeting, sir, was unanimous, or virtually unanimous, in supporting the idea of public ownership for the distribution of gas in that area. And yet the same man went out and participated from that point forward in the establishment of private ownership of the distribution of natural gas at a meeting of mayors and reeves for northern Ontario and subsequently in his varying capacity as a member of this House and as a member of the Cabinet.

I remember, for example, when the people of northwestern Ontario, particularly the Lakehead, determined that they wanted to have the distribution of gas in that northwestern part of the province under a locally owned company. They promoted Twin City Gas and then suddenly we discovered after all of the presentations of the people of the Lakehead in northwestern Ontario that the company was going to be locally owned and locally controlled, at the eleventh hour—under considerable pressure from the then fuel board, before the company was granted its certificate of economic feasibility, or whatever the correct term is—it was forced to sell half of its shares to the Trans-Canada Pipe Line Co., so that in effect it was reduced to a subsidiary. The net result of the whole effort, a manifestation of the policy of this government, was in effect to have led the people of the Lakehead and northwestern Ontario down the garden path in the belief that they were getting a locally owned and controlled company. In fact, at the eleventh hour, it became a subsidiary of the company against whom the people had decided that they wanted to have some opposition when they granted the franchise in the first instance to Twin City Gas.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, if there is any doubt with regard to my assertion that it has been this government's direction that we should have in the province of Ontario private ownership in the distribution of natural gas, I have an interesting testimony to document this. I trust I am not going to run afoul of the rules of the House on this one little excerpt, from the newspaper account of the testimony of Mr. Landreville a week or so ago downtown. In the Toronto Daily Star on April 14, Mr. Landreville, who was speaking of his experience some years ago when he was the mayor of Sudbury, said this:

The distribution of gas in northern Ontario was directed at the provincial level and even at the federal level.

He said that the Attorney General at that time, Dana Porter, now Chief Justice of the province, had told Sudbury representatives that there should be only one gas company in northern Ontario—if I may be interpolate: the whole of northern Ontario:

—and recommended it be NONG.

In other words, this government directed that NONG was going to get the franchise.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: But that is on unsubstantiated evidence that you are quoting from the newspaper.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, if this is unsubstantiated, it comes from the man who was mayor of Sudbury at the time and knows. And furthermore, Mr. Chairman, it documents what I have had from many other sources and learned to be the facts years ago.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): It came from a judge.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I do not think my hon. friend from Sudbury would accept that as evidence.

Mr. MacDonald: To continue:

The Attorney General made clear, Mr. Landreville said, that municipal ownership would not be approved because of its cost and the dangerous nature of natural gas.

Mr. Sopha: Where did he make this statement?

Mr. MacDonald: In the trial downtown, in the testimony. The interesting thing is that the two reasons given are because of its dangers, Mr. Chairman, and secondly because of the cost.

The only thing that would be different in the terms of cost is that it is going to cost the people more if it is going to be privately owned than publicly owned. There is just no argument on this proposition that with public ownership you can provide power at cost, and that cost will be less than the so-called power at cost if it is handled privately. As for the red herring drawn across the trail that because gas is dangerous it should not be handled municipally, this I must say is the first time I have ever heard that argument advanced.

However, let us now proceed to examine the up-to-date manifestations of this positively directed policy of private ownership in the handling of power as related to gas and its storage. I have related many times in this House what seems to me to be another tragic element in this government's handling of the whole use of natural gas in the province of Ontario. That is, that if we had had a publicly owned system it could have been integrated in a very intimate way with the exceptional natural resource we have in Lambton county—of something over 130 billion cubic feet of storage area. That integration with an overall system in the province of Ontario would mean that you could pump the gas in there during the summer off-peak season, and you could take it out and put it into the distribution systems during the rest of the season. You could thereby cut something like 25 cents per thousand cubic feet in the cost to the consumer. This is something that has been discussed many times. We have been beating our heads against a stone wall in terms of getting the government to recognize the basic validity of this—even in spite of the experience it has had with Hydro down through the years.

Let us see what has happened in recent months to complete this picture. Up until now Union Gas has had, for quite some time—exactly how long I do not have at my fingertips at the moment—control of 76 billion cubic feet of gas storage in Lambton county area—47 billion cubic feet of it is working gas storage area, the other 29 billion cubic feet is cushion gas. A considerable unused portion of gas storage was remaining in Lambton county. Recently the government moved to make this available to a new company, a joint company, Tecumseh, established by Consumers' Gas Company here in Toronto and the Imperial Oil Company, which had been involved in the field in the first instance because of its interest in oil.

Union Gas, during the time that it had control of gas storage and transmission through its own company, for which it built a pipeline from the Dawn field through to Oakville a few years ago, was charging in the range of 25.5 cents per thousand cubic feet—17 cents for storage and approximately eight cents for transportation. Some years ago, when Consumers' needed the protection of some storage area to be able to meet peak requirements, and I suppose also to deal with any emergency condition, it entered into a limited contract, limited in terms of the amount of gas that it would allow to go through Union's pipelines into the Dawn storage area and bring back when Consumers' needed it.

Mr. Oakah Jones, the president of Consumers' Gas, stated in public testimony or before the standing committee of the Legislature here, that one reason why the contract was a limited one was because the cost was exorbitant—that the storage and transmission costs were uneconomic. Yet the interesting thing that has happened now, Mr. Chairman, is that under the aegis of this government the rest of this storage area—some 56 billion cubic feet, of which 16 billion or so has been in the hands of Imperial and 40 billion cubic feet has now been handed to Imperial and Consumers' through the new company called Tecumseh—has been handed over so that the whole of this resource has now been handed to the three companies, either Union or Imperial or Consumers', the last two acting jointly through their subsidiary, Tecumseh.

For better or for worse, for all future years now, this great natural resource is going to be handed over to these three companies. The interesting thing to bear in mind is that as compared with this eight cents transmission cost or 17 cents storage cost—a total of 25.5 cents—we have down through the years the testimony—in one instance for example, of Mr. Crozier, the chairman of the fuel board—that storage could be handled for as little as five cents per 1,000 cubic feet. You have a comparable storage price or charge in Michigan, just across the border, of 11 cents. Here we are putting the stamp of public policy on a storage price of approximately 17 cents, which is going to be built into the rate base that is being charged to the people who happen to be buying their gas from Consumers' in the Hamilton-Toronto "golden horseshoe" area and east from here.

Now I want to present to the House, Mr. Chairman, my considered views as to what the overall consequences of this implementation of government policy are. The average family in the "golden horseshoe" and in the areas in eastern Ontario is now paying an extra $50 a year on its gas bill as compared with western Ontario, and government policies now being implemented will confirm this excessive payment in perpetuity. The tragedy of the situation is that an unsuspecting public is not even aware that its interests are being sacrificed for the benefit of Consumers' Gas Company and Imperial Oil.

The average residential rate for Consumers' Gas in Hamilton, Toronto and areas to the east, is $1.35 per thousand cubic feet. The average residential rate for Union Gas west of Toronto, throughout the whole of western Ontario, is $1.07 per thousand cubic feet. In this way the average family in the "golden horseshoe" area pays approximately $50 more per year.

Why? The reason lies in the fact that Union Gas has been using the storage basins of Lambton county so that they benefit from the advantage of cheaper off-peak summer gas coming in from western Canada. Consumers' Gas has been using the Lambton storage basin to some extent through Union's transmission facilities through Oakville to the Dawn Valley. But Mr. Oakah Jones informed the standing committee as far back as 1958 that the transmission and storage charges which Consumers' had to pay were so high as to price as to make extensive use uneconomic. And now the government is in the process of handing over virtually all of the remaining storage basin capacity, some 50 billion cubic feet, to Consumers' Gas acting jointly with Imperial Oil.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, what Mr. Jones was unwilling to pay to Union in the past is going to be collected through this new subsidiary owned jointly with Imperial Oil, and the extra charge to the consumer will continue in the future instead of dropping rates to those which Union has been able to offer.

An important point to be noted here is that this is government policy. The Sarnia Observer on September 6 last—the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Knox) is not here, I wanted him to hear this—in the midst of the election campaign carried the following front page story, and I am quoting:

Two competitive fuel companies, Imperial Oil and Consumers' Gas of Toronto, will form a joint company to make use of the underground gas storage facilities of Moore township. In an announcement today by The Department of Energy Resources, later confirmed by the Consumers'

Gas Company, nearly $20 million will be spent in preparing three underground gas pools in Moore for use as natural gas storage units.

That is the end of the quote.

Thus it will be noted that it was the government which took the lead in announcing this new development and Consumers' Gas tagged along with an announcement. Just to confirm that it was all a carefully timed election pronouncement, the same edition of the Sarnia Observer quotes the Conservative candidate, J. Ralph Knox, as hailing the news. He is quoted as saying that it was:

A tribute to the far-sightedness of the Progressive-Conservative government in Ontario. There are few things that go on in this province with which the Robarts administration is not familiar, stated Mr. Knox, and it is through the efforts of men of the calibre of Mr. Macaulay and his associates that the people of Lambton West benefit greatly.

Later on when we get a chance to deal with the estimates in detail, we shall pursue such issues as the vain efforts of the people of Lambton West to get equitable assessment on their gas facilities, and the relentless battle over the years on the part of the farmers to get a square deal on royalties. There is a great deal of evidence that suggests that the people of Lambton county, among others, are being exploited—and there are no huzzahs from the other side at that point, we seem to have got a short circuit in that wired-for-sound arrangement that sometimes operates over there.

But let us return to the position of the great majority of Ontario consumers in the "golden horseshoe" and to the east. Make no mistake about it, there is nothing far-sighted in this except to make certain that the gas consumer is going to pay exorbitant prices for gas transmission and storage, and because Consumers' Gas is now going to reap this profit through its own subsidiary, it is content with the situation. The situation which it deplored five years ago, it is now content with, because the uneconomic and excessive costs are going to go into their own pocket and they are going to do so by permission and approval through this government's policy.

Let us take a more detailed look into these exorbitant transmission and storage prices for gas. Alberta gas can be delivered in the summer months to Ontario for 33.5 cents per thousand cubic feet. Built into the ultimate price paid by the consumer is a figure of 25 cents for transmission and storage in Ontario. Just how profitable the gas transmission business is can be seen by recalling the fact that when the prospectus for the Ontario Natural Gas Storage and Pipeline Limited—this is the subsidiary of Union Gas that handles its storage and its pipeline from the Dawn pool to Oakville—was released in January, 1958, it was revealed that for the year 1962 they anticipated a gross profit of $3.688 million on a capital stock of only $9.51 million. That is a profit of 38 per cent on the money invested. These figures were accepted by the government and the energy board and have been included in the rate base. Now that Consumers' Gas and Imperial Oil have established their own subsidiary to be known as Tecumseh, these are the kind of profits that are in the making and the consumer is going to have to pay for them.

May I remind the hon. members that at one hearing in 1958 Mr. Crozier, chairman of the fuel board, was quoted as saying that he felt that gas could be stored for as low as five cents per thousand cubic feet, and further that storage charges just across the line in Michigan, in pools that are by no means as good as ours in Lambton, are only 11 cents per thousand cubic feet. Yet we have built in an 18 cent transmission charge which Union has enjoyed through its subsidiary for years, and now the government is going to permit Consumers' and Imperial to share in the same kind of profits through its subsidiary.

In Lambton county there is a joint gas committee representing consumers through Guy Tyndall, president of the Sarnia Labour Council; ratepayers through Gordon MacDonald, president of the Lambton Ratepayers' Association; and with Norman Wilson, president, and Byron Young, secretary, of the Lambton Gas Storage Association as its other members. This group has presented many briefs to the government. They have asked the government to freeze all these developments until we have a report on the issues that years ago were referred to the Langford committee—and we got no reply—and then two years ago were referred to the fuel board, from which we still await a reply.

The government has ridden roughshod over the interests of these groups. Union Gas has already been granted, some eight years ago, rights to some 76 billion cubic feet of storage space and now the fuel board has granted the remainder of this lucrative natural asset, a further 56 billion cubic feet, to Consumers' and Imperial.

As the Lambton joint gas committee has pointed out, if these storage facilities were handled as a publicly owned utility and integrated with the gas distribution system through southern Ontario, with a line looped from the western gas fields in Alberta, gas prices could be standardized throughout all of southern Ontario at a price between 90 cents and $1 per thousand cubic feet. This would be significantly lower than Union's present price of $1.07 residential rate, and greatly lower than Consumers' residential rate of $1.35 per thousand cubic feet.

If this were done, with storage and transmission rates fixed at something other than the present exploitive levels, the savings to each family in western Ontario under the Union distribution could be from $14 to $34 per family; and in the Hamilton-Toronto and eastern areas of the province under Consumers' distribution from $71 to $91 per family. Such is the price the consumers pay for government policies which are worked out to meet the interests of the distribution companies, not the consumers.

As the hon. member for Lambton West stated during the election campaign, Mr. Chairman, there are indeed few things that go on in this province with which the Robarts government is not familiar. Obviously it has been party to a behind-the-scenes deal in this case for which the gas consumer is going to pay through the nose for years to come. It was worked out so intimately that the whole development was carefully staged as part of the Conservative election campaign last September.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Prove it.

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, you want me to prove it, eh?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: You might as well.

Mr. MacDonald: We will not waste our time in trying to pursue the proof of whether it was a behind-the-scenes deal. The simple fact of the matter is that after years, they had worked it out and handed it all over to the companies, and did it during the election campaign.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Why do you always have to get down into the mud?

Mr. MacDonald: If I do, I will find you right there, sir.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Most constructive you are.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): You really don't hate us that much, do you?

Mr. MacDonald: I do not hate you. I sometimes have a deep feeling of sympathy, that is almost overwhelming when I listen to the fatuous comments that come from over there when a point really strikes home.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I like you, but I am ashamed of you at times. We do our best to keep you on the right track.

Mr. MacDonald: All I might add, Mr. Chairman, to that last comment, is that it is mutual, both the liking and the shame.

Mr. Chairman, I want to turn for a moment to the ONR. The ONR, I think, is of particular importance to members of this Legislature. It is true that it has relationship only to a corner of this province, but it is a corner which recent days have revealed is rich in wealth, and some of that wealth certainly flows to the benefit of the whole of the rest of the province. Further and most important of all, the ONR is a publicly owned railroad. It was built as a development railroad. We, sir, the members of this Legislature are, in effect, its board of directors and we are the people who should be shaping its policies. We have something in the nature of a personal responsibility and obligation, and it is that personal responsibility which I ask the hon. members to face up to.

I will say, Mr. Chairman, that we had a relatively useful meeting of the legislative committee on government commissions this year. The acting chairman of the ONR—he persists in “acting” instead of a full-time appointment; I do not know why the government is slow on this one—and the rest of his commissioners and the officers of the ONR came before the committee and provided us with the answers to many questions.

After that meeting was over, for a time some of my doubts and apprehensions with regard to what had happened were allayed. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that with further information that I got from various quarters in northeastern Ontario as a result of the revelations that came out in the news stories that flowed from that meeting, my apprehensions have been rebuilt.

I want to come back to a rather serious consideration of exactly what has happened here. In the first place, I think a great deal of the trouble that the commission now finds itself faced with in northeastern Ontario, is of its own making. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that there is a fairly valid case even for private industry—when it is going to launch some new development or some serious curtailment of its operations, which will have a great impact upon the communities in which it is operating—there is an obligation even on private industry to treat the community at large as co-operators in this venture and not present them with a fait accompli.

We have had many debates in this House as to the irresponsibility of industries that suddenly uproot themselves from a community and move out because they think it will be more profitable elsewhere, even though that community has sunk millions of dollars in providing the services for the industry, and even though its workers have sunk all of their life savings in homes in the community. The companies feel that it is their right to pull up stakes and move out on their own decision.

This government refuses to come to grips with this problem—with the need for shaping a policy so that under that kind of circumstance the community can be taken into the confidence of the company. If it can justify its move, at least the community can plan so as to soften the blow the community will suffer when the industry moves.

However, Mr. Chairman, if there is any doubt at all as to the obligation of a private company taking the community into its confidence, there is certainly no doubt at all with regard to a publicly owned institution like ONR. I come back to this basic point. I submit that the ONR has got itself into a pack of trouble because it suddenly presented a decision like a bolt from the blue—that is not quite accurate, there were a few weeks of rumours, but that just served to stir up the public—and then the commissioners went up to northern Ontario and tried to explain what it had already decided to do.

I think I will take refuge for a moment in some quotes from people in northern Ontario because I want to try to reflect the mood and feeling and reactions of the people of northern Ontario to some of these developments. If I make the comments, somebody on the opposite side of the House, particularly when the point is telling, will suddenly blurt out, what do I know about it in York South. So let me speak, Mr. Chairman, with the voice of a genuine northerner who lives with these problems.

For example, on this question of the manner in which—and this is what I am dealing with, and this alone for a moment—the ONR and the hon. Minister handled this whole matter. I have here a copy of the Timiskaming-Speaker for January 30, in which there is a column entitled "The Rambling Reporter" under the byline of C. E. Bond—

An hon. member: Published in New Liskeard.

Mr. MacDonald: Right. I am quoting from his column:

Ontario's new Minister of Energy and Resources, John Simonett, must be a real whiz-bang. The other day we received a notice that he was coming north on a fact-finding tour to find out just what the ONR or the government could do for the benefit of the north, presumably industrial-wise.

We noticed his schedule. He was allowing three hours for interviews at Porquus Junction, Iroquois Falls and Matheson. Then he was journeying to Cobalt and was allowing about a little more than an hour to hear representations from Cobalt and Latchford. After that, Haileybury was to take him there to hear its suggestions, and that was it.

No matter how good a man the Minister thinks he is, the time allowed for such a mission leads one to believe that there is either nothing wrong with the economy of this section of northern Ontario, or that the trip is just a gesture and that the Minister has come to a conclusion that nothing can be done.

Again, it could be that the trip is to draw a red herring across the ONR commission which is threatened with personal investigation by Arnold Peters, MP [whatever that is] and to kind of take some of the sting out of the attack by Timiskaming's member in the Legislature, R. A. H. Taylor.

I have not heard much about it so far. There has been no attack, let alone any sting.

We suggest if the government and the ONR are really serious about carrying out the slogan "Ontario's development road"—it is on every ONR freight car—then at least a reasonable opportunity should be given all municipalities in the area served, sufficient notice of such a meeting, with time to prepare representations and then have a sitting where the feasibility of the presentations could be discussed in an intelligent manner and acted upon.

Perhaps we are hoping for too much. Or are we? During the last election campaign, John Kennedy of North Bay, a member of the ONR commission, asked the writer what the ONR could do to improve conditions along the railway. We suggested at the time that perhaps the matter should be allowed to rest until after the election and that we could get a representative group together and really discuss the matter without any political slants. That was the last we heard of the suggestion. Mr. Simonett had acting ONR chairman Allister Johnston, and other members of the ONR commission in his entourage.

That is the first point I want to make—the mishandling of this whole affair; the appearance—and quite frankly I think it is a reality not an appearance—of presenting northeastern Ontario with a fait accompli. The people can protest all they want—there is not going to be any budging.

However, when we proceed a little further we find that there are other quotes from northern Ontario that I shall take refuge in as a fairly accurate representation of my views, but certainly a representation of the views of the people in northern Ontario.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, I was also interested, in reading through some of the clippings that I gathered on this, to discover that one of the commissioners from northern Ontario on the ONR, a man who was at a meeting that Arnold Peters addressed in Kirkland Lake—I will find it in a minute, I have too many things here.

Oh yes, here we are! My filing is like Fibber McGee's closet; it is not lost, it is just filed:

On January 22, when Arnold Peters spoke to the Rotary Club at Kirkland Lake, sitting there was one of the ONR commissioners, W. Roy Thompson of Kirkland Lake, who commented for the press at the end of it—and I just throw this in for the benefit of the hon. Minister of Mines since he thinks some of the things I am quoting from Mr. Peters are a little off base:

I do not agree with everything he said, but I do agree with his thinking.

Mr. A. Johnston (Parry Sound): I spoke to him about that.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. member told him he should not say that again, eh? Yes, I think there are a lot of people up in northern Ontario who are going to be told not to say that kind of thing again.

However, this is the reaction of northern Ontario. I am quoting once again from the New Liskeard Speaker, in an editorial on January 30:

ONTARIO NORTHLAND

The Ontario Northland Railway fact-finding safari left this district last Thursday evening with one fact: residents of the north are not satisfied that the ONR is in fact the development railway that it is touted to be.

Over the years it is becoming increasingly evident that there is a double interpretation of the term "development railway." Business men in the north interpret this to mean that the railway was built to give the north an even break with the south so that our manufactured articles could compete and that our necessities would cost no more than they do in other parts of the province. But for the commission, the development tag means the development of the railways as a successful and dividend-paying business, built with high freight rates, paid by the north.

It is hard for people in the north to believe that the Ontario Northland Railway Commission has done much more than use the original investment of $30 million to develop our railway and communications complex, now valued at $90 million, at the expense of northern industry and northern consumers. It is hard for the farmers of Timiskaming to believe that the Northland is a development railway when he pays from $10 to $15 more per ton for fertilizers and feed grain than his more fortunate brother in the south. It is hard for the homeowner to believe that the ONR is a development railway when he pays 20 per cent more for fuel oil and gasoline. It is hard for businessmen in Elliot Lake to believe that the ONR is a development railway when the commission has already called all section gangs from Kenabeek and there is a persistent rumour that the branch line is to be abandoned.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The hon. member said Elliot Lake; he does not mean that.

Mr. MacDonald: Elk Lake!

An hon. member: They insist on putting these rumours in these reports!

Mr. MacDonald: This is not a rumour, this is an editorial from the Temiskaming-Speaker. Are you saying that they are peddling rumours?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Is the Elk Lake line closed?

Mr. MacDonald: We will come to that in a moment, when we get to the details later in the estimates, we will discuss the rumours of closing, then the decision of closing, and the political influence that led to the re-affirmation that it would remain open—for how long, who knows?

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: Do not bring politics into this.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Minister of Mines is inimitable—let me put it that way.

The concluding paragraph of the editorial on which I was so rudely interrupted is as follows:

It is hard for anyone in the north to believe that the Ontario Northland Railway is in fact a development railway.

Whether the commission likes it or not, whether the government likes it or not, that is the overwhelming view of people in north-eastern Ontario, that you have forsaken the original objective with regard to this railroad. It is the view of practically everybody who is not so tied in with the Tory Party that he is silenced or expects he is going to be told by the acting chairman of the commission that he should not say something critical again.

What is the result of all this, Mr. Chairman? I think while I am quoting let me just put one more quote on the record. This is from the New Liskeard paper once again, January 30, and this is a front page editorial. This one is rimmed in black. I think there is some significance in this. It is entitled:

NEW COMMISSION

We never thought that the day would come when this newspaper could agree with Arnold Peters. But for once anyway we agree with the Timiskaming firebrand MP when he claims that a complete change in the composition of the ONR commission is needed.

Last week at Haileybury the ONR commission attended a public meeting. We witnessed the rather pathetic spectacle of an amiable group of politically appointed gentlemen being hammered at by all and sundry, and individually and collectively being incapable of justifying their position. In fact, it is fair to say that the commission has been sold a bill of goods by the management and was present to cover up its employees' sins and errors rather than to present any basic policy before the people of northern Ontario.

The commission members were clearly surprised at the number of people who attended the meeting, they apparently had no idea of how strongly the people of this area feel about the ONR. This is hardly surprising, for how much do the commissioners know about the area served by the railroad? With the recent death of Mr. Aubert at Englehart, there is only one commissioner, Roy Thompson—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Aubert was not on the commission at the time of his death.

Mr. MacDonald: Was he not?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No.

Mr. MacDonald: He must not have made a good enough Tory, that is the only comment I have to make, because if there ever was a substitute for the Senate in Ontario, a provincial Senate, it is the ONR commission.

—there is only one commissioner, Roy Thompson of Kirkland Lake, who comes from the area served by the ONR. The only other northerner on the commission, Rene Brunelle, MPP for Cochrane, lives at Moonbeam, which is not served by the ONR. Many business people feel that to properly serve the north the ONR commission should be composed of representative northerners, each distinguished in his own field. Agriculture, industry, mining, forestry and distribution should each be represented on the commission. Now while it may be necessary to consider politics when making the appointment, knowledge, experience and ability and residence in the true north should be the prime qualifications. Certainly one thing is obvious—

I read this with a degree of sadness because it is truer than perhaps the members of the commission would care to admit:

Certainly one thing is obvious, the present commission is nothing but a rubber stamp for a management that can see no further than the nearest dollar bill. What is needed, desperately, is a commission with courage, imagination and vision; a commission which will refer to its original and historic terms of reference and devote itself to the development of the area.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: In other words he thinks they should be criticized—

Mr. MacDonald: He not only thinks they should be criticized, but I would suggest to the hon. member that he has done a rattling good job of criticizing.

Now there is the feeling of the north, there is the attitude of the north towards this whole development. Let us get down to some of the basics in the situation on which, I must say to the hon. Minister and to the acting chairman of the commission, that the more I ponder them the more I wonder why the commission panicked into the decisions that were made this year. For example, I have here the second last annual report, not the one that has just been given to us last week for the year 1963 but the annual report for the year 1962, the year ending December 31, 1962.

On page 4 of that report I read this:

The earnings position of the commission was substantially improved for the year 1962 with a net revenue of $349,848.27 as compared with a net amount of $12,309.14 in 1961.

In other words, the year before this panic move was made, you had the commission itself, in its audited statement, in its report to this Legislature, stating that the earnings position had substantially improved and had risen from $12,000 to $349,000.

What happened last year? Last year, admittedly, a number of things happened that are documented on page 3 and again on page 11 of the new report for the year 1962. It is pointed out, for example, that on one hand the poorer earnings position is due in the main to an increase in operating expenses of roughly $1.1 million, and it attributes this to increased wage costs which in 1963 amounted to approximately four cents an hour increase. Just let me pause there, Mr. Chairman. I do not think anyone—I hope there is no one—who would say that a four-cents-an-hour increase in the year 1963 to the employees was an exorbitant increase in wages. And it was partly due to the accelerated programme of equipment maintenance.

A little later the commission points out that the main reason for the drop in revenue was because of the New York strike which resulted in a sharp drop in the amount of paper that was delivered over the ONR through the lengthy duration of that strike. Indeed, I think, that in itself amounted to a loss of approximately $500,000. Then there is a reduced scale of passenger fares, and this has resulted, presumably, in some sort of a drop. But when you go to examine the over-all position of the company you will find that its position in 1962 was a surplus of $877,000 and in 1963 it was a deficit of $64,000. You have approximately $900,000 variation in the net position of the company, one half of which, it concedes itself, arises from a drop in freight earnings because of the paper strike in New York.

Moreover, the commission itself says the investments in communications are going to bring larger returns. This is noted in the 1962 annual report. Further, the commission says that by the end of 1964 or the beginning of 1965 there will be increased traffic because of the development in mining in the Boston Creek area out of Kirkland Lake. I had the opportunity of seeing that development during the election and I can vouch for it as a promising kind of development.

In other words, the moves of the department were taken one year after it commented on its own stronger earning position, a year in which it had a non-recurring drop in revenue—one can assume that the paper strike is not going to be repeated—and the prospect of increased revenues from a variety of sources—communications and the mining development outside Kirkland Lake, to say nothing of the mining developments which may be coming outside of Timmins, if half of what we are reading in the papers today comes true.

I would agree, Mr. Chairman, that if this commission can provide more efficient services, there is justification for changes. But whether there is need for cutting the services while providing greater efficiency in the manner that the commission has, it certainly has not satisfied a great many people in northern Ontario and the rumblings of discontent continue. There are many detailed aspects of this question that I want to come to when we come back to the ONR estimates as a whole. But I wanted to deal with the over-all policy at this stage, with what I think was the mishandling of the situation by the commission; with the feelings of the north in forsaking the development aspect of the railway, and with what seems to me to be a degree of panicking this year in face of a temporary drop in revenues and the prospect of increasing revenues that may have made some of this panic action unnecessary. As to the details, I shall leave them until we get to the estimate itself.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, after listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Bruce the other evening and again this afternoon, it would seem that his main concern first is whether there is a need for this department, and I am sure I can answer that. It is the policy of this government that we have this department.

Then after listening to the hon. leader of the NDP this afternoon, he agrees with the government, although we have two schools of thought. I would suggest to the hon. member for Bruce that I think this department will continue and I am sure that whoever is the acting Minister he will have plenty to do.

An hon. member: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Simonett: He also mentioned this afternoon his concern regarding water in the province of Ontario and especially in the Great Lakes. I would like to state now, Mr. Chairman, that this week it is my wish to announce to this House a policy regarding water in southwestern Ontario. Our main concern first is water for human consumption and for livestock use. I am sure when we make this announcement this week that perhaps the hon. member for Bruce will agree with me and with the government that this might be a start to remedy this situation that they were faced with up there last year.

As regards the water in the Great Lakes, I am sure that we on this side of the House are as concerned as anyone, but I would say that I would think it would be a federal matter and we are willing to co-operate with any federal department to remedy this situation. Just to back up that statement I would like to read from the federal Hansard, Monday, April 13, where the member for Parry Sound, Mr. Gordon Aiken, asked this question:

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Northern Affairs and Natural Resources.

Is the Minister ready to make the statement on the water levels of the Great Lakes and Georgian Bay, which he promised last week?

Hon. Arthur Laing: Mr. Speaker, this report was prepared. I read it but I was not too happy with this. There are further discussions.

Mr. Nowlan: You are not too happy with what, the water levels or the report?

Hon. Mr. Laing: I thought there was not enough water in it. I expected to make the report tomorrow.

Mr. Aiken: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker? May I assume that the Minister is asking for an objective report on whether some action can be taken to remedy the situation?

Hon. Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, it would still appear that the best thing we could do is pray for rain.

And I think we could all agree with that and it would solve our problems but perhaps that is not the answer.

And again on Wednesday, April 15, when the leader of the Opposition, Mr. John Diefenbaker, asked this question of the Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson:

Mr. Speaker, the question I wish to ask has to do with the critical situation with regard to the water levels on the Great Lakes, a matter that greatly affects potential shipping this year as well as carrying with it detrimental effects in various fields of endeavour.

I would like to ask the Rt. hon. Prime Minister whether, in view of the fact that the situation is most serious—for example, the Lake Huron water level being at its lowest since records were first kept in 1860—any negotiations are being undertaken at present with the United States with respect to the Chicago conduit which draws off 3,000 cubic feet per second of drainage from the Great Lakes, and whether there is any co-operative plan now being considered by the governments of Canada and the United States with regard to this very important matter that will affect the economies of our two countries.

And the answer by the Prime Minister, L. B. Pearson:

Mr. Speaker, I share the right honourable gentleman's appreciation of the seriousness of this situation that seems to be cyclical on the Great Lakes but which is certainly very serious at the present time. I am not aware at the moment of conversations which may or may not be going on with the United States concerning this matter, but I will be glad to look into it and make a report to the House at the earliest possible date.

So I would say, Mr. Chairman, after those remarks, that it would be a federal matter and that we in Ontario would be only too willing to co-operate at any time in this matter.

The hon. member for York South, as I said before, agrees that there is a need for this department. Of course he did not say there was a need for its present Minister and I might agree with him on that, but nevertheless I am very happy to see he agrees with the government and that there is a need for this department.

He spoke of natural gas and I took from his remarks that it is his feeling that natural gas should be distributed in Ontario, or should have been at the time of its inception, by a Crown corporation. Now I would expect him to say that, but I would say that there are two schools of thought regarding it.

Mr. MacDonald: The right and the wrong!

Hon. Mr. Simonett: The right and the wrong, and I am sure that the one we are using today is right, whereas the hon. member is sure that the one he talks about is right.

Let me go back, and I do not know too much about natural gas at the time it first started to come into Ontario, but I think if any Minister had brought before this government the facts and the cost of bringing natural gas into the province of Ontario some five years ago that he would never have got it through here.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, they made lots of money.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Let me say this, since I have been Minister of this department last fall I have had very little complaint about any gas company in the province of Ontario.

As I said earlier, there are two schools of thought. We have one school of thought today, and I have had more people since October 25, or last September, come in and tell us that Hydro should not be a Crown corporation.

Mr. MacDonald: Does the hon. Minister agree with them?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: No, I do not.

Mr. MacDonald: Why does the hon. Minister not agree with them?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Well, because Hydro was set up as a Crown corporation and it is operating and I think doing a good job. I would say the same about the gas in the province of Ontario; they were set up as a private enterprise, they are serving the people, and as I said earlier there are very few complaints and have been since I have been down in that office.

Mr. MacDonald: They are all screened before they get to the hon. Minister.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Well, I do not know who screens them.

Now he mentioned the ONR, and of course this has been a topic in the north country during the last six months. When he mentions this he only mentions one particular town on the ONR where there has been any opposition to the proposed change—not proposed now, it is going to be a change on April 26.

Mr. Troy (Nipissing): Oh!

Hon. Mr. Simonett: The hon. member for Nipissing says "Oh", but there have not been too many complaints out of Nipissing, outside of a very few. He could pinpoint them and so can I, because I have been in Nipissing, or in North Bay, several times since I took over last fall. After all if you are going to run a department I do not think you would expect the Minister to spend six months up on the ONR and still look after the work down here. I think we have met with those people, I know we have. Most of them we met with were satisfied with our explanation and satisfied to go along with this new service.

In fact, we think we are improving the service, not curtailing any service to the people in the north. As I said to most of the municipal representatives with whom we met, we would be willing, after six months, to sit down and review this and if the commission were wrong perhaps we can make adjustments then that will do the things that the commission has told to me and told to the people in the north that this new service will do.

Mr. Troy: You must follow the actions of the CNR. Your operation must tie in with theirs.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Well, all right then; he agrees that we cannot do anything and that we will go along with the CNR, is that what the hon. member says?

Mr. Troy: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Then the hon. member has answered the question of the hon. member for York South so I will not need to go any further on that, but I doubt if that is just right. After all, I think if the government felt that this service was not going to be adequate that we could do something about it and would do something about it.

Now I would say, Mr. Chairman, that the rest of the questions I would rather answer as the votes come up.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might just draw this to the attention of the hon. Minister. I neglected this during the course of my remarks. If he thinks the protest is concentrated in New Liskeard I shall table here a copy of a petition which has been circulated and he will notice that the names are from anywhere from North Bay to Englehart to Virginiatown to Larder Lake. It is not just the New Liskeard area protesting the moves that the commission has made.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I might say, Mr. Chairman, that petition never was presented to me. I heard about it but I have never seen it. I do not think the hon. member for York South puts too much stock in petitions, because I find you can go up and down the street and get people to sign for and against if you ask them. I do not think we should pay too much attention to that.

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Chairman, under vote 601, would this be the proper place to ask about oil and gas lease forms?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: No.

Mr. Spence: Well, what vote would you discuss it under?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Oil and gas leases, 602.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): I wish to make some remarks about pollution of our rivers and lakes and some measures to ameliorate this. Would this come in a general way under 601 or do you wish me to make it specifically at some other vote?

Mr. Chairman: Vote 605.

Mr. Young: Under 605? Thank you very much.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, could you answer my question? Under what vote should I discuss oil and gas leases?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Vote 602.

Vote 601 agreed to.

On vote 602:

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, at the opening of the remarks of the hon. Minister he stated that there were new finds of oil in south-western Ontario and I think he named the places where different oil finds are situated. Since that time there have been a lot of companies leasing land for gas and oil.

Now there are many forms of gas and oil leases. On my desk here this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, I have five different forms that are used for leasing properties for gas and oil. One company may use one form and another company may use another form. When you look at these gas lease forms, the first thing you notice is it is all made out in fine print. Of course, that is one of the things that has frightened me all my life, that is the fine print, and after reading some of these forms over I would say that the fine print is not to the advantage of the lessor.

Mr. Chairman, we are out of the dark ages and I think that these oil and gas lease forms could certainly be in larger print, because many of the lessors in this province have been gypped, have signed these leases and after they have signed the leases found out that they had signed something that they did not think they did.

I would like to say that there are too many different kinds of lease forms; and also that in these oil and gas lease forms, the fact there is payment of rent should be made a lot clearer. Some of the lessors have to give 90 days notice to the lessee that he is in default as to payment of rent, and then the lessee is given 90 days to correct the situation, which means a half a year.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, that in many cases the term of these leases is for 20 years, so if the lessor makes a mistake, it is practically a lifetime before he can correct that mistake. I would say that the term of these leases should not be any more than ten years. If a company cannot develop these properties in ten years, I do not think there is too much hope in 20.

I would like to say, through you, Mr. Chairman, to the hon. Minister, that there should be a standard lease for all companies leasing property in the province of Ontario. The term of these leases should not be any longer than ten years and the fine print certainly should be enlarged.

I would like to hear from the hon. Minister on this.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. member for Kent East I would agree with him that if a standard lease form could be developed that would fit under all circumstances, that it would be an ideal situation.

I would think that the gas companies would go along with that, providing one would be developed, but that seems to be an impossibility because you are dealing under different conditions on practically, I suppose, every lease.

With regard to the fine print in any lease, I would think that these are all two-party agreements and that anyone should check with their solicitor before signing a lease for 20 years. I would think that with a lease of that many years, surely they would check the fine print in order not to get into any trouble and I think you would agree with me, sir, although these things would be nice, I do not think the government could force upon any company, or anybody, any type of lease, or lease form.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the hon. Minister that I do not see why the general run of a lease could not be standard, and if the companies or if the lessor want something added into it, it could be added. But when one paragraph differs from the next paragraph, that can be quite confusing.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, through you to the hon. Minister, there have been many signed leases without the assistance of a lawyer. Although I know they should have the assistance of a lawyer, many do not. There are many high pressure agents traveling on our highways and also out seeking property and I think the time has come when there should be a standard lease in general use. Either the lessor or the lessee can add to the bottom. Maybe that might be encouragement to go to a solicitor and have that done.

Surely the department of the hon. Minister can come up with a standard lease. Even I just picked up five different forms of leases used in this province. I think the hon. Minister could do a lot of good for a large number of lessors.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I am informed that this matter is being discussed between the gas council and the industry at the present time and I am sure if they can come up with something near a standard lease that the industry would be very happy to do this. I say this because since I have taken over this department, I know that any time we have asked anything of the industry, it has been very easy to get along with and is trying to iron out many of these difficulties that have happened in past years.

Mr. Spence: I appreciate very much that the hon. Minister is giving his consideration to it.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, I would like first of all to get some guidance from the hon. Minister as to when specific questions should be asked.

The hon. Prime Minister, when these estimates were first presented in the House, Mr. Chairman, indicated that there would be an opportunity to deal with Hydro. Now when does the hon. Minister envisage that Hydro would appropriately be discussed under the estimates, since there is no specific vote?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I think on the approval of our estimates that the hon. member for Muskoka is here to answer any questions regarding Hydro and he will take over.

Mr. Bryden: That will be after the last item?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Yes.

Mr. Bryden: Did I understand the hon. Prime Minister correctly when he said that questions relating to the conservation authorities branch will be dealt with for this year when the estimates of The Department of Lands and Forests are before the House?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: No, they are going to come under vote 604.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, there is one matter I would like to raise under vote 602. It relates to the ever-recurring problem of safety. I do not wish to go into all the ramifications of that problem at this time; there are many of them, but I am interested in one phase in particular at this time.

As most of us will recall, in August, 1962, there was a serious explosion and fire at a liquefied petroleum gas installation at Maple, Ontario. Following that explosion and fire, which resulted in the death of one man, there was a coroner's inquest held on August 22, 23 and 24, 1962. The coroner's jury was quite critical of regulations relating to these large propane-gas distributing installations, of which there are a good many in the province, and made a number of recommendations to improve procedure for ensuring that they are operated in a safe manner. I would like, Mr. Chairman, to find out from the hon. Minister exactly what has happened within his department with regard to these specific recommendations of this coroner's jury.

There were five recommendations all told. One of them relates to the activities of The Department of Municipal Affairs. That is the fifth recommendation, so I will not raise that one at this time. The other four relate pretty directly to The Department of Energy and Resources Management, as it is now called.

First of all, and I am now quoting from the verdict of the coroner's jury:

The jury has found that evidence revealed an appalling lack of co-ordination and assumption of responsibility by government departments in relation to fire safety installation and inspection.

Therefore the jury strongly recommends that the governments so concerned take immediate action to correct the situation—

Somewhere else, I think in the report, there was a reference to the fact that the fire commissioner and others seemed to be involved in this, but none of them seemed to know what the other's responsibility was.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister what has been done in relation to that recommendation in the year and a half, or year and three-quarters, since the coroner's report was issued.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. member for Woodbine I understand that this matter has been referred to an interdepartmental committee under the chairmanship of the deputy Attorney General, and that the report is in draft form at the present time and should be presented to me within the next month.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, as I have said, it is about a year and a half, or a year and three-quarters, since this recommendation was made by a coroner's jury. Could the hon. Minister explain why it has taken so long to get a report from this interdepartmental committee? I realize that he has only recently taken over the portfolio and cannot be held responsible for what happened before he assumed this responsibility, but is there any explanation of what I would consider a long delay in acting on a matter of vital importance to the people of the province?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I understand that this regulation affects about five different departments. The committee has been going ahead on this, and although to the hon. member 18 months may seem to be a long time, I understand that they are making good progress and we can expect a report soon.

Mr. Chairman: Is vote 602 agreed to?

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I am far from finished with this matter. I must say that I regard the hon. Minister's answer as quite unsatisfactory. It is reminiscent of answers that we have always got in this House relating to matters of safety affecting gas and some of the petroleum byproducts that are even more volatile than gas, such as propane. We have had, with unfortunate regularity, some very serious disasters in the province of Ontario in the handling of gas, natural gas and manufactured gas, including propane. Every time the matter has been raised in the House we have been assured that "everything is under control," but now we get an answer from the hon. Minister that this affects about five departments of the government and it takes quite a while to get them all going in the same direction, or I take it that is the gist of his answer.

He is a new man on the job and they say a new broom sweeps clean. I hope he will start getting some action. This is a serious matter. The Maple explosion created real havoc in the town of Maple and resulted in the death of one man. It was pure good fortune that it did not result in the deaths of a great many others. I would have thought that would have produced some action by the government, but as far as one can make out they are only getting around to considering ways of getting together to get adequate action and co-ordination of action in regard to the inspection of these installations.

There are a great many of these installations throughout the province. The Maple one was a large one but I do not think it was by any means the largest. B-A Oil down at Clarkson has quite a large LP-gas installation. Does the department have any idea whether it is operated in accordance with safe practices? Some of the information I have from people working there—I will not reveal any names—leads me to believe it is far from a safe operation. Is the government just sitting waiting until this interdepartmental committee reports, or when can we expect some action?

An hon. member: They are not answering.

Mr. Bryden: Then I will take the second recommendation of the coroner's jury:

The jury further recommends that the office of the fire marshal of the province of Ontario, assume the responsibility for regular inspections in connection with fire prevention and equipment in similar types of installations.

It may be that this does not come under the hon. Minister's department, but is he in a position to answer as to whether or not anything has been done to implement that recommendation?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, I did not get the hon. member's question—if there was a question.

Mr. Bryden: I asked the hon. Minister if anything has been done to implement the second recommendation of the coroner's jury that inquired into the disaster at Maple. The recommendation was:

That the office of the fire marshal of the province of Ontario assume the responsibility for regular inspections in connection with fire prevention and equipment in similar types of installation.

That is, similar to the installation at Maple. I want to know if anything has been done to implement that recommendation.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I understand that all of these have been placed before the committee and we are waiting for a report on this. As soon as we get it we will implement whatever recommendations there are. I can assure the hon. member that I doubt if this plant is as bad as some of the employees say it is as far as safety is concerned. If it is, sir, I would ask that you let our department know because we are concerned about these things.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I do not know if it should be a question of me letting the department know. Neither I nor any other layman is in a position to have any precise scientific information on matters of this kind.

Mr. P. J. Yakabuski (Renfrew South): Why talk about it then?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: But the employee knows.

Mr. Bryden: But we have had enough disasters. If some of those hon. gentlemen over there were concerned about this thing they would know that. I think it is time the department knew what was going on and did not ask us what is going on. We know from what has happened that there has in the past been inadequate inspection. The regulations have been inadequate and the enforcement of them has been inadequate. We have had coroners' juries investigating these disasters, asking for action to be taken. I am dealing with the recommendations of a coroner's jury which presented its report at the end of August, 1962. I think it is fair to ask what has been done, and it appears that nothing has been done. They are studying it. They have been studying this matter for over one and a half years—a matter that surely is of vital importance to the safety of people in many communities and to working people in many establishments.

I suppose I will get the same answer on all of these recommendations so it is possibly not necessary to go through the rest of them. But for the information of the House I would like to read the other recommendations made by this coroner's jury:

3. That a study be made in respect of the dispersal and installation of all types of stationary pressure tanks or vessels, and that the office of the coroner of the province of Ontario direct this recommendation to the proper authorities.

In this particular incident the jury is concerned with evidence suggesting that the size and pressure setting of relief valves may not have been adequate.

I am led to believe, but I am in no position to make a technical determination myself, that such a problem exists not only in the ill-fated Maple installation.

4. That an intensive study be made at provincial level with a view to enacting legislation to control the location of industry considered likely to create danger to health or danger from fire or explosion.

5. That a review be undertaken by The Department of Municipal Affairs of the method of appointment, qualification and arbitrary powers given to committees of adjustment.

6. The evidence at the inquest revealed that adequate records of maintenance, repair, replacement and inspections of company equipment were most inadequate for the efficient operation of this type of industry.

The jury therefore recommends that companies involved in this type of operation be required to keep accurate and up-to-date logs of all equipment.

Mr. Chairman, surely that last recommendation is one that could have been acted upon without a report from the interdepartmental committee. Therefore I am going to ask the hon. Minister if at least that one has been acted upon. That is, is there a provision that is enforced whereby companies involved in this type of operation, the storage of liquefied petroleum gas, are required to keep accurate and up-to-date logs of all equipment? Is there such a requirement, and, if so, how is it enforced?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, through you to the hon. member for Woodbine, I understand that it has not been acted upon and that we are awaiting a report from the interdepartmental committee.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, this is a doleful tale. I do not hold this hon. Minister responsible because he has had only a very short time in his portfolio, but I hope that he will buck up the administration. It clearly needs to be bucked up if the people of this province are to be assured that these dangerous gases are handled in a safe manner.

Mr. N. Davison (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, on vote 602. People servicing gas burners now have to carry a licence. I wonder if the hon. Minister could tell me whether people servicing oil burners and installing them must have a licence too?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I understand that at the present time, no. But we are proceeding with the plans to license installers of oil furnaces as well as gas.

Mr. Davison: Could the hon. Minister tell me when he feels that these people will have to have a licence to service and install oil burners?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I understand that this will be effective in 1965.

Mr. D. A. Paterson (Essex South): Mr. Chairman, on the same chain of thought, might I ask a question of the hon. Minister regarding the inspection of heating appliances? Is this the correct vote for that—602?

Recently I have had two complaints from oil dealers in my particular riding, the first one of which I pointed out to the deputy Minister two weeks ago. Since then I have had another. The complaints do not suggest any collusion between government and Union Gas, but they do point out the fact that they feel the positions of Union Gas inspectors who do the inspecting for the department are being abused, and that Union Gas is receiving unfair advantage in the fact that it has men going into the homes who apparently are condemning coal and oil installations. Possibly this is just due to overeager salesmen on the company's part, but I would like a comment from the hon. Minister on this situation if he could.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, did I understand the hon. member right, that inspectors from Union Gas are going into homes and condemning oil furnaces? Is this what I understood?

Mr. Paterson: It comes back to this fact that they do make the inspection for the hon. Minister's department. I believe that is correct. As such the salesmen enter the home and the installation may have a red tag placed on it, and as such they have an initial advantage to make the sale.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I understand, Mr. Chairman, that these fellows are licensed to inspect, but I would think as an owner that if I knew that somebody from a gas company came in and was rejecting my oil furnace to sell me a gas furnace, I would be the one who would buy another oil furnace. I believe most people would. I would doubt if this is happening.

Mr. Paterson: I have heard this from various parts of my riding through oil dealers.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I would be very happy, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member would bring it to my attention. I would like to follow up further on this one.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. Minister an incident that has happened recently in my own riding, where furnaces which have been installed under the name of Good Cheer have proved to be defective. Now I will say that the gas company concerned was very co-operative here and once the defective furnaces were discovered inspections were made over the whole area and a large number of these furnaces were discovered, but it did mean that the people who had bought the furnaces in good faith a year or so before had to have them replaced.

I am wondering if the hon. Minister has given any thought to regulations of any sort by which gas furnaces in particular must have a guarantee of life over a period of years against defective workmanship of this kind. Because, if this particular gas furnace had not been caught—two or three of them as a matter of fact—if it had not been realized what might happen, we might have had some rather serious consequences in that whole area.

I do not know whether this is true, but I did have a phone call not long ago when some chap, who declined to give his name because, he said: "I do not want to get into this controversy"; said that these furnaces were still being installed. He gave me the name of the company that was installing them, and I will pass that on to the hon. Minister if he wishes.

I think this should be investigated very carefully. I am wondering if any thought is given to this business of safety factors built in through a guarantee over a number of years for this kind of installation.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. member I understand these furnaces are inspected and pass inspection at the time they are sold, but I think it is the hon. member's concern that they seem to have a short life. I would be afraid there would be nothing this government or the department could do to legislate as to the life of the piece of equipment. I would be afraid that would be beyond our jurisdiction.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor - Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, one year ago in the discussion of these same estimates, the Minister at that time (Mr. Macaulay) commented that there would be no drilling in any of the Great Lakes other than Lake Erie, perhaps forever. Has the department changed its policy, because I understand that the Sarnia area has made strong representations to the hon. Minister concerning the possibility of Lake Huron oil drilling.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member was in the House when the hon. Prime Minister made the announcement regarding drilling in Lake Huron, Lake St. Clair and the St. Clair river. I do not think any further question is necessary beyond that point.

Mr. Newman: The hon. Minister did not answer my question.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I answered the question as I understood it. What was the question?

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, one year ago in the discussion of these same estimates, the then Minister of Energy Resources made the following statement; that there would be no drilling in any of the Great Lakes other than in Lake Erie, perhaps forever. Just approximately one month ago, the city of Sarnia made strong representation to this hon. Minister concerning the possibility of drilling in Lake Huron. Now the hon. Minister in making a reply mentioned that there is always a chance of oil and gas wells coming along and causing serious pollution. Has the department changed its policy in relation to drilling in lakes other than Lake Erie?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I answered it, Mr. Chairman. The hon. Prime Minister made a statement regarding that.

Mr. Newman: Has the policy been changed? Can the hon. Minister say yes or no. That is all; is he tongue-tied?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Tongue-tied? Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the hon. member wants me to say. I cannot say any more than the statement of the government.

Mr. Newman: Has the policy been changed, yes or no?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: No.

Mr. Newman: That is all I wanted.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I said that in the first place.

Mr. Newman: The hon. Minister did not say that.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the final item in vote 602, energy studies, what exactly does this encompass? Specifically, does it encompass studies as to the most economic use of the various forms of fuel that we have in the province?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I understand that it is an economics and statistics department unit.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, in south-western Ontario, it is mostly American concerns which are developing our gas and oil in that area. Is the energy board doing anything to encourage our Canadian firms to do some developing of oil and gas in south-western Ontario, which we think is quite a large amount?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, through you to the hon. member, I would say that I do not know what the government is doing to ask Canadian industry to promote these wells, but I understand Imperial Oil—I doubt if you would call it a Canadian firm, but a firm that operates throughout the North American continent—I understand are spending millions of dollars in promotion every year in the province of Ontario. I do not know that there is any way, or I do not know if we would want, to force Americans out and let this promotion stand idle.

Mr. Spence: I do not wish to force the market up, but I thought we should be doing something to encourage our Canadian firms to do some of this developing also.

Vote 602 agreed to.

On vote 603:

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, on vote 603 there are a number of points I wanted to raise. I do not want to reopen the ideological discussion—if I could describe it as such—which I had with the hon. Minister, except that it is the inconsistencies of this government which puzzle the onlooker. As we were saying earlier with regard to pensions, if the government is merely flexible in regard to its policies, and therefore it makes changes, that is one thing, but when it changes its convictions from year to year then one wonders exactly what a conviction is when held by the government.

For example, I was interested in the hon. Minister's initial statement when he introduced his estimates. On page two of the mimeographed version of it, he said:

In the years to come one of the main tasks of the department will be to see that the energy from different sources will at all times be available in abundance and at the lowest possible cost.

Now in light of our experience with the handling of hydro power, the lowest possible cost is public ownership; and no economist can come up with any argument to the contrary that the lowest possible cost with gas is going to be available through public ownership. You cannot on the one hand extol hydro and its great contribution, and then dismiss it out of hand, otherwise some day you may have to face up to the same thing as the hon. Prime Minister did on pensions and throw out your private approach and accept a public approach because it is more economic.

However let me come to two or three specific arguments under the energy estimates. First I want to return to the questions which the hon. member for Kent East put to the hon. Minister with regard to lease forms. Am I not correct that the whole question of lease forms, and conceivably even a standardization of storage rates, royalties and things of this nature, is under consideration by the energy board? This was originally with the Langford committee, now handed to the energy board. When can we expect a report from the energy board?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I understand that we can expect this report in two to three weeks.

Mr. MacDonald: Well again I am puzzled, Mr. Chairman. If we can expect it in two to three weeks why did we not have it for this year's estimates?

You know if there ever was a magnificent illustration of that old phrase around Queen's Park, "in the fullness of time," this is it. This problem was first presented to the government in 1957. It was kicked around from Minister to Minister. It finally came to the office of the hon. member for Riverdale. He could not handle it, Mr. Chairman, so he handed it to the Langford commission. They were going to bring in a report and when they brought in their first report, it was not dealt with. When they brought in their final report it was not there. Then they handed it over to the energy board. If there ever was a group of people who have been driven from pillar to post, in waiting for the solution of an obvious injustice, it is the people who are trying to cope with this business of companies playing off one against another.

For example, I was interested in the hon. Minister's first reply to the hon. member for Kent East when he said he could not intervene in this two-party arrangement of a lease between the companies and the owners—the farmers who had these wells. When he got a little advice from his deputy he switched his policy because he was just five years behind the times. It is under study precisely for the purpose of trying to get some order out of the chaos—to establish some kind of standard approach so that we do not leave the companies with their high-priced counsel in a position to lick any little farmer with whom they happen to deal.

It is all very well for the company to go in and high pressure some person who happens to be a widow or an old woman who is in desperate need of money so that she will sell it for a song by comparison with what really should be paid. They make a break-in there, and having made a break-in there they exploit that to put pressure on the others. I want to submit to the hon. Minister that when we get this report I trust it is going to indicate the possibilities of a standard approach such as we have had in the United States for years—a standard suggestion as to what storage charge should be paid and what percentage of that should be in the nature of a royalty to the person who actually owns the property in the first instance. However, we will have to wait for still another year. It is a wearying prospect but we live with the Tory government and that is part of the cross we bear.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: When all the back benchers, including the hon. Cabinet Ministers, have had their say I will get on to the second point I wanted to raise with the hon. Minister.

This conceivably does not fall four-square within his department. It may ultimately have to come into The Department of Municipal Affairs, but I trust, Mr. Chairman, you will let me raise it briefly. This is another of the complaints that the people in the Lambton area have been pressing upon the government for quite some time—with regard to assessments. Their contention is that you should have an assessment of storage facilities on the same general basis as you have for above-ground tanks, whatever be the kind of fuel that is put in those tanks.

They have suggested what seems to me to be logical—that they should be assessed on the same Btu capacity as the ground storage. These underground storage areas are just as valuable as the surface storage tanks. I understand that the average assessment on the surface storage tanks is one cent per gallon of capacity. If one accepts the Btu formula I understand that slightly more than 6.25 gallons of fuel oil produce the same heat as a thousand cubic feet of gas. In other words it would work out at eight cents assessment per thousand cubic feet. In the one township, Moore Township, from which representations have been made to me, this would mean an assessment of $3.2 million, approximately one quarter of the present assessment of that township.

I want to submit to the hon. Minister that this is a fair proposition. As a matter of fact, let me put it this way: Why should one company that is storing above ground have to pay taxes, another company that is storing underground not be obliged to pay taxes? Why do you set up this unfair competition, this discrimination between the companies? It seems to me that there is a solid case for government action here and I am wondering whether this hon. Minister or the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs is in a position to enlighten the House as to whether or not the government is going to act on these representations.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. member for York South, I know that I have heard this discussed several times. I do not think I have ever heard anyone come up with any answer as to whether they should assess gas under the ground in comparison to gas above the ground. I would think that this matter, if it is solved one way or the other, would come under The Department of Municipal Affairs and not under this department.

Mr. MacDonald: Would it be unfair for me to ask the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs whether this matter has come before him?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Not unfair at all, and the answer is no.

Mr. MacDonald: It has not come before the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No. I would suggest to the hon. member that it is probably going to be considered by the Beckett committee.

Mr. MacDonald: The Beckett committee?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The legislative committee that is studying The Municipal Act and related Acts. It has been in operation for two years now.

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, that Beckett committee!

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): I was wondering if the hon. Minister had stated some new government policy.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I am wrong here but I have had repeated representations from people who have come into Queen's Park on this issue, and I will satisfy myself as to whether they have ever been told that the appropriate place to make representations is to the so-called Beckett committee.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, none of these people, that I can recollect, has ever been in touch with me in the days that I have been in The Department of Municipal Affairs. I will say this, I did attend a meeting with a township council in that area some years ago at the request of its member. We discussed this question of assessment of pipelines, but we never discussed the question of a municipal assessment of underground storage areas. What the hon. member has read today is something entirely new to me. I have never heard of it before. Basically, I do not think that it has too much merit, but if the people involved would like to send me that material I would be very glad to have a look at it myself and have it studied by the officials in my department.

Mr. MacDonald: That will make interesting reading to the people who have been making the representations for quite some time. The hon. Minister's deputy and other people in the department have umpteen briefs in which this is one of the points, and it would seem to me that if it does not come under the jurisdiction of this department it should have been passed on to the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs a long time ago. However, in the fullness of time we will come to grips with this one too, I suppose.

Let us get to another one that is clearly within this jurisdiction and I wonder what the reaction is going to be as to whether this is an unfair assessment of it.

I have never been able to get any clear picture as to what this government's policy is with regard to the cushion gas left in these wells. For example, to take one specific case, in the instance of the Payne pool, millions of cubic feet of gas were in there when this area was designated as a pool. Will the hon. Minister tell me whether the company has to pay for the amount of gas that is left in there to the people who own it? That is question one; perhaps we should take them one at a time.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I understand that that is determined by the energy board.

Mr. MacDonald: Then my question once again then: Does the energy board designate whatever millions of cubic feet of gas left in the pool shall be bought by the company, and that it shall pay a royalty on it to the owner of the property just as though it had actually taken the gas out? If there was no gas in there, the company would have to put it in to build the cushion storage.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, the answer is, yes, and they are paid at the rate of two cents per million cubic feet.

Mr. MacDonald: Two cents per thousand cubic feet is what is paid. If they do not take that out—just a minute, if they are paid at two cents per thousand cubic feet—

Mr. L. C. Henderson (Lambton East): They are, yes.

Mr. MacDonald: They are. Representations have been made to me—and I am certain that they are accurate, I am just trying to sort out the complexities of this very complicated thing in my mind at the moment—and I can give you one specific case here in a minute.

For example, in the instance of the Payne pool when it was converted to storage, the right to surface and sell the 11 million cubic feet of gas contained in the field was purchased by the company; had this gas been surfaced the income tax would have amounted to $1 million. Canada was therefore short-changed $1 million of income tax over $3 million price being a capital gain. Now this is the contention of the Lambton Gas Storage Association, is this the case?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I would doubt very much if that is the case. I would want to know more about it before I could answer the question.

Mr. Henderson: It is under appeal!

Mr. MacDonald: It is under appeal? The same pool. I appreciate the assist from the hon. member for Lambton East.

Let me ask the hon. Minister another question. At what figure, for example in the Payne pool, was the cost of the cushion gas estimated?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry we have no estimate on that.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I have been told $3 million. Let us suppose for a moment that it is $3 million. Is this price incorporated in the calculation of the rate base, so that it effects the rate in perpetuity, or at least until the whole thing is reviewed again by the energy board?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: The answer is yes, down to 50 pounds pressure.

Mr. MacDonald: I do not pretend to be master of all the complexities of the situation, Mr. Chairman, but just as in the instance of the Ontario Natural Gas Storage and Pipeline Limited that was built across the province this government and the energy board were willing to accept the prospectus in 1958 which anticipated this company making 38 per cent in 1962 on its capital investment. So I suggest to you in many instances that rate base is a padded rate base and the result is that the consumers are paying through the nose. I do not know whether the people of this province can ever be aroused to exactly what has happened.

I have had no comment, for example, from the hon. Minister as to the basic proposition I was making earlier. Why should the people in the Hamilton-Toronto area be paying $50 a family more for gas than is charged west of here? Just because Consumers' Gas happens to be in the position that they are now going to incorporate that price in perpetuity through a storage subsidiary, how can the government justify it?

An hon. member: The equipment is all paid for—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for York South could answer that if he would think back to his farm days. You could always buy a cord of wood cheaper at the farm than you could in the city. If he could answer why there should be a difference there, I think he would have it on gas. It costs money to transport and to store and to do these things. This has been so as long as I have known anything about fuel and energy. You can always buy cheaper at the source than you can ten miles down the road or 50 miles. I think that is the answer.

Mr. MacDonald: Can the hon. Minister explain to me why the storage charge in the province of Ontario is 17 or 18 cents, why Mr. Crozier, back some years ago estimated it could be done for five cents? Or why in Michigan it is eleven cents? Can we deal with just that one point?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I would say comparing Ontario with Michigan would be two different things. I think the cost of storage, after we get storage areas and they get in their expensive equipment, as the years go by I would think you would see the cost of storage reduced considerably.

Mr. MacDonald: I would suggest to the hon. Minister that this is nonsense, because the storage in the province of Ontario is better storage than it is in Michigan. We have better storage basins than they have in Michigan, they will contain the gas more effectively than Michigan. Perhaps the hon. Minister then will explain to me why a few years ago Mr. Crozier felt that five cents storage was a possibility in the province of Ontario? At what time, in the fullness of time, in the year 2500?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Oh, no, before that!

Mr. MacDonald: Why are we paying at this present time 17 or 18 cents in Ontario, and it is eleven cents in Michigan? There is no justification for this. You are just sitting tight and leaving these companies set up a storage and transportation subsidizing so that they too will be making 38 per cent profit on their investment. This is what they did in the company that was established as a subsidiary of Union, and at that time Oakah Jones said it was uneconomical. And now Oakah Jones, with Imperial, sets up his own subsidiary so Consumers' Gas pockets the money that he thought was uneconomic.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): That is good business.

Mr. MacDonald: Sure, it is good business. It is good business for a Tory government that is working hand-in-glove with these companies so that they can continue to exploit the consumers.

Mr. Cowling: If we do not have profit we do not have anything.

Mr. MacDonald: Nonsense!

Sure, you are the type who wanted to let the used-car dealers get away with it—go along with the Attorney General until finally the people got angry about it. But there is no justification for this government perpetuating a policy that lets these companies exploit the consumers.

Mr. Cowling: That is just your opinion.

An hon. member: Is it 38 per cent per annum?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes. Mr. Chairman, I repeated it earlier—in the prospectus that was submitted by Union Gas when they established their subsidiary in 1958, their own estimate in round figures was that on a $9 million investment they expected $3.8 million as a return in 1962. A 38 per cent return.

An hon. member: That is four years!

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, no, they expected it in the year 1962 alone, a return of $3.8 million which would have been 38 per cent of their invested capital.

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): What have they invested in the meantime?

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, if this government and back benchers want to tolerate policies that are going to exploit the people then we will just have to get out and see if we cannot get the facts across to the people so that they will set a fire under you. This is just another example of exploitation. The suggestion over here, for example, when I read an earlier comment from the Sarnia Observer, that these policies were designed in the interest of the people of Lambton county—they are not designed in the interests of the people in Lambton county. They are designed in the interests of these companies. The townships do not get assessment, the farmers do not get adequate royalty, the companies get this kind of profit and the consumers are paying for it and this government puts the stamp of approval through its policies.

An hon. member: We get a whole lot of taxes.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask before we left this one, whether in the hon. Minister's opinion and that of his advisers, that over the next few years the consumers might expect a reduction in the price of natural gas?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I would say yes in answer to that question. I had the opportunity of being up in their fields this winter and when you see the expensive equipment and the things they are doing up there to create this industry, I would think as time goes on and we take the write-off into consideration, that the answer would be yes, we are bound to.

Mr. Sopha: Is the government concerned about the apparent move of what is known as the Little Long Lac group to win control, gain control, or in the words of the street, "make a takeover," of Northern Ontario Natural Gas?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I think maybe the hon. member could answer that question. I do not think we are concerned—

Mr. Sopha: Well, is the government satisfied with the present management of Northern Ontario Natural Gas?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I would say that I have not heard anything against the management of Northern Ontario Natural Gas.

Mr. Sopha: So the government would be in a complete state of equilibrium and equanimity, would they, if another group moved in and took over control of this great industry?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I do not know why we should not be, as long as they live up to the regulations and they are regulated. We are concerned about the consumer, not the company.

Mr. MacDonald: You are concerned about the consumer?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: That is right.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: I would like to pursue it a little further. Does the government study the annual financial reports of the company in order to keep abreast of how the company is doing?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I would say yes.

Mr. Sopha: Does the hon. Minister?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Yes.

Mr. Sopha: He does. And he has noticed that this company has fared fairly well economically, has he?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I understand that.

Mr. Sopha: That it has begun to pay a dividend?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: What is the hon. member trying to get at?

Mr. Sopha: Since the company has come to a point in its career—it has only been in operation, I think, five years now and has made an increasing amount of profit each year—does that compel the hon. Minister, I ask him through you, Mr. Chairman, to see whether the time is not ripe to order that there be a decrease in the cost to consumers or is this five or ten years away?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, we just completed a rate hearing on that last year and issued a report early in 1964.

Mr. Sopha: So there is going to be a decrease in 1964, is there?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: No, I did not say that.

Mr. Sopha: Well, when is it? When, in the opinion of the hon. Minister, will a decrease in rates take effect?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I have no way of telling that.

Mr. Sopha: The hon. Minister has no way of telling.

Well, I just want to make one last comment: One of the methods of advertising and one of the attractions of natural gas, as I recall when it first came into northern Ontario, was that the price was going to be substantially less than oil-fuel heat, competitively speaking. I can vouchsafe that that has not been the experience. I believe the figure was going to be at least 15 per cent less than oil-fuel heat and I can say from my own experience, my own investigations, that that has just not materialized. I wonder to what extent the government has any worries or any concern about this.

I note in my own community that the attraction of Northern Ontario Natural Gas into that community was, of course, for the purposes of supply to the International Nickel Company of Canada Limited. Perhaps quite properly so, I am not one to gainsay that it is not proper, the rate offered to International Nickel Company was substantially less, appreciably and markedly less, than that offered to the local consumers. But apparently in the machinations—is that too strong a word to use when referring to Northern Ontario Natural Gas?—apparently somewhere along the line, the supply to International Nickel Company and the supply to the homeowners of Sudbury were inextricably interwoven, so that they could not have one without the other. In other words, the supply to the residents of Sudbury, the dormitory municipality, was a sine qua non of them coming in.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, did I understand the hon. member to say that in order for International Nickel Company to get gas that the homeowners in Sudbury had to take gas?

Mr. Sopha: Yes, one infers that that was a condition.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: But is that the condition or have they a choice? They have to buy gas; they do not have a choice to buy oil or electricity?

Mr. Sopha: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: That is what the hon. member is trying to imply.

Mr. Sopha: I am speaking of natural gas.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: But they can buy any fuel they wish.

Mr. Sopha: Oh, they can burn wood.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Certainly the hon. member was trying to imply that the home-maker had to—

Mr. Sopha: They can buy a peat bog; they can go and chop up hunks of peat, too. But I say that the two things were woven together. If they were to supply International Nickel, they also had to have the franchise to supply the city of Sudbury.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: But there was no compulsion on the homeowner to buy natural gas?

Mr. Sopha: Of course not.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: All right, then.

Mr. Sopha: Whoever suggested that? There is no compulsion on anyone to buy ice cream either.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: No, why bring it up here then?

Mr. Sopha: What I have been bringing up the hon. Minister obviously cannot comprehend. He just cannot understand what I am saying, so I will have to put it in a simple form. I will put it in a very simple form. This is my last statement.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Sopha: It is well that you do what you can to bail the hon. Minister out because it is easy for him to get into trouble.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I am not in trouble.

Mr. Sopha: All right.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, may I say that it is 6 o'clock but I would like to answer the hon. member before we adjourn. There is no one in the province of Ontario bound to buy any fuel; he can buy anything he wants.

Mr. Sopha: There is no question of that; no one said differently.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: That is what some people are trying to imply and the hon. member is.

Let me say this, and just listen for a minute. If natural gas was not competitive, why do people install natural gas when they can get oil, electricity, wood and coal? All the things are there for them to burn; why would they have to install natural gas? Can the hon. member answer that one?

Mr. Sopha: The hon. Minister has reached unparalleled heights of lack of attention, I commend him.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, may I—

Mr. Sopha: Will you remember I have the floor?

Mr. Chairman: Vote 603 has been carried—

Mr. Sopha: Oh, no.

An hon. member: Yes, it has.

Mr. Sopha: Oh, no. I have the floor and it is not passed. Shall I continue?

Mr. Singer: If you want it to be carried, then the hon. member for Sudbury can speak for another half hour.

Mr. Sopha: Does the hon. leader of the government wish to move that the committee rise?

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: In the midst of this incomprehensibility I will move that the committee of supply rise and report certain progress.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will continue with these estimates. On Thursday the committee on labour, legal and municipal bills will meet at ten o'clock in the morning to deal with various matters that have been referred to it by this Legislature. Following the estimates of this department, we will take the estimates of The Department of Economics and Development.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 6.05 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, APRIL 21, 1964

The House met at 2 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are pleased to welcome to the Legislature today, in the east gallery, students from Stratford Northwestern Secondary School; in the west gallery, students from St. John's Separate School, Newmarket; and in the Speaker's gallery, members of the Progressive-Conservative Women's Incorporated Group, Toronto.

Presenting petitions.

Introduction of bills.

Orders of the day.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart). He has been informed of the content.

The question is: What steps has the hon. Attorney General taken, or what steps does he propose to take, to protect the small uninitiated investor from suffering serious financial loss in the current market?

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): I thank the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, for giving me notice of the question. I might tell him that I got it about five minutes ago as I entered the House, but that was through no fault of the hon. member. I understand he got it in just on the hour.

I was proposing to make a statement on this matter before receiving the question. I would say this, although I have no prepared statement in my hand: I discussed the matter of the whole situation, with respect to the tremendous speculation that is going on in stocks, with the chairman of the Ontario Securities Commission, with a view to seeing if there was any action we might further take. As a result of that discussion, I think that everything is being done that we feel can be reasonably done, in the way of requiring the filing of information and setting out the fullest material which is informative by way of prospectus, the names of the persons who are concerned with the various companies who offer stocks for sale, the reserves which are shown on that information—in fact, all that type of information—is with the Ontario Securities Commission and is available to the public.

I think all we can say at this moment is a cautionary word. It is scarcely possible to restrain the public from speculating and I would say it would seem to me, and I think surely most of the public is aware, that many of the stocks they are purchasing must be of an extremely speculative variety and nature. I would say that you can scarcely take people by the hand and lead them away from the stock exchange or from the broker, or lead them there and advise them what stock to buy.

But I think it should be suggested to all members of the public that they should acquaint themselves most thoroughly and fully with the information which is available, as to the personnel of the companies in whose stocks they propose to deal, as to the amount of stock which is issued, as to the assets which are shown on that information, which is very full and complete; and they should study the location of the areas concerned and the assets owned by the companies which are offering and trading in stocks.

If they have not knowledge; if the individual himself does not have the knowledge to assess those things, he should have the best advice. And I think a good deal of that advice might, perhaps, be of a nature which would restrain him from entering this very speculative market. Beyond that at the moment I do not know of anything I can say in answer to the question of the hon. member.

The securities commission, sir, does come within my department; and we have taken, in the past and up to the present, all steps to make available to the public a knowledge of companies in all respects. That information is available, and I would strongly urge every member of the public to seek that information, to study it, and make himself thoroughly acquainted with the article he is buying before he buys it.

Mr. Troy: I thank the hon. Attorney General for that information. It is too bad that it had to be broadcast all across the country—

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, could I say I did have a discussion with Mr. Kimber, the chairman of the commission; and it was at my suggestion that he made a statement. I understand that statement is being made this afternoon.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. Attorney General when we can expect an announcement of the appointment of a Crown attorney for the county of Grey?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I thank the hon. leader of the Opposition for giving me notice of the question and I am glad, Mr. Speaker, to inform him now that the appointment of Mr. Russell McEvoy of Owen Sound as Crown attorney for the county of Grey is effective, his appointment having been made by order-in-council, effective April 20, which was yesterday.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I should like to make a statement.

Yesterday, the hon. member for Yorkview (Mr. Young), before the orders of the day, asked questions regarding Guelph Reformatory. Specifically, the questions were, and I quote: "Have the recently advertised vacancies in the staff at the Guelph Reformatory been filled?" and "Is any consideration being given to increased salary scales for the staff of this institution?"

In reply to these questions, my answers were, to the first, that "Most have been filled" and to the second, that "Salary scales are set by the civil service commission and are uniform for the various classifications throughout the province. They are not scaled for any specific institution or locality."

In a matter of moments after my reply was given, the hon. member for Yorkview issued a press release which had quite obviously been prepared well in advance, having been processed by duplicating machine. The statement alleged that there was "simmering discontent now rife among staff members in the Guelph Reformatory. Low salary scales are the basic trouble", and that "Workers in the institution start at $3,600 per year and progress to a maximum of $4,400 in four years. Inevitably under these conditions, staff is hard to get and difficult to hold." He further stated that: "work in an institution of this nature naturally carried with it an element of danger," and that "this was highlighted not long ago when two inmates, using shears from the tailor's shop, tried to escape using a guard as hostage." And that is the end of the quote from his press release.

The hon. member for Yorkview, in attempting to establish his allegation that "staff is hard to get," pointed out that we have recently advertised 15 vacancies, and further that, in his words, "many present staff members are working at other jobs during off hours in order to maintain their families." The hon. member finished his press release with a statement that "a reforms institution of all places should have a staff which is not riddled with unrest and discontent."

Mr. Speaker, I shall not comment on the rather unusual procedure employed by the hon. member, whereby he asked a question of a Minister, prejudged the reply which he had not yet heard, and issued a statement repeating and amplifying his questions and including the allegations to which I have just referred, no mention of which was made in his questions. However, as the press release contained allegations which would have the effect of misinforming this House and the public, I am most anxious to set the record straight.

I wish to state most emphatically that there is no truth to the statement that there is, in the words of the hon. member, "simmering unrest and discontent" amongst the staff at the Guelph Reformatory.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): That shows what a sheltered life the hon. Minister leads.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The superintendent of that institution informs me that morale amongst the staff is higher than it has ever been, to his knowledge. The salaries quoted by the hon. member also give a distorted picture of the salary situation. The actual range in salary for the various classifications runs from $3,600 to $12,500 per annum, exclusive of the superintendent. However, presuming that the hon. member was concerning himself only with the custodial staff, which he did not make clear in his press release, the statement that the maximum is only $4,400 per annum was also incorrect, as the range for custodial officers is from $3,600 to $6,300 per annum. There are many other classifications at the institution and their salaries vary according to their responsibilities. The salaries for the industrial staff, of which there are 62, range from $3,900 to $6,600 per annum. Thus, the press statement made by the hon. member is inconsistent with the facts. The salary range he mentioned applies only to custodial officers one, two and three, who do receive a maximum of $4,400 per annum. This salary, which averages $85 weekly, compares very favourably for the average in the Guelph area.

We also have no difficulty in maintaining people on staff at Guelph, as alleged by the hon. member. This is reflected in the number of vacancies occurring in the institution. It is absolutely incorrect to state or suggest that there are 15 vacancies or that we even advertised 15 vacancies. At the present time, there are only five vacancies and this out of a total complement of 398. This in itself should establish that we are not having any difficulty in maintaining staff.

It may be true, as the hon. member alleges, that there are some people working on other jobs to augment their incomes. However, as this is permissible in accordance with the regulations of The Public Service Act, this is no concern of ours. Certainly this is not very prevalent in our Guelph institution, and in any case many people in many walks of life and many with very high incomes engage in such practice. According to the superintendent at Guelph, the efficiency of the work of the staff who may be engaged in such outside work, has not in any way been affected.

The hon. member for Yorkview also stated that there is an element of danger in the work and that this was highlighted by the fact that not long ago two inmates, using shears from the tailor shop, tried to escape, using a guard as a hostage. I would be the last to deny that there is an element of danger in some positions in any kind of correctional institution, but I should like to point out that in this specific case where the hon. member is attempting to relate this situation to what he alleges is poor pay and difficulty in retaining staff, the staff person involved earns a salary of $6,000 a year with a maximum of $6,600.

My concern, Mr. Speaker, and the concern of my officials, in respect of the hon. member's release to the press is that statements such as he has made and which are incorrect—that staff at the institution is riddled with unrest and discontent—can of themselves do a great deal of harm in our recruitment of staff. I am sure the hon. member would not want to make it more difficult for the staff of my department to carry on their very necessary and important work. At the time I presented my estimates, I stated very emphatically that I was indeed very proud of the staff of the department for their efficiency and effectiveness and I am sure the hon. member would like to help us keep it that way.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Speaker:

Mr. Speaker: The Minister's statement is not debatable. You may ask the Minister a question if you wish and if he cares to answer.

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to announce three new provincial programmes which I feel will have a widespread interest throughout the province and which deal with Ontario's water problems and resources. They deal with increased financial contributions by the government in three areas: (1) The construction of water supply reservoirs—

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. MacDonald: This hon. Minister's estimates are before the House. Surely that is the appropriate place for this kind of a statement.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister took this matter up with me before he entered the House today. I understand the statement is new policy and the contents are not in any part of his estimates where he could give this statement. The Minister asked therefore if he could make it before the orders of the day.

Mr. Oliver: Surely, Mr. Speaker, on that point, the water conservation vote is still to come, as I understand it. When we come to that vote, I do not know where you could find a more appropriate time for the hon. Minister to say what he wants to say.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the Ontario water resources vote is being taken by another Minister in the estimates.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: That is right.

Mr. Oliver: Supposing it is being taken by another Minister as you suggest, Mr. Speaker, surely at the time the Minister is taking the part of the present Minister in explaining the matter of water conservation, then the hon. Minister would have an opportunity of making his announcement, but surely not now.

Mr. Speaker: Is that satisfactory to the Minister?

Mr. Oliver: Nobody has an opportunity to say a word in reply at all.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Speaker, if the Opposition does not want to hear what we are trying to do to alleviate this problem, well we can—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no feeling one way or the other in this matter, except I cannot understand what all the fuss is about when the government is simply trying to put before the House a question of government policy. Whether it comes now or whether it comes half an hour from now, I do not know what the difference is. But I fail to see why there should be an objection raised, sir, to a Minister putting before this Legislature, before the orders of the day, what is obviously new government policy and in which all the people of this province are interested as well as the hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: In view of the argument before the House, I would ask the Minister therefore if he would make his statement during the Ontario water resources vote.

Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The twenty-ninth order. House in committee of supply. Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY AND RESOURCES MANAGEMENT

On vote 603:

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Chairman, you will recall that when the clock chimed six last evening, I was discussing with the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett) the differential in the rate of the sale of natural gas to resident consumers in Sudbury and the rate of the sale of the same natural gas to the International Nickel Company in the environs of Sudbury. I want to make it clear to the hon. Minister—as he appeared to have some confusion in his thinking at the time for which I cannot take the responsibility of being the author—that I am not now discussing and was not talking then about the comparative prices of the sale of natural gas and other forms of combustible fuel. I want to hasten to clarify for him that I am speaking only of the rate of the charges for the sale of natural gas.

In that regard I pointed out that there is a considerable differential in the price for industrial users and residential users. I also brought to his attention that when this company came into Sudbury, as I suspect it did in many other communities in northern Ontario, one of the sales pitches so to speak, one of the attractions to people to purchase this type of fuel was that it was said that the cost of it was going to be considerably less than for oil fuel. I think in that regard—and I have nothing to document it but my memory usually does not play tricks on me—that the differential in the price which it stipulated was going to be about 15 per cent.

I do not think that experience has proved that that differential exists. Therefore my query to the hon. Minister, put as explicitly as I can possibly put it, is whether his department and particularly the fuel board—and I note the representative of that board is not here as he was last night—has looked into that question from the point of view of requiring this company to give an early reduction in the cost of natural gas to the homeowners in Sudbury, and indeed to the homeowners in the other communities of northern Ontario which the company serves.

I say in that connection, somewhat fearlessly, because I do not want especially to curry the favour of Northern Ontario Natural Gas—I would not go out of my way to curry its favour and anyone who wants to draw any inferences about that may draw whatever inferences he pleases. They are pretty patent, the inferences that can be drawn from that—I want to say, though, in connection with that company that their experience in northern Ontario has been pretty profitable and pretty rewarding. If it comes to be a question of write-offs, or the depreciation and payment for capital equipment, they have suffered at the hands of fortune some pretty pleasant experience. They have been in business for about six years now—I think this is their sixth year.

I will go on now. Maybe I will throw caution to the winds a little bit because I get swept along in the tide.

I recall last fall in my own community when the president of that company came into the community, they lionized him. You would think it was a veritable crusader back from the crusades against the infidel, the way he was received by the community. Not by myself, I did not go to the meeting. In the space of six years they have had a pretty good result in their capital investment and I believe it was last year—perhaps the year before—but they started to pay a dividend on their common stock.

One observes that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines has not paid one on their own yet, but Northern Ontario Natural Gas has and their profit picture has been pretty stimulating to the owners of that company and the management. So I think the time is at hand when the government—whatever the views of the hon. Minister are, I trust that we will hear them—that the government should begin to think in terms of some relief for the residential users of that product. As we were told, it was our birthright, almost, when that great resource was piped from western Canada; it was not only going to be a great boon to industry in that part of the country but was going to afford a great measure of relief, economically speaking, to the people who, through some nine if not ten months of the year, ten months some years, have to use some form of oil heat to heat their homes. That is one of the penalties, of course, of living in northern Ontario, that until on in the month of May as well as the month of September, sometimes in June and sometimes in August, the thermostat activates the furnace on as a protection against the discomfort of cold nights and mornings.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): But there are many compensating factors.

Mr. Sopha: Yes. My hon. leader tells me, and it is quite true, that there are many compensating factors for living in that part of the country.

However, if it is such a great blessing, then I am not one of those who is particularly concerned about the comfortable profits of that company. In fact, let me go on to say, and this will be my final word, a lot of people will not like me for saying it, it will take a good many years in my life, if the Lord preserves me over a normal span, till the dirty taste in my mouth from that company is washed out of it and disappears.

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Chairman, may I say that there was a rate hearing last year before the board, in 1963, and anyone who was interested in rates could appear before that board. I would think that this was called for the benefit of people in the north. The report is finished and was presented in 1964, this spring. If the hon. member would like, or has any other specific question, I would be only too happy to get it for him from the board.

Mr. Sopha: I will not pursue it.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, let me pursue another aspect of the same question.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Chairman, may I bow out at this time because the hon. member wants to pursue a similar question. I want to divert into another area, if you do not mind.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister a couple of questions, just to get a little background here? Is Union Gas still operating on its contract bringing gas from the southern United States or has that been completed and are they now getting their gas from Trans-Canada?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: No, they are still bringing some in from the southern United States.

Mr. MacDonald: When will it be a complete switch to the trans-Canada sources?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure of this, and I have talked about it to officials at Union Gas, but I believe it is 1967.

Mr. MacDonald: One of my hon. members from that area suggests even 1970. In other words, it is some years hence.

Can the hon. Minister also inform me what percentage of the gas that Union distributes is gas produced from wells in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I have not the exact figure here but it would be less than one per cent—that is, Ontario gas used by Union Gas.

Mr. MacDonald: The situation as I see it, Mr. Chairman, is this: Union Gas is now getting its gas from the southern United States, which is almost as far away as western Canada; when it finishes getting it from there, when its current contract is completed, it will get it all from Trans-Canada; coming in the same way, for example, as Consumers' here in Toronto is getting its gas.

So I come back to the question I raised yesterday. What justification is there for the consumers who are being served by Union Gas being able to get fuel for $1.07 per thousand cubic feet, when the consumers who are being served by Consumers' Gas Company in Hamilton, Toronto and east of here, are paying $1.35 residential rate? What justification is there for that continued spread which amounts to about $50 per family on an average year's consumption?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, it is not possible for me to give the hon. member an answer at this particular time, but I will get the answer from the board, if that is satisfactory.

Mr. MacDonald: I would be very glad to get some explanation.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Would there be any possibility that Ontario Hydro might have some effect, with its shadow permeating the scene and affecting the price of gas?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I think that is a question which perhaps could be asked of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Boyer) when he is up speaking on Hydro.

Mr. Troy: I think it is up to the hon. Minister to answer that one because Ontario Hydro say: "Oh, no, no! We are not—"

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Well, so would I maybe.

Mr. Troy: I thought the hon. Minister might have a different answer, but I see they are all in the same boat.

Mr. Oliver: Mr. Chairman, following the remarks of the hon. member for Nipissing, then following also the hon. member for Sudbury in his remarks respecting the Northern Ontario Natural Gas; this company, according to him, and according to the figures that we have seen, has done pretty well. It would almost seem that something should be done by way of a decreasing rate to the consumer in the province.

Personally, I share the view of the hon. member for Nipissing that into this picture enters Hydro and Hydro are afraid, desperately afraid, of the competition that gas could give them if they were made to supply gas at the rates that they could supply it in this province and still make a profit.

I would like to know from the hon. Minister if there is that thinking in his department. Is there a suggestion that if you were to, by the circuitous route that is employed, order gas to be reduced to the consumer of this province, it would then become a much more formidable opposition for Hydro, and Hydro would not like it, and that sort of thing?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman realizes I have only been in this department six months, but I would say I do not think we have any fear along that line at the present time. I think it is the feeling of the department that we in Ontario are going to need perhaps all the Hydro we can develop, and we are going to need all the gas that we can develop, over the next five or six years in order to meet the demand. When you are going through a development stage, I do not think you start worrying about surpluses or competition in this field.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, let us stick with this for a minute now. The hon. Minister says he is new in this department and this is right. I do not happen to be able to go back to the record and pull out the quotes now, but there is on record—because I have heard them myself—from predecessors of his, Ministers who were responsible for the handling of gas in the province of Ontario—indeed I remember the hon. Dana Porter, when we were questioning why the government was so reticent, indeed it became evident it was opposed to the proposition of public ownership, he as much as said that this would provide unfair competition for other fuels. This is a statement of policy that is on the record back in 1956 and 1957.

In other words this government, either because of its doctrinaire belief in free enterprise, or under pressure from the oil and conceivably Hydro, decided that it was not going to have public ownership of the distribution of gas; because with public ownership of the distribution of gas it would become a severely competitive fuel with existing fuels.

So what this government determined in its policies was that it was going deliberately to fritter away the opportunity for this new source of power to be available at cost, namely, natural gas. And the way it was frittered away was to dictate and to direct that under no condition would it be handled by public ownership, because this would make it available at a severely competitive price.

I quoted from the record yesterday the testimony of the former mayor of Sudbury, in which he stated that this was the directive which came from the hon. Dana Porter at that time, and I submit it has been a policy of this government—not only opposition to public ownership throughout northern Ontario; indeed it directed that the whole of the distribution was to be given to this one company. In other words, it deliberately frittered away the advantage of a lower price which could have come from natural gas, and the hon. members on this side of the House are correct: You created a situation in which this Northern Ontario Natural Gas is sitting on a gold mine, figuratively speaking. It is getting great returns; it is now in the position where it is going to start buying out other concerns.

This is not only true of Northern Ontario Natural Gas. I can remember, when we were considering the arrival of western gas here in the Metropolitan area, that there was a great deal of discussion in the paper about the relative heat capacity of natural gas as compared with the manufactured gas which had been used in many communities in southern Ontario. The heat capacity of natural gas is much greater; I have forgotten what the ratio is now. Therefore the calculation was that if you had natural gas you would be able to get your price down so much below what manufactured gas was, and be able to get the same production in terms of heat.

The interesting thing is that when consumers got the gas from western Canada, there was not this reduction in price. And I will give Oakah Jones full credit; he is one of the slickest PR men in this country who is running an industry. He kept his price at the top level and he has been bringing it down in very small degrees over the years, each one with a great unveiling of propaganda as to what this company is doing. But his price is still above what it should be if it were relative to the heat capacity of manufactured gas.

This is the reason why I come back and tie in with the comment I was making earlier; I am convinced that Consumers', like Northern Ontario Natural Gas, has by the policies of this government, been conceded a position in which it is making an extraordinary amount of money. Therefore it is able to expand. If I may just relate this to the whole burden of my case yesterday—now that the government has handed over to them—jointly, through a subsidiary, with Imperial Oil—the rest of the storage areas in Lambton, the uneconomic cost of storing and transporting gas to the Lambton areas about which Mr. Jones was complaining years ago, he is now happy with because it is going to be channelled into his pocket instead of into Union's pocket.

In other words, the government has created a situation in which the gas companies of the province of Ontario are making money hand-over-fist. And the time has come—indeed it is past—when there should be a severe re-examination of all the factors which go into the rate base and which are used to justify the present charges that they make to the consumer.

So the consumers of Northern Ontario Natural Gas—not only in Sudbury but in this whole area of the golden horseshoe and east—should be getting a reduction which, I submit to this House, should be something approaching 25 cents per 1,000 cubic feet. And in doing so, the price would still be as high as Union is now charging in western Ontario.

Mr. Troy: Yes, and there is another matter too, which the hon. Minister said about Hydro a moment ago. If he looks at the advertisements down in the lobby of this building, he will find out it says there that our sources of added Hydro power are very limited, that you have to go into thermal power; that is going to be more expensive because you have to bring coal from the United States—the Maritimes or the west are out of the question. It also says we have to get atomic power, which is to be more expensive, so naturally you are going to get still more pressure from Hydro to keep the gas prices up.

Mr. P. J. Yakabuski (Renfrew South): What did the hon. member have in 1943?

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, would you please discipline that boor?

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Chairman, I will try very hard, after that last comment, to behave myself. I do not want to be disciplined, but I think at this stage of the game I would like to—last night during the debate someone mentioned taxes pertaining to the gas companies.

As I understand it, and I would like to be corrected if I am wrong, the Union Gas Company, on its structures, the buildings it owns and the land it owns, pays municipal taxes the same as any private enterprise does.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: It was on transmission lines.

Mr. Bukator: Just a few years ago, the government saw fit to extend it to transmission lines. It pays business tax on transmission lines also, in municipalities. That is correct?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Right.

Mr. Bukator: Why I make this point is that I would like the hon. member for Muskoka—I understand he is going to speak directly after your estimates on Hydro?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Right.

Mr. Bukator: I would like to make this point at this time: While the biggest competitor for the gas company is Hydro, the gas companies do pay municipal taxes wherever they are established. Hydro pays grants in lieu of, which is much lower. I will make a bigger and better point, I hope, when the hon. member for Muskoka has a chance to speak on it. There has been an inequality here for many, many years and I think the gas companies are, in this instance, carrying their load; Hydro is not.

Vote 603 agreed to.

On vote 604:

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, on vote 604, I had rather hoped that we would get some sort of a statement on government policy insofar as conservation is concerned. When the original estimates were introduced, it was my understanding that because this was a comparatively new department the new hon. Minister would deal with the energy portions of the estimates; the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts) was supposed to deal with the conservation portion, I think the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner) was going to take on water resources, and the hon. member for Muskoka was going to take on Hydro.

Mr. Sopha: With the help of the man from Renfrew South.

Mr. Singer: The man from Renfrew South? Well, I do not really know.

But I gather there has been some change of thought insofar as this method of procedure is concerned, and the task of enunciating government policy insofar as conservation is concerned falls upon the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management. I listened carefully to his remarks, both when he introduced his estimates and subsequently, and unfortunately there has been no statement at all about whether there is or is not a government policy, or any different government policy, insofar as conservation is concerned. I would have thought, Mr. Chairman, that this would be something that the government would be most interested in and worried about, particularly in view of some of the material that has been presented to the public over the last several months.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I tried to make a statement here regarding conservation before the orders of the day and I was told to leave it until the proper vote comes up, so perhaps that will answer the hon. member's question.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I will gladly give way to the hon. Minister if this statement is what he wants to read. I have already read it. It really does not say anything about conservation. It has something to do with having the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr.

Stewart) give some more money for farm ponds and a few other little things.

I wonder if he should not draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman) to the fact that this was in the hands of the press before it was delivered in the House, because he was a little perturbed that the hon. member for Yorkview (Mr. Young) had a predigested press release handed out. But this is the one that the hon. Minister is talking about. If he wants me to give way for a few minutes, I gladly will. Go ahead, read it.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I might say that the report was handed to the press as I started to give it before the House, before I was so rudely stopped. Now, if we can carry on with conservation.

Mr. Singer: Well, does my hon. friend want to read his statement?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: No, I will read it on the vote, that is what you people want.

Mr. Singer: Should we plead with you to read it or do you—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, the fact remains that we have no government statement on the policies in regard to conservation presently before the House and this statement does not really deal with conservation either.

I would have thought, Mr. Chairman, that the government would have been somewhat concerned about news stories such as that concerning the new Fairy Lake park, which was opened with a great deal of public acclaim on the Wednesday before July 2 up at Newmarket and within a few days it was closed again because it was polluted.

One would have thought that somewhere along the line, in the diversification of various government efforts into these fields, that there could be some joining together of government authorities to make sure that when they open a park that they are not going to have to close it within a few days because the stream or the pond in it designated for swimming purposes is polluted. This is a typical example and highlights, more than I can by any series of examples, the inadequacy of government approach insofar as this important field is concerned. Here is a park in York county, that is opened, and within a few days thereafter the health authorities move in and they close it up because it is polluted and they cannot allow the public in because of danger of infection. Could there be any greater condemnation of the lack of government co-ordination in these fields?

Mr. Chairman, I came across, and I am sure that most hon. members were in receipt of this same publication, a pamphlet called "Crisis on the Credit" written by Robert Turnbull in a series of articles in the Globe and Mail. This, as a matter of fact, was the series of articles that entitled Mr. Turnbull to the outstanding distinction of a national newspaper award for his ability in writing about matters of public concern. This is a pamphlet, if the hon. Minister has not read it, and I would presume he has not because he has had nothing to say on conservation, that I would urgently commend to his attention. As a matter of fact, after I am through speaking I will send it over to him so he can read it. There are certain portions of it marked here that I am going to draw to his attention now. Mr. Turnbull had this to say:

Water and soil are the two most precious substances on earth. On them all life depends, yet they are the resources most prodigally squandered by mankind.

Throughout the centuries the abuse of water and soil has turned fruitful lands into barren deserts, a creeping evil that is far from ended. Today priceless soil is being smothered under the sterile concrete of urban expansion across fields and forest cover. Today equally priceless water is being polluted by human sewage and industrial wastes and water levels are rapidly dwindling so that in the summer muddy trickles remain where once proud rivers ran.

As man builds he also destroys and by the destruction of natural resources he is sapping the very foundations on which he seeks to build.

Now the hon. Minister made a discovery when he prepared this press release. He discovered there had been a drought last year, and suddenly all of the resources of government are being mustered to do something about the very thing that Mr. Turnbull points out has gone on for many years.

The creation of this department and the bringing into it of the conservation branch and the water resources branch still leaves the same fragmentation of authority in government thinking that existed before. As I mentioned when the bill forming this new department was set up, we are playing a little game called "Button, button, who has got the new commission?"; and apparently it is this hon. Minister's turn at this time. But we still have the planning authority left with the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs, Mr. Chairman, and, in this statement that the hon. Minister is going to read sometime later in the afternoon when he gets in the mood, we have additional responsibilities given to the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

It is small wonder that we are not getting anywhere in the field of conservation. It is small wonder that we have the crisis on the Credit that Mr. Turnbull talks about so eloquently. It is small wonder, Mr. Chairman, when there is this diversification of authority within government and with the various Cabinet Ministers and within the various commissions, that there is not anyone on the government benches that is prepared to stand up and say this is our policy on conservation. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that there is no government policy on conservation and that there cannot be a government policy on conservation as long as there is this great diversification and confusion that exists in the minds of the Cabinet.

Mr. Turnbull talks about the ravaged Humber or the sleazy Don. Now any of us who live in the Metropolitan area and are familiar at all with the Humber River or the Don River will recognize that these are most apt descriptions, notwithstanding the efforts that have been put forward over the years, and I commend the Metropolitan Toronto and Region Conservation Authority. I think they have done a very fine job, under a very serious limitation. Notwithstanding their efforts—

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): With the great assistance of this government and with some assistance from Ottawa. Now be fair!

Mr. Singer: All right, I will be fair, as the hon. Minister says. This government has given some assistance and Ottawa has given some assistance. And I will be just as fair as the hon. Minister. He talked about "great" and "some". I will say that at least both levels of government did something, but they are still a long way short of having produced something that can be described as beautiful rivers again, or even clean rivers, or even attractive rivers. The descriptions "ravaged Humber" and "sleazy Don", I say, are most apt.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, when I drove down the Don Valley Parkway this morning there were froth bubbles from detergents about two feet high on portions of the Don River. This is a common occurrence on the Don almost every day and I would presume it is the same on the Humber, although I do not see it quite as frequently as I see the Don.

These rivers are running slow, they are open sewers in fact, and there is very little being done or attempted in any enunciation of government policy that is going to clear this up.

Mr. Turnbull says that in the year 1954, and I am going to talk about the Credit River because it was possible, and perhaps still is possible, to do something to save the Credit. He says this:

In the year 1954 the provincial government established the Credit Valley Conservation Authority to be the guardian of the river. In 1956 a voluminous study covering every conceivable aspect of the watershed was completed and it made 55 recommendations which it deemed necessary to the betterment of the protection of the valley.

During the years since dust has gathered on most of the suggestions, although there are some indications that some of the cobwebs may be blown away this year.

That was 1963. I do not know what cobwebs were blown away in 1963, and perhaps before the debate is over the hon. Minister will be in a position to tell us.

This paragraph goes on to say:

Admittedly, good progress has been made in developing public park lands but that is about all that has been done in a physical sense.

The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs, Mr. Chairman, should, I think, pay some attention to that remark, because he wanted some credit and Mr. Turnbull gives some credit. He says that:

Admittedly, good progress has been made in developing public park lands but that is about all that has been done in a physical sense.

And what, in fact, I am talking about, is pollution.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I would suggest to the hon. member that he get Mr. Turnbull to meet with Dr. Ross Lord, the chairman of the Metropolitan Toronto Conservation Authority, and he will tell him a thing or two. Much more than that has been done, let me assure you.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I am happy that the hon. Minister should mention Dr. Ross Lord. I know Dr. Lord very well. I worked with him on the planning board of the township of North York. I had a bit to say at the time he was appointed to his present position. At the beginning of my remarks I commended the Metropolitan Toronto Conservation Authority for the work it has done.

My criticism is not directed to it or to the chairman, Dr. Ross Lord. My criticism is directed to the government and I am suggesting that the government has not as yet seen fit to co-ordinate its efforts in this field and it is still a hodge-podge of confusion. But since some responsibility apparently is with the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management, and some is with the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs, and some is with the hon. Minister of Agriculture, and some is with the water resources commission, and some is with somebody else, order cannot possibly be brought out of the chaos that exists there. The government, in continuing this chaos, is making sure that very little is being done to clean up the pollution.

Look at the Don River, look at the Humber River, look what is happening to the Credit River; that, Mr. Chairman, is the condemnation of the government's policy and if there is any answer to this, it is not just sufficient to have somebody say, "Talk to Dr. Ross Lord and he will set you straight." I would have hoped, and I think we were entitled to hear from the government benches today, some defence of government policy, some plans about how it is going to clear up river pollution. But we have not heard a word from any one of them.

The hon. Minister piqueishly says, "If I had read my statement it would have fixed everything up." Well, in due course he will read his statement. But there is nothing in there about pollution and there is a further division of authority. The hon. Minister of Agriculture is given some additional responsibilities. Again the confusion is extended rather than limited. Again there is no policy.

It is interesting to hear that in 1956, when these 1955 recommendations were introduced—no, I am sorry, it was a year later—a gentleman named Leslie M. Frost, who held a position of substantial authority at that time, said:

This is the time to act. We must do something now.

In 1957 Mr. Frost was making those statements, but in 1964 very little has been done.

On page 3, Mr. Turnbull said:

Yet if the physical health of the watershed waits much longer for attention, the river inevitably will wither. Pollution will increase as the water flow decreases. Life dribbles away irretrievably with each day, month and year of inaction.

We have had a lot of days, months and years of inaction from this government.

There is a picture here on page four and the title under it says:

Sewage and detergents are stirred into an unsavoury mess. Born in purity, the Credit progressively changes into a coffee-coloured sewer.

I am not going to read all of this book. It runs through 46 pages, but there are some extracts in here that are certainly worth careful study.

Again, on page 17, Mr. Turnbull has this to say:

Already then, the river has waited more than seven years since the CVA report of 1956 for remedies, and has 15 more years at least to wait before a partial cure. But there is no doubt that a 70 per cent improved flow would go far to combat pollution:

In the meantime, though, urbanization of the valley will increase the pressures on the river so the time for action is now.

Words with a familiar ring, for they were said about the same problem in 1956 by the then Prime Minister, Mr. Frost.

On page 18:

So it was not until 1956, two years after the authority was formed, that a detailed report on the Credit River was produced.

Again reference to the 1955 recommendations, and most important to the health of the valley:

Most of them have not as yet been implemented.

On page 27, Mr. Turnbull refers to conversations he has had with municipal officials:

Looking to the future of Chinguacousy, Reeve Clarke sees a city of 50,000 persons growing up around Bramalea subdivision and hopes the valley will be developed as one big recreation area.

What does he regard as the greatest problem plaguing the river in his township? "Pollution," says Reeve Clarke.

T. W. Glassford, the reeve of Caledon, says, "Water pollution is our greatest problem."

The title under the picture on page 39 of this pamphlet reads:

Turbid and tarnished, the Credit dies amid the urban hubbub along Lake Ontario.

On page 41 I read:

Several factors have caused the deterioration of the fishing: silting, through gravel washing operations, which are now controlled; pollution from sewage and rubbish dumps; dwindling water flow with resulting high temperatures that play hob with fish such as brook trout, comfortable only in cold, clean water.

And then, finally, in his last article, entitled, "Too Many Doctors for an Ailing River," he has this to say:

The greatest problem, however, is the confusion over who is responsible for what. So many fingers on so many levels of government and departments thereof dabble in the stream that the waters of responsibility are inevitably muddled.

For example, planning and land use, including building, come under eight separate bodies: the municipal council, the Ontario Municipal Board, The Department of Municipal Affairs, the Ontario Water Resources Commission, the conservation authority, The Department of Lands and Forests, The Department of Agriculture and Metropolitan Toronto planning.

I would like the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs, because he seems to be the only one who is even the least bit concerned about this, to tell us how, with these eight different authorities involved in this thing, he can expect to get any order out of the chaos that exists.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Does the hon. member want an answer now?

Mr. Singer: Yes, go ahead.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The hon. member realizes very well that he is just attempting to confuse the issue. He knows very well that the Ontario Municipal Board, for instance, to which he has referred, is the final authority in hearing all of the discussions and all of the problems and all of the recommendations in connection with planning. He understands that better than I do, but still he attempts to confuse the whole issue by saying there are eight authorities responsible. Nothing of the kind. The people responsible are the Metropolitan Toronto and Region Conservation Authority and other authorities, and they are the ones doing the job with respect to the Credit River and other streams in this general area.

Mr. Singer: I am glad that we have the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs into that point. I did not throw the municipal board in; I said Mr. Turnbull did. But I must go on and say that there is joint responsibility among municipal authorities in the hon.

Minister's department, in the new Department of Energy and Resources Management, in the water resources department, in The Department of Agriculture, and in a couple more too.

I suggest that it is no answer for the hon. Minister to stand up and say, "Well, first of all it is not a Metro conservation authority that is concerned in this, it is the Credit conservation authority, which is a different one." The Metro conservation authority comes in nevertheless. If you are going to produce any answer on the Credit—the Humber and the Don are probably gone irretrievably, I do not think you are ever going to be able to fix those up—

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): No, they are not.

Mr. Singer: The hon. member for High Park says no, they are not. I hope he is right.

Mr. Cowling: I am going to speak when the hon. member—

Mr. Singer: Well, I hope he is right. I hope there will be the day when somebody can drive down the Don Valley parkway and not be able to see four or five feet of detergents going through that open sewer, which used to be, 50 years ago or perhaps 100 years ago, one of the finest streams in Ontario. I hope that day will be coming but I have grave doubts. I hope the hon. member for High Park and I live long enough to be able to see that, to see a nice clean stream there where the Don River now runs, and where the Humber River now runs, but I doubt it very much. Certainly we are not going to get it as long as there is this mix-up in authority on the government benches.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: There is no mix-up at all.

Mr. Singer: I am quoting again from Mr. Turnbull:

Water supply, including financing of systems, is touched by six bodies: municipal council, OMB, Municipal Affairs, conservation authorities, Lands and Forests, OWRC.

And he did not have available at that time a new Department of Energy and Resources Management, but that can be added in now.

Finally, he says this on page 46, which is the last page:

Perhaps the Credit River has too many doctors, when one considers all the government fingers that feel its pulse. All of these physicians know that the river is sick and it requires treatment and nursing back to health. And for nearly ten years now they have stood around the patient's bed; while they stand the river's life blood, water, is failing.

And in the last paragraph he says this:

Without dams and reservoirs one year of drought—and I think we had that last year:

—it might be this year, or next year or the one after, there is no telling, could destroy the Credit River. The time for action is now.

Now this criticism is not levied only insofar as the Credit River is concerned; this criticism is applicable equally in all of the river valleys in southern Ontario certainly. And even in the north as well.

But when the government deliberately carries on this fragmentation of authority, this balkanization, if you want to call it that, the government is encouraging a lack of action that Mr. Turnbull complains about so eloquently in this series of articles.

The planning is with the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs and his department. The hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management has a supervisory jurisdiction over the water resources commission. Apparently he has the responsibility—and I am not clear on this and I wish he would tell us—for the conservation authorities. I suppose it really relates to the handing out of money.

Part of that responsibility he gives over to the hon. Minister of Agriculture. The water resources commission comes under this hon. Minister as well, but the water resources commission is, after all, a commission, and is independent; so the hon. Minister is not supposed to, by the rules, interfere too much with this.

Mr. Chairman: The water resources commission comes under—

Mr. Singer: Oh, I agree, Mr. Chairman, and my criticism is not the water resources commission; my criticism is—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The hon. member does not know what it is; let us be fair.

Mr. Singer: I am sorry, I have only one copy; but I will send it to the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management and he can pass it on to the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

I say, Mr. Chairman, in closing, merely this: This government has the most unhappy record in the field of conservation, and in its actions taken in this session of the Legislature it has done nothing to give any encouragement to the people of Ontario that it is really concerned about the problems which exist.

Mr. Cowling: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to the hon. member for Downsview about conservation and I think an awful lot the hon. member said was with tongue in cheek. It must be. For example, he referred to the Don. I used to swim in the Don in the old swimming hole, just where the Don Valley Parkway is, and it was pretty clean in those days.

The hon. member must remember that there is much more of the Don, up north of where you drive past every day, than there is south of that area; and much of it up in there is in pretty good condition.

However, I am going to confine my remarks to the Humber. I live out on the banks of the Humber and I am much more familiar with it. As one of the government members on the Metropolitan Toronto conservation authority, I think that there are some things which should be said about the work of that great body, Mr. Chairman. Certainly the pollution of the water is one part of their work which is receiving not only attention but action; and I have some comments to make on the annual report of Dr. Ross Lord, the chairman of the authority, made just a month or two ago; I think they would well go into the record, Mr. Chairman.

For example, he said:

The land acquisition of the Metropolitan Toronto conservation authority has grown, from 1,800 acres in 1957 to over 13,500 acres in 1963. The conservation areas, now numbering nine, open to the public, comprising some 4,300 acres, attracted 157,000 people in 1957; and in 1963 the attendance for the first time topped the one million mark.

I hope the hon. member is listening to this, Mr. Chairman.

The million people are not going into this area just for—well, I was going to say the fun and games, but actually they are going for that reason; they are also going there because they use the water, and the water in the conservation areas north of the city of Metropolitan Toronto is clean enough to use, to bathe in, and to enjoy.

Mr. Singer: Fairy Lake Park?

Mr. Cowling: Yes, including that one.

Mr. Singer: That was the one they closed down—

Mr. Cowling: Well, listen to this now. The flood control plan, which is all helping to keep the water pure and usable, launched in 1961, after the signing of the agreement between the federal and provincial governments and the authorities, is now well under way. The Clairville dam will be completed by the summer of 1964, and many other projects are either completed or progressing favourably. I have seen these jobs under construction. The conservation school at the Albion Hills is completing a most gratifying first year.

I can remember suggesting several years ago in the House, and maybe hon. members on the other side did too, that we should take advantage of this conservation and make sure that the students in our schools should have firsthand information about this important subject.

So this government assisted in having a school built in the conservation area at the Albion Hills. It is a very remarkable place; I have been there several times. School boards have reserved time for the entire academic session, and the 1964-65 season is almost completely booked up at this date. The school has already proven itself to be a fine addition to our facilities; it is a beautiful building and, at the same time, is efficiently functional. You should go up and have a look at that, if you have not already done so.

The conservation services work of the authority has continued to expand. During the year, 337,000 trees were planted. The farm tree replacement programme handled 3,000 trees and there were 25 farm ponds built in 1963.

During the year various schemes were initiated to increase the holdings in the conservation area by 525 acres, and there is a great list of new areas which have been taken over by the authority. In addition to the above-mentioned areas, the authority owns and manages the following: Bruce's Mill, Glen Major, Uxbridge and a Palgrave wildlife conservation area. A total of 7,000 acres of flood lands have been developed.

The flood control road work is proceeding as quickly as funds and engineering designs permit. The Clairville dam, under construction since last fall, has 80 per cent of its concrete and 40 per cent of its earth placement completed. The dam construction is well ahead of schedule and should be finished by August 1964. The Indian Line road for this project has been completed and the contracts have been let.

In 1963, there were 84 properties and 1,538 acres; the total to date is 195 properties, 27,000 acres. This is under the federal-provincial authority for participation projects, which this government is so active in supporting.

A significant contribution to the conservation services division this year was the preparation and presentation of the brief on recreation and water pollution in the Metropolitan Toronto region. This brief studies in detail the factors contributing to the pollution of our rivers and recommends a plan which, if followed, will preserve certain areas from pollution for years to come.

Mr. Singer: Well, that is the whole point.

Mr. Cowling: All right, we are getting on with it. Get this, Mr. Chairman:

The report, already approved by the authorities, has been presented to the Metropolitan Toronto Planning Board and will be presented to other area boards and councils within the next few months.

Information and education—in this division of our work, the outstanding event during 1963 was the completion of the conservation school; the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) opened that school. Any one of the hon. members, sir, who have not visited the pioneer village just north of Metropolitan Toronto, should certainly take advantage of the fine weather and go up and have a look at this display.

Now, something of the future. Last year it was said that we were well launched on the flood control programme. The programme has been considerably advanced this year. The Claireville dam, completed in 1964; the Black Creek, the York Mills channel, should be constructed this summer. Our land acquisition for flood control has reached 6,300 acres.

This land, Mr. Chairman, is being acquired as fast as funds will permit.

In the report a year ago, it was stated that pollution of our rivers must be attacked in a more vigorous fashion. I am happy to say that the authority has taken the first major step in this direction by the production of this report on recreation and pollution control in the area. This report lays out a working plan, which, if followed, will enable us to conserve certain waters from creeping pollutions for a few decades at least. In my opinion, the report is a forthright attempt at the solution of what many thought to be an almost unsolvable problem. It is my sincere hope that all planning boards and municipalities will adopt the plan.

Now, you were saying we were just moving helter-skelter on this thing and that nothing is being done about the pollution of our streams. I think it lays out in this report that this particular authority, with the assistance of the government, is doing something, is actively engaged in doing something about cleaning up our waters in this great Metropolitan area. And as Toronto goes, so do the other conservation areas. No doubt they will all have an opportunity of considering this report on pollution, because as you know the 31 conservation authorities which operate in the province meet together annually. I understand that the chairman and vice-chairman and others meet more regularly than that, to discuss mutual problems. Certainly this one on pollution is at the top of the list.

What I am pointing out, Mr. Chairman, is something is being done about it. We are past the talking stage and we are going to work on the problem.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Frost said that ten years ago.

Mr. Cowling: As we all know, the 23 municipalities in the Metropolitan area make it possible for this particular Metropolitan conservation authority to carry on its good work and they have a very active part in the whole situation.

Mr. Chairman, it is so easy to criticize this pollution matter.

Mr. MacDonald: It is even easier to do nothing.

Mr. Cowling: It is a very simple thing to criticize the air pollution, with which I have had some experience, but things are being done about it.

This government set up the first air pollution control. It was this government that established The Conservation Authorities Act in the first place; everybody else just talked about it.

Now I do agree, Mr. Chairman, that there has been some overlapping of authority in various departments. As a matter of fact, I suggested some time ago that maybe we should have a Minister of conservation only and maybe that will come about one of these days. But in the meantime, my view, Mr. Chairman, is that the conservation authorities are now in the right place, sir, under the Minister of Energy and Resources Management. Here is a man who will give conservation the place that it deserves in the role of government and working together we can go a long way to conserve these wonderful natural resources we have in this great province.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chairman: Order. The member for Yorkview.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, it was with a great deal of interest that I listened to the hon. member for High Park and his last suggestion that perhaps a Minister of conservation be appointed. It is a good suggestion, and with the obvious interest of the hon. Minister I think he should talk to the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts) about it and perhaps get an appointment directly to the Cabinet for this purpose.

Mr. MacDonald: That may be the quickest way.

Mr. Young: Well, it might kill it, we do not know. We have to experiment here a little bit.

But I think what he said about the Metro conservation authority is all good, and certainly I think all of us agree that the Metro conservation authority has been doing an outstanding job within the power which it has been given by the provincial government. It has been cribbed, cabined and confined by its financial limitations and has gone as far as it can under the circumstances. Under Dr. Ross Lord, however, I think something has been accomplished.

I also have some quotations here from the report of the conservation authority, the last one, and it also, in addition to what the hon. member for High Park has said, issues a warning to this government and to the people of Ontario. This warning is along this line. I might say that the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs said that the authority has been assisted by this government and by the federal government. That is true, assisted, but not enough; because this report says that:

Pollution often reaches several hundred times the levels accepted as safe by the Ontario Water Resources Commission.

This is in the rivers in Metro. It shows that Metro's standards for sewage treatment are behind those of other countries and may have to be raised. The Don and the Humber Rivers are grossly polluted, the report said, and blamed the discharge of inadequately treated sewage. Then, it goes on to say this:

But even the best Metro and outlying treatment plants operating under the best conditions do only two-thirds the treatment job demanded by some countries.

So we have a long piece to go here in Metro, and a long piece to go in other authorities, to bring up the standard of what we ought to be doing in the way of treating the effluence from industry and from the cities and towns along our streams.

But there is another matter which I want to bring before the House this afternoon in this connection. It is this: The Metro authority today needs to buy a great deal of land along our river valleys which is now available and which it cannot purchase because of its lack of funds. Subdivisions have been progressing at a great rate in this area as we all know, and those subdivisions are overreaching the financial resources of the conservation authority. So today the conservation authority would like to purchase much land and it cannot because of its financial handicaps.

I think, sir, that you, as the Minister in charge of this operation, ought to give very serious consideration to working out—I am not going to suggest how it should be done—but working out the kind of financial arrangement which will enable the Metro conservation authority, and any other conservation authority in similar circumstances, to acquire the lands that should be acquired before the overreaching subdivisions push the banks down into the streams and do all kinds of things that they are doing today because that land cannot be acquired ahead of the subdivider. So I put that before you, sir, as one of the great needs today in this realm of conservation.

Another matter of which this House should be aware is one which has recently emerged and been highlighted by the Great Lakes conference held at the University of Toronto under the auspices of the Great Lakes Institute. It was pointed out at that time that 25 per cent of all Canadians live within the Great Lakes basin and that these lakes are becoming polluted at a rate which is unprecedented in human history.

Lake Erie, according to studies made by the Great Lakes Institute, and Lake Michigan also, has only about 60 per cent of the sewage and industrial waste flowing into them treated. They point out that until we get about 80 per cent treated, that the balance between pure and impure water cannot be maintained. So they have stressed that drastic steps must be taken right away to see to it that the kind of pollution control is undertaken which will restore the balance in these lakes. We are polluting them faster than nature can look after the situation.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, today we are turning the Great Lakes into the biggest septic tank in human history. Dr. Langford points this out, and it is reported in the Financial Post of April 18 that in the next ten years, if we do not check pollution on a large scale, we may not be able to restore Michigan and Erie to anything like normal conditions.

He said that there is a dead area of about 2,000 square miles at the bottom of Lake Erie where fish and other organisms cannot live, there is no oxygen. The phenol count, refuse discharged by industries, is higher than the level recommended by the international joint commission. He says also that it is doubtful whether any beach in Lake Erie is fit for swimming. The turbidity and amount of dissolved salts has increased during the past few years.

Now if this is so—and we already know the effects of pollution upon the fishery industry in Lake Erie—and if this statement is true then those fisheries as well as the great tourist industry face a very serious future. What this means for health along the bathing beaches of Lake Erie is another matter we will have to take into serious consideration.

The institute pointed out something else; that atomic power is now making possible great desalting plants using salt water as a basis and that by 1975 at the very latest, these plants can operate with sufficient capacity to bring salt water into the fresh state to handle any industry which may so wish.

The threat here is clear. As the pollution increases in the Great Lakes, then the great industrial complexes situated around these lakes may well be looking to the east coast and the west coast for future industrial sites. If they go, of course, the human beings who work in those industries must go with them.

As far back as 1909, we had a treaty, an international treaty between the United States and Canada, in connection with lake pollution and all this. But that treaty has never been taken seriously and the time is here when I think this government must push the federal government, and co-operate with the federal government and with international authorities in cleaning up the pollution in our rivers, at least those which flow into the Great Lakes; and then do our utmost to push back that pollution factor within the lakes themselves and change the emerging septic tank into lakes of pure water once more.

I do not need this afternoon, this has already been discussed at some length now and at a former time, I do not need to talk too much about what needs to be done and the steps which need to be taken. But certainly the whole field of conservation along our streams must be looked at and the conservation processes must be speeded up immeasurably. The farm ponds that we heard so much about must be built, and built at a much more rapid rate. We must restore marginal land to forest growth. We must provide the sponges through swamp lands for the water to soak into the ground. All these measures must take place.

Then this matter of sewage disposal that the hon. member for Downsview spoke about, sir, and the pollution of our rivers caused by it, that has been discussed in this House, is desperately important. The water resources commission, when that matter comes before the House, should be discussed thoroughly. The water resources commission has a responsibility here. It must speed the process of cleaning up the effluence of industry and sewage from our towns and cities.

There is one other thing that I would like to mention at this time, and perhaps the hon. Minister has some advice about it. We have a situation developing as our subdivisions push up the river valleys. The lots are laid out so that they cross the ravines and the river valleys and those backs of lots become part and parcel of the real estate owned by the homeowner. So that forever, or until a government or an authority is willing to spend very large amounts of money, that land is lost to the public.

Then, too, the subdivider, in his enthusiasm to get more level land to build upon, pushes the earth down over the bank, buries the trees, the bushes and the grass. So instead of the original verdure which holds the slope we have a pile of mud which the first rain starts to wash down into the stream. This, of course, adds to the stream pollution. We have seen along our streams and water-courses and river valleys, in Metro and other places, this process going on. The trees die or are cut and these roots that should be holding the banks are destroyed, and the banks just slither into the rivers.

We have today, Mr. Chairman, legislation which enables a conservation authority to outline the proper banks, and to give power to the conservation authority, if it so wishes, to purchase this land between the top of a bank on the one side of a stream and the top of a bank on the other side of the stream. But this kind of legislation is only permissive, it is not mandatory. I think the time is here when this kind of legislation should be mandatory and no building should be allowed from the top of the bank down to the valley.

Not only no building, but this land should be set aside for acquisition by public authority, so that that land is held in perpetuity for the people. The banks can thus be preserved and the recreation areas in those valleys can be held for the people for years to come. I know it is not going to be easy to delineate the top of a bank, but these things are being done in many areas today and they can be done across the province.

The delineation should take place before subdivision, so any authority armed with this power could be moving ahead of development, delineating the tops of the banks and then acquiring the land. There again we come to the problem that I mentioned before, that money somehow must be made available, or credit, to buy that land at a price which is fair to the owner, but also fair to the authority which is acquiring it.

I bring these things to your attention, Mr. Chairman, and the attention of this House, because I think it is desperately important that we stop playing with this business of conservation and that we stop being satisfied with going as fast as it seems practical to go. We have to move much more rapidly, and we have to start now to face up to our responsibility of retrieving the ground we have lost, and preventing the kind of pollution and the kind of degradation of great natural resources, that we have seen in this province in the days that are gone.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, the one thing I agree with the hon. member for High Park about is that there should be—I notice too that he says he is a government member, I did not know he was in the Cabinet—but I do agree with him—

Mr. Cowling: Just to straighten my hon. friend out, I said I was a member of the Metropolitan Toronto and Region Conservation Authority.

Mr. Troy: He said he was the government member.

Mr. Cowling: The government member on that authority.

Mr. Troy: Oh, pardon me. I presume he is appointed by the government.

In any event I agree with him in one particular, that I think that this subject of conservation, because it has so much to do with our very life, should be a separate department and I have spoken on conservation before. I have brought attention to the fact that the supply of water is so important and I have repeated several times that this government should have a conference with the federal government, with the province of Quebec, with the states that border on the Great Lakes. This problem of how we are going to replenish our water supplies and conservation, again, is very important, because of our forests and our agriculture and the land uses, the erosion of our streams, the pollution of our streams; all these are most important.

The hon. Minister mentioned the number of conservation authorities, I think by far the greater number is in southern Ontario. There are one or two, I believe, in northern Ontario. There is one in the Sudbury area and one, I believe, at the head of the lakes. But there are very few in northern Ontario.

One of the reasons that we need, as the former Minister of Lands and Forests and now the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs knows, and the northern hon. members know, is to set up conservation authorities in our section of the province. But the great problem is the fact that so many of our townships are unorganized. We in the Nipissing watershed, just as in the watersheds of the Mattagami in the vicinity of Timmins had their problems in regard to floods several years ago. We never know, in our own area, when we are going to have them again, so we should have conservation authorities in my own district.

As the federal member for Timiskaming pointed out too, at a meeting we had in my home city, there is a necessity for a conservation authority in his area. The problem, again, is that there are so many unorganized townships and very few organized townships to pay the bill. The former Minister of Economics and Development, now retired, and the former Minister of Lands and Forests, know this problem; other Ministers who have been in this department also know of the problems, but nothing has been done to set up a conservation authority in the Nipissing area.

Now, many of the townships are denuded of their forest cover. The result is that runoff in the spring is very heavy. If the water content of the snow is high, then we are faced with the possibility of floods destroying all sorts of suitable areas along the borders of Lake Nipissing. I would ask the hon. Minister if any thought has been given, not only in that area but in all other areas of northern Ontario, as to how we can possibly set up a conservation authority—when the government itself accepts no responsibility for the control dams and other projects which have to be arranged for in the unorganized townships.

I have spoken about this, time and time again. I have spoken to the former director of the branch; the present director of the branch, too, is cognizant of the problem, the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs is cognizant, and certainly the northern hon. members are. I wonder if anything can be done to make it at all possible for us to set up conservation authorities, because we have that watershed problem. I will read something into the record. This is from that very fine author of the letters of the Royal Bank of Canada. He points out that:

The watershed problem is one of the red letter problems of the day. Almost everything that has to do with renewable natural resources, with forestry, with farming, hunting, fishing and the economics of production, is tied up with the watershed.

I hope that some day, and some day soon, we will have from the government some indication of what they are doing to assist areas to set up conservation authorities in northern Ontario.

I notice that the hon. Minister is thinking that over and over, and I hope it goes beyond—

Hon. Mr. Simonett: That is right; taking it under advisement.

Mr. MacDonald: Not only in the fullness of time, but in the stillness of time.

Mr. Troy: In time, at least.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, I was hesitating, because I thought the question of the hon. member for Nipissing merited an answer.

Mr. Troy: They all do; all my questions do.

Mr. Bryden: The hon. Minister sat staring at him. I would not say that the expression on his face conveyed to me the impression that there was very much cerebration going on, but the—

Mr. Troy: I hypnotized him.

Mr. Bryden: The hon. member has something of a hypnotic effect—

Mr. Troy: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Bryden: Perhaps the hon. member for Nipissing has discovered a new method of influencing the government. Certainly in this area we need some new devices and, unfortunately, we all too frequently encounter the kind of statement we got a few minutes ago from the hon. member for High Park now that the hon. member for High Park and the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrope) are jointly the leaders of the hallelujah chorus on the benches opposite. I have no objection to hallelujahs, Mr. Chairman, but when they are a substitute for thought, policy and action they are not only inadequate but dangerous.

I would think, after what the hon. member for Yorkview had to say, the hon. member for High Park may wish to withdraw the major portion of his speech, but I want to elaborate on one phase of his remarks.

He referred to the Metropolitan Toronto and Region Conservation Authority, referred to the fine work it is doing. I think that all of us in this House agree that the Metropolitan Toronto conservation authority has done a tremendous job and ought to be complimented on the work it has done. We regret that the funds it has at its disposal, for the very important work it has to do, are grossly inadequate; and as long as I have been a member of this House, the authority has, in my memory, been trying to put before the government the concept that much more funds are required for the work it has to do. Unfortunately, I do not know how much effect it has had on the government. I suspect that it is still as starved of financial resources as it has always been.

The hon. member for High Park referred to a report which the conservation authority issued recently. It is a report entitled: "Pollution Control and Recreation in the Metropolitan Toronto Region." It is dated June, 1963, although I think it has been circularized more recently than that. I received a copy of it only within the last month or so and I have no doubt other hon. members of the House got it at the same time.

In view of the suggestions of the hon. member for High Park and, to a lesser extent, the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs, that everything is under control in regard to pollution, I want to read a few extracts from this report. I think we will all note that it is couched in cautious and measured language. There is no attempt to do any rabble-rousing in this report, and it is proper that there should not be. The facts are simply stated dispassionately.

At the beginning of the report, the authority does us the service of providing us with an abstract, and I am going to read mainly from the abstract. I will start with the first two paragraphs of it:

A co-ordinated pollution control programme is needed urgently—

It does not say that it is now in operation but says it:

—is needed urgently in the Metropolitan Toronto region in order to preserve the existing and proposed outdoor recreation resource. Space and facilities for outdoor recreation are required to meet the demands of a present population of 1.8 million people which will more than double by the year 2000.

Sewage disposal facilities have been planned and partly implemented within the "suburban ring," in a manner which will safeguard the natural resources and their potential for recreation. Outside Metropolitan Toronto, pollution and recreation will clash. By 1980 approximately 55 cfs of sewage effluent will be delivered to the rivers above Metropolitan Toronto, while the mean minimum monthly flow of all streams, as they approach Metropolitan Toronto, is about 80 cfs at present.

A little later in the abstract the authority has this to say:

There are 22 sewage treatment plants within the conservation authority region. All but four discharge treated wastes to the streams of the region. In general, the condition of many streams is poor, particularly in the middle and lower reaches. Extraction of water from the streams, most of which have low summer flows, is increasing. The quantity of water available to the recreation programme is equally as important as water quality, and in certain cases and within certain limits of purity, quantity may be more important than quality depending on the specific water uses planned.

A little further in the same report:

The main purpose of this report is to propose a plan of water quality requirements for the region. It appears inevitable that a substantial volume of treated sewage will be discharged to streams north of the Metropolitan Toronto boundary. Where, and with what degree of treatment, are the questions of practical importance.

And then the abstract goes on to say that:

In this report the region has been divided into three zones:

1. Metro Zone—served by Metropolitan Toronto Works Department by lakeshore treatment plants, with recreation potential partly restricted by water quality.

2. Development Zone—served by local municipalities by upstream treatment plants, with recreation potential partly restricted by water quality.

3. Headwater Zone—served by local municipalities by upstream plants, with recreation potential unrestricted by water quality.

I think I will not read all of what is here, but I would like to read the section relating to the headwater zone:

The headwater zone is the section of the region which requires the greatest degree of control. Development above reservoir sites should be serviced by sewage disposal facilities which prevent the direct discharge of wastes to watercourses in the headwater zone.

Close co-operation between all agencies in planning and management of water use will ensure the success of conservation, recreation and pollution control schemes. The purpose of this report is to encourage and assist in the formation of a co-ordinated pollution control programme in the Metropolitan Toronto region.

I think one can say that the Metropolitan Toronto and Region Conservation Authority should be commended on the initiative it has taken in analyzing this problem and in suggesting solutions. I think it has done its part up till now. It has called attention to the problem and it has suggested ways through which it can be handled. But it does not follow, as the hon. member for High Park seems to think, Mr. Chairman, that because the problem has been delineated and suggestions have been made for remedying it we now have nothing to worry about. I would say that our worries start at this point. We now realize what the nature of the problem is and the question that surely faces us is: What is being done about it?

The next section of the conservation authority's report is a statement of policy and recommendations. I am going to read only two of the recommendations and I am going to read them with a view to asking the hon. Minister responsible: What is being done in relation to these recommendations? The first is item 3, under the general heading of Policy and Recommendations:

3. The authority recommends to the Ontario Water Resources Commission, the Ontario Municipal Board, The Department of Municipal Affairs, the Metropolitan Toronto Planning Board, and other planning boards in the region, that they consider this plan in formulating their policies on pollution abatement in the region.

The hon. member for Downsview complained about the division of authority in this field.

The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs pooched his suggestion. I must say that though I have a high regard for the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs, I could not quite see how he could take such a cavalier attitude to the problem. There is a real lack of co-ordination; there are so many people responsible in this field that nobody ever gets around to doing anything.

We heard yesterday, on another matter relating to safety, the handling of propane gas and other gases, that for 18 months the government has not done a solitary thing about urgent recommendations of a coroner's jury, because there are so many departments responsible that they still have not really settled among themselves what they are supposed to do. If that happens in one area I have no doubt it happens in every area. The more people you have responsible for the same thing, the less chance there is that anything is ever going to be done. I want to know what the government is going to do to formulate policies on pollution abatement in the region.

I would also like to read item 7, under this same heading:

7. The authority requests the province of Ontario to investigate any problems in pollution abatement posed by the general use of detergents; that is, to investigate detergents as they may interfere with sewage treatment processes, excessively enrich receiving waters, or indirectly create hazards to public health, and to take the appropriate action to solve problems which may be revealed.

I believe that the Ontario Research Council has been giving some study to this problem, I am not quite sure. But this has become a matter of major importance in the whole field of pollution abatement, and I would like to hear a statement from the government indicating that it is giving more than passing attention to the problem.

I would like to hear either now or at whatever time the hon. Ministers concerned may consider to be appropriate, not the fact that they have received this report—we have all received it and most of us have tried to understand it—but what they are doing about it, and what they are doing to develop co-ordination in this area of greatly divided responsibility.

I am also interested in the specific item regarding detergents.

There are a number of other recommendations in the conservation authority's report. I will not run through them; I will try to cover them by one further general question.

What is the government doing about the report as a whole?

Mr. Cowling: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Woodbine has mentioned the member for High Park on several occasions. I do not propose to answer for the government, but I would like to answer for the member for High Park.

As usual the hon. member for Woodbine is the authority. He has all the answers on all things and I do not profess to be that good.

Mr. MacDonald: Why do you not deal with the issue?

Mr. Cowling: I just have a few answers on a few things.

Mr. MacDonald: Why don't you?

Mr. Cowling: All right, I am going to give you a couple right now.

In the first place I am familiar with the report that you read from—

Mr. Bryden: I did not suggest you would not be.

Mr. Cowling:—and I was reading from the annual report, in part, of the chairman of the Metropolitan conservation authority. With reference to that report he said this, and I read it:

The report has already been approved by the authority and has been presented to the Metropolitan Toronto Planning Board and other area boards and councils.

They have it, they have presented it.

Mr. Bryden: Obviously, nothing ever sinks through to you.

Mr. Cowling: And I would like to comment on the other wisecrack you made about money, and what a niggardly attitude the government is taking on money.

Mr. Bryden: Those are your words, not mine.

Mr. Cowling: I would like you to listen to the words of the chairman of the Metropolitan conservation authority. This is what he says:

As you know, the 23 municipalities in our area make it possible for us to carry on our work. It is they who supply one half of the money needed for conservation.

I have often said that there is nothing sadder than a conservation authority with work to do and without proper funds to do it. Fortunately, the municipalities and our other partner, the province of Ontario, have continued to give us the support we need to do the job.

Nothing more to say, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, much has been said this afternoon about the overlapping of authority in this particular branch, or the fact that it has not been clearly differentiated. I would like to ask the hon. Minister if he would give his comments to the House about a situation that has built up over a number of years and is surely now ready for solution.

I refer to the fact, which I am sure will be of interest to the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs as well, that there are some areas in the province where conservation is served not only by a conservation authority but by a conservation commission, which was appointed earlier and under a separate Act, and may be administered by another department.

It is true that if we were to examine the terms of reference of these two bodies as they occur in pairs across the province in at least three specific places, we would find there is a difference in their responsibilities. But I submit that it is also true that the one authority, the conservation authority, in most areas of the province is well equipped to carry on this service and that in fact, where the two bodies do work, there is a tendency for them on some occasions to work at odds to the general good of conservation. There may be personality problems involved here. But it seems to me that every time the people concerned get the ear of the Minister about this, and get him to concentrate on the problem and almost reach a decision that would be of some value in the circumstance, the branch is removed from his authority and the people concerned have to begin again.

I would like the hon. Minister to give his comments on what he feels the comparative values of the authorities and the commissions are, and what he might suggest be done to clear up this difficulty in the immediate future.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Well, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the question from the hon. member for Brant, I might say that since this department has been transferred to our jurisdiction I have discussed the problem with Mr. Barnes. I have had one group in from the conservation authority discussing this particular matter. At the present time I would say that I have not talked to anyone from the commission; but it is our hope, and the hope of some of the people in our department, that we might, after the House rises, go up and discuss things with both these authorities in the hope that we might get them together some way into one large authority.

Mr. Nixon: I might say, Mr. Chairman, that the suggestion of the hon. Minister is a good one, because the men who take part in both the commission and the authority, at least in this one particular case, give a great service to the community. Therefore I feel that it would take someone with the authority of this government to sit down with them and convince them that, for the good of all, their amalgamation is essential.

I would also like to say that one of the most valuable assets this department has is the gentleman who is sitting at the advice table at the present time—Mr. Barnes—whose integrity and advice is valued by the men and women who take part in the responsibilities of the conservation authorities; certainly in any area where I have had anything to do with them. He has been a long-suffering civil servant in this regard, where his services really have not had the fullest opportunity to be used by the province simply because he has been passed from department to department. I happened, by chance, to be looking in his direction earlier in the week, Mr. Chairman, when the hon. Prime Minister announced that perhaps the discussion of the conservation branch would be once again fragmented—we would suppose for the last time in this House—and I felt that the look of resignation on his face under those circumstances showed that this was really more than the gentleman should have been asked to bear.

But we have been assured that the responsibility for conservation has found its final home and that surely, in this department at long last, the action which has been recommended—certainly from the Opposition side for many years, and by those who have had the responsibility across the province—will finally be taken.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, in the course of his introductory remarks, the hon. Minister, on page 21 of the mimeographed version, had the comment:

It is expected that the general contract for the Woodstock dam will be awarded and that work will start early this spring.

Am I correct in my assumption that the hon. Minister is referring there to what is known locally as the Gordon Pittock dam?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Yes.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Chairman, I have two comments I want to make. The first one I make, if I can do it without being personal, is that I think this is getting—what is the appropriate term?—a little ludicrous. We are naming new projects in the province of Ontario after people who are still alive—indeed in this instance, if the hon. member will forgive me for saying, even before he got into politics; and according to some in the community, because of his friends in the Conservative Party who wanted to build him up in politics. Furthermore, this kind of thing is going on at the same time as the press is drawing more and more attention to the fact that we sometimes even have objections to naming schools after the giants of the political life of Canada—like Sir John A. Macdonald and others.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, since I am dealing with this matter, we might as well get right back to your home territory where we have the Noden causeway. I understand that some of your friends up there—

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, this is a conservation matter.

Mr. Chairman: Order! I would like to inform the member that the people accept that name but it has not been named as yet.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, this is interesting. I have not been provided with any documentation as to whether or not the people accept the name for the causeway. The fact that you happen to be the elected member, I would suggest, sir, in all humility, is not necessary proof of the fact that they think this is a good idea.

On this one point—and again I trust I can do it without it being taken as a personal comment—I suggest that we are getting—I will borrow a phrase from the hon. leader of the Opposition who whispered sotto voce a few moments ago—a little petty when we are naming great projects like this after living politicians; and when we continue to ignore the giants of Canadian political life who have been dead for generations.

Mr. J. R. Knox (Lambton West): Call it the “Oliver-MacDonald” dam.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: MacDonald House.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I do not know if anything is ever going to be called “Knox.”

Mr. Knox: Oh yes, there is a church.

Mr. MacDonald: The other point, Mr. Chairman, I wanted to raise in connection with the Woodstock and/or Gordon Pittock dam is that once again, apparently, there has arisen in this case what appears from the outside to be a mishandling of the purchase of the land for a very commendable project.

I have had representations made to me by people who are involved in it. Perhaps I can present it to the House in a manner which will be accepted as relatively authoritative. The basic nature of the problem is outlined in the London Free Press on Friday, March 13, under dateline of Woodstock:

The Upper Thames Valley Conservation Authority was charged last night with evasiveness and unfair tactics in land negotiations for the Gordon Pittock dam and lakes. A group of property owners met in the Tollgate school north of Woodstock to protest the way negotiations for sale of the land to be expropriated for the dam is being handled.

The $4 million dam would create a lake about six miles long, stretching from just north of Woodstock to Innerkip. It would cover about 14,000 acres.

Construction of the dam is expected to start this year, but property owners said they were unable to get answers to their questions, even from the authority chairman, Gordon Pittock, MPP for Oxford.

Stanley Down said Mr. Pittock promised at an East Zorra township council meeting on March 4 that property owners would have two years to relocate after they were notified of expropriation. He said all property owners were told this winter that the authority wanted the land this summer.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, if I may just interject there, I have a copy of the notice which went out from the Upper Thames Valley Conservation Authority on January 27, 1964, and the second last paragraph states:

In due course, the authority will advise you as to whether it requires possession of your land, but in order that you may make adequate preparation we might now advise you that the prospective date for acquiring possession will be May 1, 1964.

In other words, three months afterwards.

And they are talking to a group of farmers, whose farms are going to be bought, who have to buy an alternative farm, who operate, as the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton) will know, on at least a 12-month cycle in farming—your seeding and your harvesting and what you are going to do with your land. Well, the story here states, and I understand it is correct, that they were told they would have up to two years notification for relocation. Then the notice finally comes out, and they have three months.

Let me continue with details which are produced in the London Free Press.

Mr. Down and other farmers said it was important to have government dates on which they would have to vacate their property so they could decide whether to plant crops. The owners decided to ask the federation of agriculture to help in getting letters from the UTRCA and in clarifying owners' rights in the expropriation proceedings. Protests against the tactics—

This is another important point—if I may interject and emphasize here—because this, as far as I have found out, is almost universal among the farmers involved.

Protests against the tactics of William George, authority land buyer, were registered by most of those at the meeting. Members claimed that he had misinformed many of them, was refusing to negotiate on land prices and was using unfair tactics to convince land owners to sell at UTRCA—

Indeed, I have been told in one instance—and I think it is time that the House was informed of it—that one person who could not get a deal closed for the sale of his land, expressed an interest in another farm that was available for sale. A deal was arranged very, very quickly when there was another real estate proposition looming on the horizon.

Gordon Harwood, an East Zorra farmer, said the authority was offering $10,500 for a 70-acre portion of his farm. He said he could not buy land to make up that loss to the authority for less than $500 an acre.

Jack Holmes, a farm owner, said he sold five acres of land for $1,100 an acre for gravel, and the authority's offer was only $200 an acre. He said the authority said it wanted half of a 50-acre parcel of land but would not permit him to sell the other half to a builder who had given him a good offer.

And if we move on to the Woodstock paper's report on the same meeting, just let me give you one or two quotes from it:

Stanley Down of Innerkip stated, "Many of the property owners are getting offers that are not reasonable and we cannot afford the cost of lawyers and appraisers." He said Mr. Pittock promised them at least two years notice, and then they "slap us with a 60-day notice," he stated prior to the meeting.

A homeowner whose home was built under the Veterans' Land Act, Jack Newman of Woodstock, said the VLA administrator said the authority was "crazy" when he told the VLA what the authority had offered for his property. He said the VLA was handling all negotiations for him and that the authority would have to negotiate with it.

There in brief, without going into any more detail, it seems to me is a sorry tale. The tragedy of the thing is that all of the people I have talked to involved are in principle strongly in support of this project—the dam and the lake that is going to be built. All they were asking for was fair treatment, a living-up to the promise of something like two years notice. Instead they were faced with something like two to three months notice and they have to get out sometime this year.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder if either the hon. Minister or conceivably the hon. member for Oxford could give us some explanation as to why these procedures have been followed this way, and specifically some explanation with regard to the short notice and to the allegations of the tactics of the man who was authorized to do the buying of the land on behalf of the authority.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. member's question, I understand it is the authority that purchased the land and if these things have happened, I would say it is unfortunate. Although we know very little about it, outside what we have heard here today, I would be glad to have Mr. Barnes check into this matter. If this is the case—I do not know if there is much we can do about it now. It is too bad to see people misinformed when it means a move like that.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I am very puzzled. If the government is involved to the extent that it is in grants for this kind of development, do you mean to say that all of this has gone on for the length of time it has, with publication in the paper and protest meetings and so on, and your department has not even become aware of the situation? Is this the case?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, we would not be aware of the original deals. What happens in the paper sometimes is not the actual facts. I have not heard anything about it since conservation came into my department, nothing whatever from anyone in that area.

Mr. G. W. Pittock (Oxford): Mr. Chairman, I would like to reply to a couple of the questions of the hon. member for York South, in connection with the dam. First I would like to say, I did not ask to have this dam named after me.

Mr. MacDonald: Did you refuse it?

Mr. Pittock: No, and I could also say that this naming of the dam took place at a meeting in March, 1962, long before I had ever given any consideration to becoming part of politics, and sometimes I wonder what the value of it is.

I do not think we can carry out conservation projects or any other projects of this kind without causing disturbance to people, which is very unfortunate. I think that many projects have been started within this province that have affected many, many people. I think too, we have to consider the overall value of the project.

In connection with the matter of the owners being promised two years notice, I was asked to attend a meeting of East Zorra township council in March 1962—the newspaper says 1963; it is one year out. At that council meeting, I was asked by an owner if I would estimate how long it would be before the land would be required. I answered the question by saying this. "I do not expect that you will be asked to give up your land in less than two years from now." That was from March, 1962, to March, 1964. We served a notice in January that we would expect to require the land for the contractors to commence work May 1, 1964. However, there was a delay in the call of tenders. As soon as we reached the point of February 28 without the approval to call tenders, we again advised them that we would not require their land until July 1, 1964, extending the two months from May 1 over to July 1 to allow the difference that we had been delayed in the tender call.

The tender call had been estimated to have been made January 1. The tender call is out now and I think the date on it is for the middle of May for the tender call to be complete. The evasive unfair tactics that are recorded in the paper—I would like to mention again, as I have to the newspapers and radio stations—arise from the fact that in a period of almost four years that this project has been talked about, I have had any number of people from that area visit me at my home and call me at the office. I have come out of the plant to go into the office to talk to these people on many, many occasions.

I forget the exact date now, but it was the Sunday before the date of that newspaper item when I had a call at my house at 4 o'clock Sunday afternoon from one of the owners, saying, "I have a problem I would like to talk to you about." I said, "Well, Mr. So-and-So, do you realize we are building a dam in Mitchell, we are building a $2 million project at Wildwood south of St. Mary's, we have a channel improvement in St. Mary's, we are building a new dam at Lake Victoria in Stratford, and we have a contract to remove the silt from Lake Victoria, all in addition to the Woodstock project. I do not think that you could expect me, as chairman of the Upper Thames River Conservation Authority, to be in touch with the details of all five of these projects and spend the last nine weeks in Toronto, five days a week, attending the Legislature."

He said, "No, I will have to agree with you." I said: "I would suggest you contact Mr. Hilts, the chairman of the Woodstock advisory board, and you will accomplish much more in discussing with him your problems than in discussing them with me." He said, "That is O.K." I also explained to him that I had promised to meet some people here in Toronto at 8 o'clock that night. This is 4 o'clock Sunday afternoon and I am due in Toronto at 8 o'clock and I have three visits to make on my way to Toronto.

This is why I am charged with being evasive, and this is why I do not give the people answers to their questions. One person in four years agreed with me that he would not expect me to have the answers to the individual problems and details.

In the matter of the purchase, we arranged with three appraisers to go in and individually appraise these properties. This has been the policy on the projects that we have carried out so far. The appraisers then met with our advisory board, which is made up of representatives of the municipalities of that local area, people who know the values of these individual properties. They sat down with the appraisers, went over everything item by item and arranged a figure to be offered for each of those properties. When we employed the appraisers, we asked them to provide us with free market value of each property and this was the basis. We then employed a negotiator to go out and make these offers.

As far as the dealings with the owners and city council were concerned, I drove to Woodstock last Tuesday night and met with the owners at a meeting organized by the federation of agriculture, I drove back again Thursday night to meet with city council, because pressure brought to bear there had suggested a resolution to withhold the work until we would guarantee a water level in the lake. I could only answer that question by saying that under normal conditions the water level would be maintained. Nobody in the meeting could tell me how much precipitation we are going to have next year or the year after, so it is pretty difficult to tell them how well we could maintain the water level of the lake.

One of the many things I feel which was misunderstood, or was not understood, was the fact that this was a part of our 110,000 acre/feet flood control project which includes six projects: Fanshawe, Glen Gowan, Wildwood, Thamesford and two at Woodstock. We have combined the two at Woodstock into one high level dam by relocating the CPR main line. The recommendation in the Woodstock area was 12,000 acre/feet of water for flood storage. The design of this dam will contain 13,385 acre/feet of water, and is a part of that 110,000 acre/feet total which is required.

I would say that if we are to carry out these projects we are certainly going to have to disturb many owners; in this particular area we are disturbing 46 owners. Many of the people, some of them named here this afternoon, came to see me over three years ago asking me questions about this project. Today they will tell you they knew nothing about it, these same people who were quoted by the hon. member for York South a few minutes ago, Mr. Chairman. They had no idea the project was going to go on. This is why it makes you wonder just how these projects can be handled and everybody be retained in a happy mood while they are being carried out.

This is a project which will have endless value to that area, in replenishment of underground supply, in flood prevention, in added dam stream flow in the summertime. It may be of information to this House to know that with our programme completed on the Thames we will increase the summer low-flow-period flow in all the streams of the Thames by ten times that of the present low-period flow. This, to us, is the greatest value of conservation—spreading water over the whole 1,325 square miles of our watershed, and making water available to all of the people of the watershed in the whole of the area. This is using the energy of the sun to return the water over the land regardless of the elevation, without cost of pumping. This is the important item.

As far as the Woodstock project is concerned, I can only say we are doing everything within our power to try to carry out that project with the least disturbance to those who are involved, and to co-operate in every manner possible. Last week at the meeting I was asked: "Do we all have to move by July 1?" My answer to this question: If the tender is completed and the contract is let we must make that area available for contractors on July 1.

However, if the contractor is going to be starting somewhere, miles from some of these people, they do not need to move. If they make arrangements with the contractor, they could continue to live there maybe for several months; in some cases, maybe for a year or more. How we can be more fair than we have been I would not know; I would like to have some answers on it.

Thank you.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the hon. member for his statement. I hope what he has said, and some of the other meetings going on out in the locality, will resolve some of the dissatisfaction and unhappiness which certainly has existed and apparently still does exist, if he is going out twice a week to cope with the protests in the local area.

However, I will leave that matter. There is a final question I would like to ask the hon. Minister. I was a little puzzled with the statistics on his projects under The Conservation Authorities Act and The Parks Assistance Act, circulated to us just a few days ago. On the final page I note the grants available to a list of projects across the province, totalling some $362,545; and, up until the end of April, 1963, only $82,000. What is the explanation for such a limited amount? Are the figures in the first column the grants which were available for the year under question, and yet only $82,000 was actually paid out; or is this a total grant to be paid out, under normal circumstances, over a number of years?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I understand that that is right. $82,287 has been paid out, and the grants available to April, 1963, were $362,545.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I suspected that was right. The hon. Minister has not answered my question. My question was: It strikes me, if these are urgent projects and this money is available in this year, that only $82,000—in other words, less than a quarter of it—was actually claimed. Is this the speed at which we are moving?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, grants under The Parks Assistance Act are made to municipalities which provide these municipal parks, and improvements to parks and so on. When these are approved for construction and acquisition of land and so on, the approval has to be done by the parks integration board, Mr. Chairman. Then, of course, the parks integration board and the department do not necessarily know when the project is going to be completed or when accounts will be sent in for payment of a grant. But we must set the funds aside so that when the accounts do come in for payment the funds are available for paying the provincial share.

I would think that you would probably find that a number of these projects may take several years to complete. The municipalities prefer to finance the whole of the expenditure themselves, and then they will send in one request for a payment of the subsidy in the year in which they complete the project.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, on the same vote, would the hon. Minister please answer me why there would be no conservation authority in the county of Essex? Is there some special reason for not having one in the area?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Well, Mr. Chairman, I might say that as far as we are concerned there is no special reason; but no one in the county of Essex has asked for an authority to be set up.

Vote 604 agreed to.

On vote 605:

Mr. Chairman: Has the Minister a statement to make?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, I would like to take this opportunity to say a few words about the operation of the Ontario Water Resources Commission.

The Act under which this commission operates gives it the authority to co-ordinate, organize and supervise the development of water supplies and to provide measures for the control of pollution in Ontario.

The policy of the commission concerning water supply is to co-operate with municipalities and industry to make water supplies available, to encourage the use of satisfactory local supplies, to assist in the development of pipelines where necessary and to protect water supplies against pollution.

In the present programme of the commission there are three main activities.

First, the supervision of all water supply and waste treatment facilities in municipalities and industries; the issuing of approval certificates for the construction of water and sewage works; and the control of pollution in Ontario's waterways.

Second, the financing, construction and operation of waterworks and sewage works for municipalities under agreement with the Ontario Water Resources Commission. Third, the provision of assistance to municipalities and individuals in providing adequate supplies of water, the assembling of basic hydrologic data concerning ground and surface waters, and the administration of the water permit programme, for the control of water use.

Under the first item which I have just mentioned, visits by the field staff of the commission were made to the 690 waterwork systems and 401 sewage treatment facilities in the province during 1963. Seventy-two municipal pollution surveys and 487 industrial plant surveys were carried out. During 1963, 988 certificates for sewage works valued at $81.5 million, and 698 certificates for waterworks valued at $33.5 million, were issued.

Since the commission was formed, a total of 7,620 sewage works and 5,653 waterworks certificates have been issued with a combined total value just slightly less than $904 million.

Special investigations included the preparation on water and sewage projects, sanitary land fills, cannery and milk plant waste disposal systems, stream and pollution surveys and a variety of miscellaneous studies. A total of 212 stream pollution surveys were carried out in 1963.

In the second activity of the programme, the commission has constructed, since its formation in 1957, 161 sewage projects and 122 water projects. It is of interest to note that sewage treatment facilities for over 178 municipalities have been built or are under way since 1957.

Under the third part of the commission's programme the commission carried out 18 hydrological surveys for municipalities, supervised ten test drilling and well construction projects, issued 403 well drillers' licences and maintained 56 observation wells. To date the commission has data on over 95,500 wells and in 1963 the drilling of 9,325 wells was supervised.

During the year a total of 2,706 water permits were issued, approving the taking of 823 million gallons per day.

In addition to the foregoing, the commission undertook on a full-time basis an extended programme of research in which a number of current studies were co-ordinated under the new division of research. Algae control studies were carried out on Lakes Erie and Ontario and will be continued. Methods of treating cannery wastes and the use of oxidation ditches for selected applications were studied. A pilot plant to study lagoon operation for the tertiary treatment of sewage plant effluence was started and is to be continued this year.

The division of laboratories continues to serve the needs of all other divisions in analyzing samples of sewage and water, together with similar service to municipalities and individuals.

In the year 1964-65 it is the intention of the commission to maintain its surveillance over municipal water and sewage projects, adding particular emphasis to the need for greater control over industrial pollution. More pollution surveys of streams, lakes and rivers will be undertaken in conjunction with increased investigations of ground and surface waters to provide the most up-to-date information for a wide programme of water management.

It is intended that the multiple purposes for which water is needed will be considered in the planning stages of the water management programme to ensure adequate supplies of water for all present and future needs, Mr. Chairman.

The retirement of Dr. A. E. Berry as general manager and chief engineer after 40 years of service with the Ontario government sparked a major reorganization in the Ontario Water Resources Commission top administrative setup. Dr. Berry was succeeded as general manager by Mr. D. S. Caverly, the former assistant general manager, and the director of the Ontario Water Resources Commission's division of plant operations.

Another major change was the definite division of responsibility between two assistant general managers: Mr. G. M. Galimbert, who relinquished his position as director of the division of sanitary engineering to devote his full time to his new duties as supervisor and co-ordinator of the work of the division of water resources; and the other, assistant general manager L. E. Owers, previously executive engineer, who took over the supervision and co-ordination of the activities of construction and plant operations, the real estate branch and other project development activities.

Early in the past year, the commission set up a management committee, which consists of three commissioners, Mr. A. M. Snider, the chairman, and Messrs. Root and Vance, to facilitate the commission business.

In order to increase the efficiency of its programme the commission is organized into divisions and branches. These divisions are, in addition to general administration; sanitary engineering, construction, plan operations, laboratories, water resources and research.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as the population of the province increases the problem of providing clean, adequate water in all phases of personal, commercial and industrial life becomes increasingly important. As one of the major challenges facing the commission is the provision of adequate supplies of suitable water, much work has been done in developing ground waters and supplies of surface water have been brought in from distant points when required.

An example is Essex county where for both the Harrow and Union systems 30 miles of mains were laid to bring water from the lake, and at Dunnville where over eight miles of supply mains have been built. Other projects of a similar nature have been undertaken.

Water supply problems are under continual examination by the commission throughout the province and conferences are being constantly held with municipalities and industry to assess their needs and assist them in solving problems in the most economical manner.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I might re-emphasize that as the population of the province grows the need for adequate supplies of good, clean water in all phases of personal, commercial and industrial life becomes increasingly important and water supplies and waste disposal are closely linked. They both must be dealt with in any programme designed to attain that healthy environment which is desired by all. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that in this regard the OWRC may be proud of its achievements to date. Tremendous progress has been made in its programmes to ensure the maintenance of public water supplies in a safe condition for domestic consumption and to exert greater control in the pollution of the province's waterways.

I would remind the hon. members that the next item, number 606, is entitled water management programme. It is the intention of the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management to speak on vote 606 and so I would ask hon. members, or suggest to them, that this may be confining in that I have the information here only as to the operation of the water resources commission and the next item will deal with the new programme which the hon. Minister wished to announce. If you wish to hear his statement now in connection with the water management programme as it has considerable relation to vote 605, I would be guided by your advice, sir.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, may I make a suggestion? Perhaps we could be flexible in the interpretation of the rules and deal with both the votes at one time.

Mr. Chairman: I would ask the Minister to make his statement at this time.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, the statement that I was trying to make before the orders of the day was in regard to projects—

Mr. Bryden: Have you missed your deadline?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Would the hon. member for Woodbine like to say something?

Mr. Bryden: I said it. I asked if you had missed your deadline?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: My statement was in regard to projects to deal with drought areas in the province of Ontario.

Our first major one is the construction of water supply reservoirs; second, the construction of farm ponds; third, emergency rural water supply for drought-stricken areas.

Specifically, the government is increasing the grant from 50 per cent to 75 per cent of the cost incurred in the construction of water reservoirs. This policy is available to conservation authorities, but as well, so that the benefits of water reservoirs can be felt outside the conservation authority, the government will enter into agreement to have these constructed through municipally responsible bodies. In turn, and if the project qualified, the province would seek federal participation under some of the cost sharing programmes now in effect, such as that under The Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act.

The present policy of the 50-50 cost sharing arrangement between the Ontario government and the conservation authority on projects other than water reservoirs will not be affected. Likewise flood control work, with federal and provincial participation along with conservation authorities will be affected in no way.

May I say that the government is extremely interested in bringing about a speed-up in the construction of water holding reservoirs. To do this we are prepared to allow a deferred payment arrangement for a three-year period. Under this arrangement the full cost of water reservoirs initiated within the period will be borne to the full extent by the province with the payment of the local share being delayed until January 1, 1967. By this arrangement it is hoped that a start can be made on projects which normally might have to be delayed because local financial resources have been committed at this point of time.

Following drought conditions in a large part of Ontario in 1963, the government urged farmers to construct farm ponds in order to maintain a more adequate supply of water for their needs. We wish now to proceed further and to offer to farmers in Ontario a subsidy of 50 per cent of the cost of construction up to a maximum of $500 for each pond.

In the past the government has been participating indirectly in farm pond construction through conservation authorities and some municipal governments. This policy now extends directly to each farmer located any place in Ontario. The programme will be carried out in a joint fashion in that the administration of this will be done by The Department of Agriculture through its local offices and engineering specialists, and the financing will be done through The Department of Energy and Resources Management. The policy will be back-dated to November 1, 1963, to assist those farmers who constructed ponds during the fall and winter months at the urging of the government to help alleviate water shortages in many farms of Ontario.

Following the widespread drought last autumn it has been apparent to the government that emergency water supplies for human and livestock needs should be organized when the need arises. To this end the government is prepared to enter into a programme of financial assistance to drought-stricken areas in rural Ontario.

This offer will be on a cost sharing basis with the counties in southern Ontario. In northern Ontario, if the need arises, we are prepared to work out similar arrangements with townships or groups of townships, as the case may be. Under this policy if 50 per cent of the sources of water supplies for human and livestock purposes in one or more townships is thought to be inadequate by the county council, the council may designate the area as a drought-stricken area. Following designation, 50 per cent of the cost of the emergency water supplies programme will be borne by the province. Likewise, 50 per cent of the cost of administration for the programme can be claimed on the province with the subsidy being paid directly to the designating authority.

Under the rural emergency water supply growth programme no grants will be made by the province for any work involving what may be considered capital expenditure.

The exact cost of these programmes at this time is not known since the initiation of the programme in each case depends to a large extent on local leadership. It is estimated that for the present fiscal year in the neighbourhood of $600,000 will be spent.

May I say again, as I have on previous occasions in the Legislature, that it is the policy of The Department of Energy and Resources Management, wherever possible, to co-ordinate its activities with other departments and agencies. An example of this is to be found whereby The Department of Agriculture will be carrying out the major responsibility of the farm pond policy throughout the province and the resources of the county council will be used to the fullest extent. On the other hand, the department will increase its staff to aid conservation authorities, particularly since, at the present time, several authorities in the province do not have provincial staff available to assist their programme.

Mr. D. A. Paterson (Essex South): Mr. Chairman, before going into my general comments on the water resources commission I would like to clarify a couple of points with the hon. Minister.

Is an irrigation pond considered a farm pond under your new proposal? Second, will the province pay half the cost of the water hauled in Essex and Kent counties by farmers who have been hauling water for a number of years?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I would say yes that we would include an irrigation pond as a farm pond. Your other question, sir, was?

Mr. Paterson: A great number of farmers in our area have been hauling water for years, they have their own tank trucks and so forth. Now do I have it correctly that the province will assume half the cost of the actual water?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: That is right, providing the municipality will declare an area a drought area and pay 50 per cent we will go along. After it is approved we will go along and pay 50 per cent.

Mr. Paterson: Thank you very much, sir.

In reading the 1963 Hansard, I was interested to read where the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin (Mr. Root) mentioned that the cost of treating and delivering water was 4.79 cents per 1,000 gallons. I believe that was correct.

Back in Hansard, page 559, in 1956, when Bill No. 98 was introduced to establish the

OWRC, Premier Frost stated the concept of this bill, and I quote:

The conception is water and sewage disposal at cost, the provision of water on a wholesale area basis, and the provision of sewage disposal plants which might serve more than one municipality.

And on page 560:

It would not be the purpose of the commission . . . to retail water.

Now the point that I would like to make in this regard is that according to these statements water is to be produced and sold at cost to the various municipal departments; namely, approximately the figure I quoted before.

I realize that municipal commissions, or water departments, do have a lot of overhead. They have a capital cost for the erection of the water plants and pipelines, and I would ask the hon. Minister if he is concerned with the great discrepancy in the retail rates charged for water in the various services connected with the OWRC.

I would like to point out a few specific cases. The first area is in the price of water sold by meter to farmers in my particular riding: In the community of Essex, the rate is $1 per 1,000 gallons; in Mersea township, which is a large volume user and is located miles closer to the union plant, the rate is 25 cents per 165 gallons, or almost $2 per 1,000. I am glad that these rates will be reduced by 50 per cent to our farmers, but the difference here is 100 per cent in these two communities on the cost to the farmer; and in comparison to the spreads in Hydro costs and rates the margin is tremendous.

I recall when the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin told the House the cost of treating and delivering this water was 4.79 cents per 1,000. I would carry this point just a little further. I would like to quote the rates charged to individual householders in three municipalities served by the union system: The rate in the town of Essex is $6 per month, or $72 to each and every household annually—this is probably one of the highest rates in Ontario; it is a flat rate, as there are no residential meters. In the town of Leamington, which also has a flat rate, the cost per household is $4.50 per month, or $54 annually. In the township of Mersea, the flat rate is $40 annually, although I believe most of their residences are metered.

This is quite a variance for water which is supposed to be supplied at cost; and certainly part of this difference must be attributed to the variance in methods and rates charged for fire protection, Hydro charges and shares of capital costs in the various municipalities.

I believe the actual wholesale cost to our Leamington commission is approximately 26 cents per 1,000 gallons. I am told that other municipalities charge one or two mills in their assessment for fire protection and maintenance charges on a per foot frontage, and thus keep their water rates lower in this manner. In fact, I am told one community in my riding charges eight mills in the assessment over and above its regular water rate charges.

But, with all these varying methods of charging or paying for water, it is most difficult to determine just what the actual cost of water is in a municipality. In our system of Ontario Hydro, you can check on the efficiencies and the cost but not so in this maze of various water systems. It would seem to me that the OWRC should have some control over the final price for water charged to these various individuals and communities.

There is one more aspect of this water shortage which should be pointed out, and I touch briefly on this fact: Certain municipalities served by the union water system meter the residences whereas others, such as my own, have a flat rate for water. Apparently the meter system is only economically sound in an OWRC-sponsored programme where the use by a municipality is far in excess of the contracted amount from the OWRC.

At this time, major municipalities involved in the union system have contracted for far more gallonage than they have actually been utilizing, so a flat rate is acceptable in order to cover the total cost of the contract.

However, I suggest that this is wasteful to our precious water supply; at the same time this plan, to me, is discriminatory where there are pensioners and other persons on low fixed incomes. In my own case, a family of six in a large house, with a great number of facilities including lawn services, we use them possibly in excess, but I pay the same flat rate for water as does the widow down the street with the minimum of sanitary and water facilities. This does not help to conserve our valuable water supply, and is discriminatory.

I know that metering is expensive; that the cost of these meters would not be welcomed by municipal authorities, including my own. But in order to save on water and bear the cost of the use equitably, in all areas serviced through the OWRC programmes, I personally feel that the metering of all residential water systems should be part and parcel of any programme.

Back in 1956, when the Act was passed establishing the OWRC, a statement was made and I quote:

The passage of this bill will relieve the municipalities from meeting the heavy capital costs of water and sewage and also provide them with the engineering and planning services which they would be unable to provide for themselves.

Further in Hansard, Mr. Frost states as follows:

The distribution of water and the elimination of pollution is essentially a municipal problem. Both are very clearly duties and responsibilities of municipal government.

Obviously the OWRC plan provides the basis of partnership which is so greatly needed in many localities and at the same time takes the burden of the immense strain of initial financing from the municipalities and will enable the payment by them, on a service basis, over long periods of years, of the cost involved. This is the principle of service and cost spread over many years.

I would suggest to this House that this Act is incomplete, that the OWRC is not fulfilling its complete obligation to the municipalities, and will only be fulfilling this complete obligation to the municipalities when it undertakes the initial financing of sewers on the same basis.

Sewer construction is an integral part of solving our pollution problem. We must have sewers first, before a disposal plant is of much use.

In last year's Hansard the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin made the following statement, and I quote:

I feel that one of the most important parts of our activities and our programme is getting information out to the public.

I agree with this wholeheartedly, but I do hope that the methods are functioning a little better than the information letters which are sent to the hon. members of this House. These letters usually contain this phrase:

This information will be included in a general news release later but you in the meantime may wish to inform interested media in the area.

On two occasions in the past two months I received these information letters some ten days after the projects have already been announced in the area press. However, I do believe I can proffer a constructive suggestion to the OWRC on how they can reach the public.

In my own riding recently we had a serious dispute over the location of a proposed sewage lagoon. This situation was solved, I hope, by the offer to drive area residents to the site of other lagoons in operation to see how they worked and that there were no serious defects or devaluations of properties.

My suggestion is that the display material of the OWRC that was constructed for the Canadian National Exhibition be taken out of storage from the basement of the main office and put on display all over the province at the various home shows, trade shows, agricultural shows and fairs. In this way the great mass of our population will see the problem and how it is solved, and will be conscious of the role that they too must play in a serious matter.

Back in 1956, Prime Minister Frost on page 557 made the following statement:

This [water] can be as important and as vital to our industrial and agricultural expansion as is power.

On page 561 of the 1956 Hansard, our leader, the hon. member for Grey South, asked the following question during the discussion of a proposed Act to establish the union plant and pipeline, and I quote:

Would this pipeline which the hon. Prime Minister has been talking about be primarily for the purpose of irrigation?

Hon. Mr. Frost replied:

It would be, in the Essex and Harrow districts. That was part of the study. It was partially for industrial and domestic, and partially for irrigation purposes.

I wish to quote the statement made in the House at page 1584 of last year by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin in his report to the House for the commission, and I quote:

A second factor that we should keep in mind, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that there are no more acres of land today than there were when the population was very sparse in Ontario. If we are going to feed a rapidly expanding population, it simply means that we must produce more foodstuffs from the same number of acres—actually from less acres—

I am still quoting from further on:

One of the surest ways of increasing the production of foodstuffs is to see to it that we have water available, when water is needed, for irrigation and for an expanding livestock population—

The hon. member continued explaining about procuring ground water supplies and a number of statistics and the great number of applications that had been received for irrigation, especially in the tobacco belt.

Going back briefly to 1956, the former member for my riding, who is and was a great supporter of the commission, also commented on irrigation; but he thought we should go slow in regard to irrigation, that this is more of an agricultural problem, because there is no use in growing fruits and vegetables in this irrigated land unless we can sell them and so on.

Apparently there have been some changes in the thinking here in Toronto in this regard since 1956. I noticed in the comments of the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management Monday afternoon that he did not touch on the problem of irrigation.

Mr. Chairman, I have brought you this brief background concerning the irrigation problem that is confronting southwestern Ontario in the hopes that renewed efforts will be made to supply this needed water supply.

Last summer the townships of Mersea and Gosfield South were forced to draw up an agreement to restrict the use of water for irrigation purposes to alternate days of the week during the key agricultural season, as the present capacity of the union plant was not able to supply this amount of treated water. Now this plant was only opened in November of 1960. I would suggest that there certainly was not sufficient regard paid to the aspect of irrigation when this system was originally planned, as was suggested by the statement of Mr. Frost originally, as I read today. Just recently it was announced that this union system is going to spend up to $10,000 for a long-range study for the development of this plant.

Now we in the area are certainly grateful for the assistance this plant has given us to date, but in these past few remarks I hope I have demonstrated a shortcoming in the original planning for this, the pilot project for the province of Ontario. Water for irrigation must become a major purpose of these water systems in agricultural sections of our province.

As was mentioned here this afternoon, farm ponds and dams and other conservation authority plans will all play an important role in solving this water shortage problem in so many parts of Ontario, but I would point out to this House that the county of Essex, with flat lands of very high agricultural importance with unlimited water on three sides have a serious water problem and that we have no great rivers or floods that would warrant the organization of a conservation authority. In fact, I know lesser officials of various departments have tended to discourage us going into a conservation authority.

These authorities receive large amounts of government monies to aid in the problem of solving this water shortage. Thus I would suggest that Essex county is unique in this water problem and should qualify for large expenditures on pipelines and plants by this government in lieu of these grants to conservation authorities. It is either that or request that the county form an authority in order that these grants be forthcoming.

Turning briefly to the annual report, I have a couple or three comments regarding the delays or problems in the engineering through the OWRC. On pages 22 and 33 there are very frank comments that there were faults and delays. On pages 42 and 47 there are faults and tough ground conditions, difficult terrain. I just wonder what is wrong with the engineering on these contracts, why soil test borings are not taken before the sites of these plants are chosen. Possibly the hon. Minister could give an answer.

Now I have a complete file here, and probably half the clippings are as this: "Council Raps Water Commission"; "Slow Start on Project Under Fire." There are dozens of articles here. I will just read a couple of quick paragraphs:

The red tape comes from the Ontario Municipal Board which has not approved the watermain project yet.

This was in regard to Grand Bend.

The only cost estimate for the project is $600,000 and is one year old.

This one is from Puce in Essex county:

Every day of delay means a loss of $250, said the reeve. The OWRC is ignorant. As long as its red tape is satisfied it is satisfied. I have worked feverishly for the past three months to get this project under way but have been blocked at every turn by the OWRC.

I, too, in my own riding, have had several projects under way, one of which, a water pipeline, was approved by the ratepayers on January 25, 1962. We finally arranged for a hearing on November 14, 1963, and final approval was given on February 15 to proceed to call tenders. This project, it was hoped, was going to be under the winter works project of this winter but it still is not under way. We would like some answers on the delays in these matters.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the comments of the hon. member, and his references to Hansard of a few years ago when this bill was presented to the House by the then leader of the government, and the comments which he made at that time.

It is quite correct to say that all through the operations of the Ontario Water Resources Commission it does supply water at cost. Our books can prove that. What the hon. member must remember is that each water producing plant is financed on its own. They are not all put into the same hat and then a general rate, or an average rate, is charged throughout the province. Of course, there are different costs in each of these different plants. That, therefore comes up with the different rate for water in each of the plants.

Actually, the government is subsidizing the production of water at the wholesale level, because of the fact we do operate the Ontario Water Resources Commission and many of the expenses are not charged to the operation of water plants, but are charged to the general expenditures of the government. You just have to look at these estimates to see what the figures are.

Ontario Water Resources Commission sells water on a wholesale basis to the municipalities. Then the municipalities distribute water at a retail price and the municipality, of course, has some operating cost in administration and distribution and so on. I would presume that every municipality attempts to charge a rate which will be sufficient to show perhaps a small profit. Water is being supplied in most cases to its own ratepayers, and if a profit does occur, then of course it goes to the benefit of the local ratepayers anyway. So it really does not matter at what price they sell water to the consumer, except with respect to the difference between an owner and a tenant of a residence, shall we say? The rate which was set in Essex and the rate which was set in Mersea township, I presume, were set bearing in mind the actual cost that these municipalities have in distributing water.

The hon. member made mention of a charge for fire protection. It is the usual practice in most municipalities that some charge is made for the fact that fire hydrants are installed on the town or city streets. A portion of the cost of supplying water to fire hydrants for fire protection is charged in the general rate. The funds so collected, if I may use that term, are credited to the operation of the waterworks system. In that way the user does get some reduction in the rate of water, because of the service which is provided to property by the fact that a fire protection system is available.

I would say that in most municipalities, or those I have had some contact with, the municipal council sets a rate per hydrant, which perhaps is an arbitrary rate, but nevertheless it is examined quite regularly. I think that councils, in establishing their budgets for the year and rates for different services, will always pay attention to the charge made for what is known as hydrant rentals.

Insofar as the suggestion that has been made by the hon. member regarding the metering of all water is concerned, I think we have to bear in mind that the local municipality has the decision and the judgment in deciding this. I think that the cost of installing a meter in a residence runs from about $50 to $75. Then there is the added cost of administration, in that an employee of the public utilities commission or the waterworks department of the city or town has to call occasionally and read the meter. There is no doubt that a certain amount of water is saved when water meters are used, as against a flat rate charge for water, but I suggest to you that the municipality, being the retailer of water, would be the one that would decide whether or not it would sell water on a metered basis or on a flat rate.

In connection with the financing of sewers, the commission does finance the main trunk sewers but does not finance the lateral sewers. It is felt that is a local improvement charge that should be financed by the municipality and charged to the local users.

In connection with your comment about the information letters which go out from the commission, I am very much surprised that those that are sent to you have arrived ten days late. The intention is that those should be available before the general information is made available to newspapers. I have no explanation for your particular comment in that connection.

In reply to your comment and suggestion with respect to information availability, and comments with respect to greater use of the displays which have been placed by the commission at the Canadian National Exhibition, I might say that these are sometimes made available to other exhibitions, larger ones. But this is a very expensive type of publicity and we have had to, shall I say, restrict ourselves in that regard. At one time it was thought that perhaps a travelling trailer might be made available, but that apparently has not been found a possible solution to this matter.

I do know of some other departments that perhaps do more of this publicity work than is done by the water resources commission, but we are not quite in the same field of activity in this commission as perhaps The Department of Lands and Forests. Our concern is dealing with municipal councils basically, and not with the individual ratepayer, the resident of a municipality. Our need for publicity in the public sector therefore is perhaps much less than other departments of government. They are concerned more with all of the residents of the province, while we are restricted to dealing with municipal councils.

You made some comments about the matter of irrigation and the emergency programme which has been set up and has been explained by the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management. We appreciate your comments in that regard.

In the case of the union system plant in the area which you represent, I might say that the size of the plant and its potential production is pretty well governed by the finances of the users. I have often said here I would like to drive a Cadillac car, but I have never had the price. This is one of these things we have to look at in the cold light of the economics. Where a few years ago there was no facility of this nature, or comparable facility available in this area, since 1960 this service has been made available on a basis that the users could afford to pay. That, I think, is the important thing. As time goes on and a greater portion of this plant is paid for and written off, then I would suggest that there will no doubt be room for expansion of the plant and the service that it can provide to the users in that area.

In connection with pre-engineering, I am assured—and I have discussed this not only with the general manager and the engineers in the commission, but also with the members of the commission—that every effort is made to do all of the pre-engineering, soil testing, and so on and so forth, which is necessary. But in a number of cases these soil tests are not always sufficient, and after a project gets under way it is necessary to amend the specifications of the contract. That is done under the very, very closest supervision of the engineering division and the general manager of the commission.

We realize that we have a responsibility that when we go to a municipality and say that we shall build a plant of a certain size and capacity for X dollars, that we must produce that for X dollars. Occasionally the best laid plans of mice and men—something happens to them—and it does happen that once in a while the plants do cost more than had been estimated. I think that hon. members will understand that this happens in many other fields of activity. But on the whole we stick very close to the estimates.

Insofar as the complaints regarding red tape in government administration are concerned, it has been my experience, and I have had more experience with this for the last year and a half that I have been in The Department of Municipal Affairs. I find that people will come to my office—municipal people in many cases or residents who are not members of a council—but they will come to my office with a great complaint about delays and red tape.

I will give you an example of what happened today. A man came to Toronto from the north country. He travelled, I would say, at least 600 miles to come to my office to complain about the delay in The Department of Municipal Affairs. I have known this gentleman for a considerable number of years so I took him into my office and immediately discussed his problem, then called on one of my able secretaries to get to the root of the trouble. I found that we had acted as expeditiously as we could, in February of this year, to deal with the application this man had placed before us; we had sent it to the Ontario Municipal Board, and there it was.

Why was it there that long? Unfortunately, the documents which had been sent were not in order; they were not in the form required by the law under which they were to be passed. So the municipal board had returned them to the representative of the municipality and had advised this gentleman as to where the documents were deficient. And, since that time, nothing has been heard.

Whether the gentleman who lives in the same community from which my friend came, 600 miles away, has filed these documents or has just forgotten to correct them, or has decided that the municipality should not go ahead with this particular by-law, is for him to decide and not for us. I quote you that explanation; and I could give you any number of instances of a similar nature.

I have had hon. members of the Legislature come to me with similar complaints and, upon investigation, we usually find that while there are some cases where we are at fault—and human nature being what it is I suppose we have to accept that—I think that a very honest effort is made to expedite all of these things, particularly at the level of the municipal administration and the Ontario Municipal Board, to see that they are handled as quickly as possible.

Of course, we must remember that it is bad or poor business to cut corners. I have found, any time we cut corners, that we always got into trouble, the municipalities got into trouble; and the same applies to the water resources commission. It has to be very careful in writing specifications for tender calls, specifications and agreements for contracts, and so on and so forth, agreements with the municipalities; it has to have a clear understanding as to what is meant by an agreement, so that in later years there are no difficulties.

I would suggest to the hon. member that these delays are inevitable, but I want to assure him and hon. members of the House, Mr. Chairman, that every effort is made at all times to handle these matters as quickly as we possibly can, bearing in mind the responsibility which the commission has to the ratepayers of the community and also to the municipal council involved.

I think, all in all, this commission has done a very good job; and though you may say it has been going since 1957 and could have done more, well, that is a matter of opinion. I suggest to you that it has done all it could possibly do under the circumstances, and many of its activities are really not completely covered in the annual report, for that matter—and certainly not covered in this book of estimates.

I refer particularly to the research organization. It has done a tremendous lot of work in the field we were discussing earlier this afternoon—this matter of the study of the use of detergents. That is a question which has been studied very extensively by our commission, and this work has been done in conjunction with other authorities interested and involved in the same question. Those are people in the United States, and in some of the countries of Europe, where some research work has been done in the use of these detergents.

The commission also, through the use of its various agencies and co-operating organizations, has been in touch with the detergent industry. The indications are that great progress has been made in this field of sorting out these various detergents. It is all right to say that we should only use the soft detergents—I think that is the term they apply to those which do not cause these mountains of foam after going through a sewage treatment plant. And it is quite possible by later on this year, or perhaps by next year, that in the United States there will be available for general use what is known as the soft detergent, and that the so-called hard detergents, if I as a layman may refer to them in that way, will no longer be on the market.

We think, in about a year, or a year and a half after that, the same situation will apply in Canada. That being the case, I think we can rightly say that our commission has worked quite consistently on this programme, with the Americans and other people interested in this, and with the industry, and that we have made considerable progress.

There are also a number of other studies under way in the research branch, dealing, for instance, with the great question of the algae on the Great Lakes. That is a programme which is worked on in co-operation with other departments of government, such as The Department of Lands and Forests, with the international joint commission, and with other agencies which are also interested in this work.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that these comments have answered the questions of the hon. member.

Mr. Paterson: I thank the hon. Minister very much for his detailed answers.

Regarding two further items, one about how careful the OWRC is in its contracts, I would just like to read this press report. This is in regard to the Puce work of the OWRC on this month:

"We assumed the project would be done under the winter works incentive programme, but now it looks as though it will be the summer works."

The reeve stated that he had first started to work to get the water for Woodslea in 1950, and there had been one stumbling block after another. The last straw, he said, occurred last week when the contractor, Sartori and Sons Company Ltd., had three bonds returned to the OWRC. They are dated March 14, and the commission wanted them dated March 31. This was a two-week delay.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is understandable. The agreement probably provides that the bond shall be dated a certain date. If the bond is not dated that date and something happened, perhaps that is another argument for having some question as to whether or not the bond is in order, because the bond is part of the agreement. I do not know whether you are a solicitor or not, but I think some of the lawyers in the House here might say that that would be a reasonable return.

Mr. Paterson: The whole basis of this delay is that during the two weeks that were lost in March, plus the month of April, this work could have been completed under the winter works programme.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I agree with you.

Mr. Paterson: The hon. Minister mentions that the construction for expanding these plants is governed by the finances of the users.

Earlier today I read about two townships having to ban the use of water for irrigation purposes on two alternate days. These persons using water are cash consumers. They pay by the thousands of gallons; they are metered. If these people could have the water, the finances would be increased and thus we would warrant an extension of the plant. It is apparent that these two things cannot be done simultaneously.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The problem there is that the person who was taking water only when he needed it really had no supply set aside for him. I think he has to sort of rise and fall with the availability of water. If the plant could only fill its primary responsibility of providing water to certain users for domestic use and so on, then it would, of necessity, have to restrict the use of water for irrigation purposes. Those are some of the problems which one has to consider when dealing with this matter of the sale of water.

Mr. Chairman: On vote 605.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, I wish in the few minutes remaining to test the reaction of these two hon. Ministers to the research and the plan of a well-known citizen of my community. This is in relation to the diversion of waters that now flow into the Arctic watershed and into the Great Lakes system. I want to acquaint all the hon. members of the House with the tremendous amount of work that has been done by Mr. T. W. Kierans of Sudbury and his brother over the past four years in evaluating the economic costs and the possibilities of this scheme. I also want to draw to the attention of the House the very exciting implications of it in its fruition.

I, for one, for a long time have been persuaded by Mr. Kierans in his arguments that at some time in the history of our province and our country this scheme will become a reality.

I believe with him that indeed some day it must. Of course many hon. members will know, and especially those from northern Ontario, that the Divine Providence was not so merciful in the location of the watershed, or the height of land to be more accurate, especially in the northwestern part of the province. As you know, Mr. Chairman, in your immediate area the height of land is not very far north of the north shore of Lake Superior. As it wends its way eastward it bends to the north and in the northeastern part of the province it is quite a distance from the shore of Lake Huron, which is found in this area. This means, of course, that a tremendous amount of water that might otherwise flow into the Great Lakes is lost in the wastes of the northern reaches of the province, and from an economic point of view is of absolutely no use at all as it tumbles down into James and Hudson bays.

Indeed, one could wish even in the north-east that the height of land were further north. One is not far into the constituency of the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs when one sees the sign, which I never thought was particularly gleeful or one to create much enthusiasm, but is there and says: "From this point on all waters flow into the Arctic watershed." I never thought that was something to cheer about particularly. I had wished that the waters it refers to would be quite a considerable distance north, if the waters wended and found their way into James Bay.

It is interesting to note in that regard that the diocese of Hearst, I think it is, is divided from the diocese of Sault Ste. Marie in the Roman Catholic Church on the geographic basis of the watershed. The bishop of Hearst is responsible for the salvation of all souls to be found in lands where the waters flow north, and the bishop of Sault Ste. Marie is responsible for those where the waters flow south into Lake Huron and Georgian Bay.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: May I suggest, if you will pardon me, the Catholic Church is not consistent in that regard, because the bishop of Timmins covers an area that is on both sides on the height of land.

Mr. Sopha: I do not know which one has the more difficult task. I suppose they have in mind that if they have one straggler they can catch the heretic who is wavering between the universal faith and the rest of us who walk with the left foot.

However, to get back to more serious matters. One must take note of course, that the diversion of water into the Great Lakes is no new principle. It has been done by the Ontario government in relation to the waters of the Ogoki River, which formerly flowed from their headwaters into the Albany and thence down into James Bay. About 7,000 cubic feet per second of the Ogoki has now been diverted so that it flows into Lake Nipigon, and thence through the Nipigon River into Lake Superior. But that to date is the only replenishment of the Great Lakes that has been either tried or has succeeded.

The hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management, early in his estimates, made note of the fact that he felt this was purely a federal problem. At least he was ready to slough off in a very brusque fashion, I thought, the responsibility for this problem onto the shoulders of the federal government. I am not sure that he is correct because, from a constitutional point of view certainly, the Great Lakes in some regards at least fall under the jurisdiction of this Parliament.

It is interesting to note in that regard that whereas on the southern shores of the Great Lakes there are seven or eight jurisdictions—I have not counted them, but there is Wisconsin, Michigan, Ohio, New York, Minnesota, Illinois and perhaps a few others—

An hon. member: Pennsylvania.

Mr. Sopha: Pennsylvania, indeed. There are all those various jurisdictions, but the northern shore of the Great Lakes proper is under the exclusive jurisdiction of one constituted authority and that is the province of Ontario. I pass over rather quickly the problems that have been posed for our country and our province by the pressure of the jurisdictions in the southern shore of the Great Lakes, notably that of Illinois to divert a substantial quantity of water for sewage purposes at Chicago. At Chicago, a good deal of water is taken from Lake Michigan and eventually finds its way down the Illinois chain, the Ohio and into the Mississippi, and so on into the Gulf of Mexico. There have been persistent and continual pressures, notably by Chicago but by other municipal jurisdictions in the United States, to draw off more water. To date these have been successfully resisted by importuning of the Canadian government to the government in Washington. The Senate of the United States has so far refused to give in to these pressures and allow Chicago and other places to draw off any more water.

However, we are met, whether from this source or from cyclical hydrological phenomena, with the fact that water levels in the Great Lakes have lowered to an extent that has become, to those who think about it, very alarming. This is a matter of conjecture. Mr. Kierans relates that studies by the United States army reveal that in the period 1905 to 1964, the mean level of the Great Lakes has been five feet lower than in the period 1860 to 1905. This, of course, has very widespread effects for shipping, navigation in the lakes, the supply of water, and particularly in regard to shipping and navigation, the use of harbours. I am told that in the harbour of Collingwood or Midland—I forget which but one of them; my friend says Collingwood—when the wind blows offshore, in recent years the harbour has become virtually unusable. A sufficient amount of water is blown out into the lake to lower the level beyond the feasible depth to permit the movement of shipping into that harbour.

Added to that of course, there were persistent periods of drought last year. The level of the Great Lakes has great implications for the use by the residents of our province, of waters that may be taken from it to relieve the agricultural problems which drought creates.

In that regard, I remember very well, two or three years ago, that my hon. friend from Grey South had on the order paper a resolution which advocated the building of a grid in southern Ontario to bring water to hard-pressed areas, particularly urban communities, from the Great Lakes. I do well recall that the leader of the government of that day, in addressing his remarks to that resolution, rather scoffed—and he was a man capable of great scoffing when his nature led him towards that intellectual pursuit—at the idea of bringing water in by artificial conduit to areas which needed it. He said: "All you need to do, really, is to look at this province and you see that its southern part is bordered on all sides by the Great Lakes. Accordingly, it is feasible for any communities which want to use it, since they are very close to the lakes in all parts of the province, to pipe water for their own purposes out of the Great Lakes and relieve any problems which may exist in that regard."

Well, last summer and fall it did not seem such a bad idea as many areas in the hinterland of the province, in its southern part, suffered greatly from the adverse effects which shortage of water brings. But this I relate back to the main theme of my argument—which is to draw attention to the adverse effects upon the lakes themselves by the withdrawal of large amounts of water, whether for urban communities or to relieve the problems of agriculture, and the implications of drawing off that water in the use of the Great Lakes for navigation. Certainly, if one tried to point to any one asset the province of Ontario has which supersedes all other assets, one which stands out like a monument, one would be hard put to find one greater than the Great Lakes, in their strategic location, around almost every area of our great province. From that, of course, can be seen the economic implications of their use in the taking of the resources we produce in this great province, as well as the provinces to the west of us, to the sea; and over the sea to foreign ports where we dispose of them.

Therefore, I now come to a point in my argument where I can say, without feeling the need to really convince anyone, Mr. Chairman, that the state of the Great Lakes is a matter of vital consequence to the future of our province. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, with that background, as I said, I should like to test the reaction of the government to this very grandiose plan developed by Mr. Kierans, a civil engineer by profession, which he has called the great replenishment and northern development canal.

In his study he selects an area which is the watershed of the Harricanaw River, which presently rises in central Quebec near Amos and finds its way northward into James Bay. The drainage area of that great river is an area of 64,000 square miles. Mr. Kierans has studied the feasibility of reversing the flow of that river and stopping the wastage of its waters by bringing the river through mechanical means—hydro-electric energy, to be specific—over the height of land at Amos, Quebec, and emptying it into Lake Timiskaming—which, after all, is just a widening of the Ottawa River—then down the Ottawa as far as the confluence of the Mattawa and the Ottawa, through the Mattawa River, up over another small height of land, down the French River and into Georgian Bay.

This violation of the laws of nature which Mr. Kierans envisages would mean that 75,000 cubic feet of water per second—let me repeat that formula—75,000 cubic feet of water per second would be emptied into Georgian Bay by way of replenishment instead of wasting itself in the Arctic watershed as it does now.

Of course the replenishment of the Great Lakes is only one aspect of this daring plan. It is perhaps the most important one, because Mr. Kierans states it as being axiomatic; and I think it must be accepted by all that whether or not the means are idealistic the axiom remains valid that we cannot continue to draw off water from the Great Lakes in the fashion we are doing. We must do something to replenish them. That is the most important side. The other side, of course, is the navigation and shipping aspect of this plan. By this means, he would make of the Ottawa River, a navigational canal—

Mr. M. Hamilton (Renfrew North): A proposed alternative to Highway 17.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, in place of Highway 17. And that brings a look of optimism to the face of my friend, the hon. member for Renfrew North. Also, he points out the results which would accrue to such communities as Montreal and, for that matter, any harbour which is used for shipping on the Great Lakes themselves, by reason of the fact that the flow past a given point would be increased to such an extent that the river or harbour just would not freeze in the winter.

He points out that last year the harbour of Montreal had 107 days ice-free, which is not very long. It is less than a four-month navigation season—and this, of course, could be greatly increased, as it could be increased for other harbours such as, I suppose, Toronto.

Then, of course, he does not overlook the results and the benefits which would accrue to Hydro with the increased amount of water flowing over Niagara Falls, if my understanding is correct—and if it is not correct, my friend, the hon. member for Niagara Falls, who always demonstrates a very searching and retentive memory for anything which affects his community, will correct me. Is that the way that sentence should end?

An hon. member: Yes.

Mr. Sopha: He will correct me.

I say that I think they have drawn off just about all the water from the falls that aesthetics and tourism will permit. There just is no more, and by increasing the flow of water into the Great Lakes and the upper lakes, Lake Huron, it must follow that more water must find its way down to Niagara Falls and consequently Ontario Hydro might draw off more for the generation of hydro-electric power. In that connection, Mr. Kierans points out that Ontario Hydro increased its expenditure to $35 million in one year for the purchase of coal for the generation of electric energy in the southern part of the province. A far more expensive proposition, I must say, as all hon. members know, is the creation of electric power by steam generation than by falling water.

In that connection I look back fondly to debates we used to have in this House with the hon. member for Riverdale (Mr. Macaulay) who, alas, as I look at his empty seat, brings a pang of remorse to my heart that he is not here any longer these days. We used to ask him, as we did every year, whether he had discovered in Ontario any more waters that flowed downhill with sufficient force to generate hydro-electric energy because it was apparent on the face of it that there was always a disagreement between the man from Lindsay and the chairman of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario. This was always a disagreement about whether all of the hydro-electric resources in the province had been tapped or not. The man from Lindsay used to say they had been, there are no more.

I could show you chapter and verse where he said that we have developed every water resource. The chairman of the hydro-electric-power commission, not this one, the man from Massey-Ferguson that preceded him, he used to say, that there is at least one-third more. I think they generate something like two billion kilowatts an hour and the chairman used to aver that in the province there was always a further two million, or a third of that amount, could be found. But the hon. member for Riverdale could never seem to find where they were.

We have in many parts of the province—of course it is well known to all and hardly needs to be pointed out—that in many parts of the province these days we have turned to the generation of electricity by steam generation, a very expensive proposition.

So one can see, Mr. Chairman, that the benefits of Mr. Kierans' scheme are multiple, glamorous, daring—correction, challenging. All that really is needed to evaluate the economic feasibility of them is money, "lucre". Coin of the realm is all that is required to really assess this important project and its part in the future history of our province with our nation.

Now I do not by any means, and I hasten to add categorically, very categorically, I do not come here to beg for any money for Mr. Kierans. He does not ask me to do that and I would be remiss in my responsibilities if I were even to imply that such was my intention, but I do come here to adjure the two hon. Ministers, and perhaps we are fortunate we have two answering for water.

Very strange! We only need one to answer for whiskey, but we need two for water. Water is a much less volatile element in our society than is the other stuff I mentioned.

It may well be said of Mackenzie King that one of his epitaphs will be that it was he who started putting the water in the whiskey. It may be that the level of the waters in the province are some reflection of that diversion of water.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Are you blaming Mackenzie King for the low levels of the lakes?

Mr. Sopha: It may be!

However, I would not dare to even hazard a guess as to how much this project would cost in its ultimate fulfillment. Certainly I would judge that it is greater than the building of either the Suez or the Panama canals. It would cost more in terms of money; but after all, what is money? What is money but the purchasing power created by the great wealth in this country and the reflection of the savings that our citizens make? But I am not here to talk about the ultimate cost. That will be perhaps for other people, for a future generation.

What I am here to do, within the limitations of the presentation that I make, is to implore the two hon. Ministers, or whichever one in whose lap it falls, to make some move toward a preliminary study. I think it deserves that. I think the year 1964 deserves that, a preliminary plan. I think the results for future generations in this country are so great that Mr. Kierans' plan ought not to be dismissed out of hand as being the idealistic maunderings of an idle mind.

In point of fact, Mr. Kierans carries on a highly successful business at Sudbury. He is a good businessman. He is a well respected man in the community. He is not looked upon in any way in the light of being an Egyptian fakir or being an idealistic ne'er-do-well.

He is far from that. He is a very substantial man and a very successful businessman.

These researches Mr. Kierans has made into this problem of replenishment of the Great Lakes are done in his leisure time and at his personal expense and he has, of course, carried his message not only to the doors of government but to professional associations and indeed, to the United States government itself and to many departments of the American administration. And nowhere, really, has Mr. Kierans been dismissed as being the purveyor, the carrier, of idealistic balderdash.

I would think that at this stage in our history, seeing as we do, as we must, the stark reality of the implications for our province in falling levels in the Great Lakes, that the Treasury board, at the insistence of one of these hon. Ministers, would set aside a certain sum in order to carry on some form of preliminary survey of the feasibility and the cost of this project.

I am not saying at all that these monies need be given to Mr. Kierans, I am not saying that he be put in charge of the project.

I have not discussed that with him at all. I am not here as the steward of Mr. Kierans to advocate any such thing.

Whoever was put in charge of such a survey—that is all I am asking for, a survey—would, of course, have the advantage of the many months of work that Mr. Kierans has made in regard to the research into this very daring project.

To leave off, Mr. Chairman, where I began, I pointed out that now the geography of this province is such that a great quantity, an unimaginable quantity—I could not begin to compare it with anything or to assess the precise amount of the quantity of water, precious water. After all, it is water that gives human tissue its vigour, its vitality and its viability; it is water that does that.

Water is the base of all substance in this planet and that water is wasting itself into the Arctic watershed. There will be no benefit at this stage of our history. Perhaps some day the Hudson Bay and the James Bay area—who knows, in the nuclear age, who dares to close the door, the door of his mind on any scientific advance?—perhaps some day it will be a garden of nature growing bananas and pineapples and something else. You cannot, in the nuclear age, dismiss the possibility of it.

Mr. G. H. Peck (Scarborough Centre): How about Moosonee bananas?

Mr. Sopha: I will adopt that. Perhaps some day Moosonee, in the nuclear age, with artificial means of heating, Moosonee will be the banana capital of Canada.

Mr. Peck: How about applesauce?

Mr. Sopha: But that day is far in the future and until that day arrives when inhabitants, fellow citizens of future generations and our descendants, need that water that now wastes itself into the Hudson Bay watershed, then I say we must, out of responsibility to our people in this province, to people in the rest of the country and out of the spirit of good neighbourliness with our cousins to the south; we must begin to look into the problem of the diversion of some of those waters, as we have done in the past with the Ogoki, and in that way to replenish the Great Lakes which is our heritage as one of the greatest natural resources that was ever given by Divine Providence to mankind.

Thank you, sir, I always end right on time.

It being 6.00 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

ESTIMATES, THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY AND RESOURCES MANAGEMENT (continued)

On vote 605:

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman, when the House adjourned we had a very lucid and cogent presentation by the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha), and I believe this is about the sixth time members on this side of the House have presented that project of the replenishment of the Great Lakes by diverting the waters which flow into James Bay and Hudson Bay to the Great Lakes. This should interest the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner), because of his background, the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett), and the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall). I do not see the acting chairman of the ONR (Mr. A. Johnston) here, but I see one of the members of the commission (Mr. Brunelle), the vice-chairman of Ontario Hydro (Mr. Boyer), who would be involved.

I do not know how many times we have to present something in the House to at least put it on the rails. As the hon. members know, the Minister of Mines and Technical Survey in the former federal government, the Diefenbaker government, the hon. Paul Martineau, was a supporter of that plan. I hope, from all the speeches which have been heard from this side of the House, that some of those words will drop on receptive ears and that at least we will get to a meeting of minds between the federal government of Canada and the federal government of the United States, the departments of Quebec and the departments of the states which border the Great Lakes.

As the hon. member for Sudbury has pointed out, it is a very fantastic scheme; but things which were fantastic years ago are now realities. I understand too that the engineering factors have been solved in central California, in and around Niagara Falls, in Russia, on the Volga, where they replenished the Caspian Sea by the rivers there and I understand, too, there are other rivers which, this year, will be diverted so that they feed that same sea. Surely, in this country, we should be able to do the same.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, for two years now the Ontario Water Resources Commission has required farmers using irrigation to provide themselves with a licence if they are going to use any source of water other than their own wells. During the recent drought, in the past irrigation season, it got to the point where the water resources commission almost had to decide how the licences were going to be used to control irrigation. I had the impression that it was just by the great gift of two or three rainstorms at the last possible moment that the commission was spared the responsibility of having to move into certain areas and exert almost a policing of the irrigation.

I wonder if we could have a statement from the responsible Minister as to just what powers the commission has under the licensing regulation and how, in a drought emergency, these would be applied?

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Chairman, before proceeding to answer that particular question I think I should be given a few moments to pass some remarks on the suggestion made, in very able manner, by the hon. member for Sudbury this afternoon.

Dealing with the "grand canal" proposal or the "Harricanaw diversion" or the "Kierans plan", I suppose there are some people who might say that Mr. Kierans' plan for a diversion of the waters of the Harricanaw River is premature. Others might say that it is perhaps a little fantastic. I am not one of those who would agree with that. I think that the plan has some considerable merit but I think that it is premature.

There are many problems in undertaking a programme of this kind and any authority would examine alternatives before proceeding to get into such a highly involved proposal as is suggested by this Harricanaaw diversion or Grand Canal proposal. This scheme, as the hon. member for Sudbury has said, is a scheme for diverting water now flowing into James Bay, to have it flow into the Great Lakes.

At the present time and for some years past, the waters of the Ogoki River in north-western Ontario have been diverted to flow south instead of into the Albany River and eventually to James Bay. This was a programme undertaken by funds provided by the province of Ontario, the hydro-electric power commission, and the federal government. The water is controlled at a certain control point and it is utilized to best advantage for power and for eventual flow of water into the Great Lakes area. But there is a limit to the amount of diversion that can take place.

I would think that because of the fact that waters in this province could be used to good advantage if necessary, it would be our responsibility to attack the problem from within our own provincial boundaries instead of becoming involved in a programme such as is suggested by Mr. Kierans. It begins to deal with water which is not within our jurisdiction but is within the jurisdiction of the province of Quebec.

I might say that I have met Mr. Kierans. I have listened with a great deal of interest to his proposal. I have seen the map which he has prepared explaining his idea. I suppose some of us in this House who are younger than others may see his proposal gain considerable merit and approval in the years ahead. But at the present time, I doubt very much because of the implications of several authorities that would have to be involved in this, whether it would be possible to undertake a particular study that would be of any value.

We must remember that the present low level of the water in the Great Lakes might be described as being cyclical. It is only a comparatively few years ago that a committee of this Legislature was named to study the problem, not of low water in the Great Lakes, but of high water. I think that the level of water in the Great Lakes is affected more by nature than by us. I think we should bear in mind that perhaps the low water which exists this year and existed last year and in the last several years, and is rumoured will continue for perhaps another year or so, may be reversed so that the whole picture may change again. It may not be very long before we are worried again about high water levels.

I think the programme which we have in co-operation with municipalities, conservation authorities and conservation commissions, and which has been explained this afternoon by the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management to assist in this emergency, will probably be of great benefit. I think that if we can prepare and construct projects and programmes, because of this emergency, which will hold the water which nature sends us, we may find that in the next year or two this situation will be greatly alleviated.

However, we are not leaving the matter at that. We are quietly, and I say efficiently, progressing to the point where we are going to continue to make progress in the establishment of water programmes in the province of Ontario and particularly in the area of the southwestern part of the province.

Referring back to Mr. Kierans' scheme, it would be difficult and comparatively expensive at the present time to undertake even rough estimates of the cost of this programme as suggested by him. There have been some broad assumptions taken by people involved and having the knowledge of these matters, and they have concluded that the power benefit, along with the benefit of the sale of water, or of additional water to the Great Lakes municipalities, would probably not be as economic as one would suppose.

The net power benefit, because this engineering scheme as proposed by Mr. Kierans is that electricity or hydro power would be used to operate pumps which in turn will operate generators, but the net power which will be produced will be negligible as far as engineers who have looked into this matter are concerned. But I say again, it is only in a very rough way that they are able to figure out.

So that I suppose if the plan did go into operation it could produce more power at Niagara and the St. Lawrence, but then again this could be offset by certain other high costs that in the long run the programme would not be as economically feasible as one would suppose by just a cursory examination. You see one of the problems that I think has been discussed, or I know has been discussed over quite a number of years, is the fact that water is diverted from Lake Michigan at Chicago. There is a limit, because of the international agreement, to the amount of water which can be taken by Chicago. When I was Minister of Lands and Forests I went to Chicago. I met with some of the people involved in the water management of that great city and I suggested to them that the proper place to deal with this matter was through the International Joint Commission and the federal government and that if they were of the opinion that they needed water, I suggested to them, in a very pleasant manner I hope, that they had to be prepared to pay for it.

Now I suggest to you that there is water that can be diverted in northwestern Ontario and that we already have a diversion there at the present time.

You see all these schemes may look very good on paper and they no doubt may in the years ahead have considerable merit. Here is another one in which you may be interested.

This is the Parsons Company plan or project, sir, which is known as NAWAPA. That is a good Indian name and it means North American Water and Power Alliance. Its purpose is to divert water all the way from the Yukon down through the western provinces and the western states. The people who propose this are a very reputable firm of engineers in California, I think they are in Los Angeles. They have a staff of 2,500 scientists, engineers, draftsmen, technicians and supporting staff, together with 5,000 field construction personnel, a total of 7,500 people.

In reading the report that they have prepared on this, again in a very broad general way, they have said that this construction would take 30 years, would cost $100 billion and would employ 100,000 people. Now it may be that this type of a programme or project which would serve a much larger area of North America, may be more possible.

I mention these things because it indicates that there are some people who are paying some attention to these matters in the same way as we are through the commission, through the government of this province and our association with bodies that are involved in these matters. Of course we always consider our American friends in the eight or nine American states bordering the Great Lakes.

An hon. member: The score is Detroit 1-0.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Detroit 1-0? Well that is very interesting. It is all right, the Leafs have to have something to fight for.

Coming back to the $100 million and the question asked by the hon. member for Brant, referring to the issuance of permits. Reading The Water Resources Commission Act I think I should perhaps mention that the commission has discretion in this matter and in an amendment in 1960-61 the Act was amended to provide that the commission may, in its discretion, issue, refuse to issue, or cancel a permit, may impose such terms and conditions in issuing a permit as it deems proper, and may alter the terms and conditions of a permit after it is issued.

Now the taking of water is regulated, but the Act provides that the taking of water for use for domestic or farm purposes or for the watering of livestock is permitted, providing that no person shall take more than 10,000 gallons of water a day. So the water that is controlled is water which is used for irrigation of crops.

It does happen and it has happened, fortunately not very often, but it has happened when the commission had issued a permit for a certain amount of water, then it has been found that because of certain unnatural conditions that it is necessary to amend the permit by perhaps reducing the amount of water that can be taken or putting in some restrictions.

Where a few years ago, I would say three years ago, there were only a few hundred permits issued, last year there were over 2,600 or 2,700 permits issued, which indicates the great amount—yes, 2,706 permits were issued in 1963 and only 152 had been issued in the year 1962.

Mr. Nixon: That does not indicate an increase in irrigation.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No, it indicates an increase in the control exercised by the commission since the amendment of 1961.

It is hoped that the commission will be able to continue to issue these permits and in some areas may have to warn the permittees that there may be some reduction in the amount of permit as conditions change from time to time.

Every effort is made to be of as much service as we possibly can to the people involved so that no one will be adversely affected, or too seriously affected, by lack of water for irrigation purposes. But it is, I think, necessary that purposes other than irrigation should have top consideration.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. Minister tell us how many members of the staff of the water resources commission would be available to go out and inspect the requirements of these permits?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: We will have that for the hon. member in one second.

At least 15 men are working on this and at times when there are more demands we can put as many as over 35 on the job.

Mr. Nixon: Then the purpose of the issuance of the permits is to be sure that the water available is equitably shared among those requiring it.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is correct.

Mr. Nixon: The hon. Minister, through his inspectors in the water resources commission, would be prepared to move right into the farm and tell them to stop pumping.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is right. Over the years we have collected a considerable amount of data in the field of stream flows and matters relating to that and also the flows in wells. We have our test wells in many localities which give us the measurement of the water tables.

Mr. Nixon: Certainly the inspectors have to have the wisdom of Solomon in many instances where a stream is providing for livestock and it is also providing for irrigation. One man says he is going to use all this water for irrigation, and the livestock man says "No, you are not". Then somebody has to be on the scene, and in moments of real emergency he almost has to come with a couple of shotguns or an armed guard. It is a very serious matter.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well we hope that nobody will chase them with the—

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, have any conversations been held between the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec in regard to the replenishment scheme of Mr. Kierans?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Not to my knowledge.

Mr. Troy: Then has the hon. Minister got anywhere in regard to the question, at least the problem, I posed this afternoon about the unorganized townships and the possibility of conservation authorities being set up. I know that when the hon. Minister was Minister of Lands and Forests he was concerned with that. I do not know whether to ask the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs or the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, in my experience in The Department of Lands and Forests, I think that the very matter which you discussed this afternoon with relation to the conservation authorities in unorganized territories was dealt with by correspondence I had with you and with the municipalities in the Nipissing district.

Mr. Troy: Yes, I know, but it did not—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: It did not give you any money.

Mr. Troy: The point is, sir, that the province of Ontario has gotten a great amount of wealth from the forests that were cut down in the areas of northern Ontario. It is felt that there should be some responsibility by the government to assist the organized municipalities that should have conservation authorities set up, but because there is always the argument: What about these 90 unorganized townships in my own area to which the government itself does not contribute anything to the project?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is not quite correct, Mr. Chairman. The government and The Department of Public Works and The Department of Lands and Forests have constructed hundreds of water conservation dams and water control dams throughout this province.

Mr. Troy: Maybe they have—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Yes, there is no doubt of that. If the hon. member would like to have the information—

Mr. Troy: There are only two that affect us—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The hon. member cannot expect to have control of nature in all its various aspects. If the good Lord, in his mercy, sends a lot of water down at one time, we just have to live with it.

You cannot control all of these things and have controlled dams that are going to control every little creek that there is in northern Ontario. I realize that in some areas they have problems, but you cannot expect to control the areas around Lake Nipissing any more than is being done, or much more than is being done at the present time.

You have what, some two or three streams that provide some difficulty?

Mr. Troy: Okay, leave it!

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, I listened with interest to the hon. Minister's comments on the Kierans diversion project, but there seemed to me one element of illogic in his argument. On one hand, he said this is likely coming. Then in fact, he turned around—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No, I said you never can tell because—

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Minister never can tell! He turned around and saw some of those around him who had dark hair, they were not all grey heads, so he said in our time it may well come. This was the little enactment that took place in front of us.

If it is going to come, it seems to me that there is one elementary move that might be considered now. We have had experts suggest to us that within ten years it may well be that Ontario's greatest export to the United States might be water. The hon. Minister himself, and I think quite rightly, when he went to talk with people of the water management committee in Chicago rather quietly suggested to them that if they needed more water, they would have to pay for it. And he is right.

If there is a serious possibility that we are going to have water as a major export from the province of Ontario, surely what we need now is to sit down with all of the various jurisdictions that are involved and at least start some planning.

The hon. Minister is gambling. He says water levels have gone in cycles. Ten or 15 years ago we had high water. He is hoping, he is gambling that ten years from now we will be back to high water. Ten years from now we may be five feet lower than we are at the present time and we will be faced with a crisis and if at that point we decide we will have to move, he will then be faced with all of the time-consuming, delaying negotiations with the roughly ten jurisdictions that will be involved.

On the assumption that it is a real possibility, a considerable possibility, that this is going to come in our lifetime, it seems to me that it is only elementary common sense that some initiative be taken and I suggest Ontario is the logical jurisdiction to do it, in conjunction with the joint international committee if you wish and with the others, to sit down and discuss it and get some idea of the cost. At least get some thinking going among our American friends who are interested in getting this, as to what the cost will be so that they will be conditioned to it. I leave that thought with the hon. Minister.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I think it was yesterday or the day before that the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management read certain correspondence that has taken place with the federal people on this subject of the lake levels and so on. I suggest to you that this is a problem or programme which he will be following with the federal people and from that you will see these other things develop.

I was very much disappointed after having gone to Chicago, as a matter of fact I attended a meeting in Detroit also sometime before that at which the Governor of Michigan was present. This was at a time when the Chicago diversion deal was very much in the air in the United States. I thought that the Chicago people might decide that they would like to talk to us and that they had some money that they wanted to put into the deal, but I have not had a word from them since. Maybe they did not like my idea, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MacDonald: I repeat my suggestion, either to the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs or the hon. Minister of Energy, that it seems to me that it would not be out of place either on your own, or in conjunction with Ottawa, to call together all of the necessary jurisdictions at least for a preliminary discussion on it.

There is a related question for which I wanted to see if I could get some clarification.

For some years now both the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party in the Opposition have been putting forward the proposition of a grid to supply the water needs of southern Ontario, and I think it is not inaccurate to say that the reaction of the government has been to dismiss this as impractical.

The standing committee on government commissions had one very interesting morning and noon out at the water resources commission on Highway 401; we had an opportunity to throw questions at the chairman and other members on the commission. A number of us asked a question with regard to this grid.

Actually, Mr. Snider was not too explicit but I got the impression from his reply that the greater the co-ordination of all bodies involved in the control and conservation of water, the greater the co-ordination now possible in the water management programme—which has been announced by the government and which comes into the jurisdiction of the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management, is going to open up the prospects of a more serious consideration of this. Perhaps I am wrong, perhaps I am interpreting his reply wrongly, but I want to ask the government and the hon. Minister whether or not it is still the feeling of the government that this is an impractical proposition?

My own brief comment would be this: I would concede that there may well be, at the moment, no need for a complete grid to cover the whole of southern Ontario. Obviously, there is no need for building pipelines if you do not happen to have an urgent need for water in any particular area. But it seems to me that there is need for the planning of a grid, and for the building of it, so as to anticipate future needs.

If you are laying the pipe from A to B and the amount of water needed, for example—and I am only picking figures out of thin air at the moment—stipulates a 10-inch pipe, but there is a likelihood that five or ten years from now other communities along this area are going to be requiring water, then this pipe should not be a 10-inch pipe, it should be a 15- or 20-inch pipe, or whatever is needed. In other words, do your planning now and its implementation will be done in the fullness of time, as circumstances demand.

Am I right in concluding that this is a practical proposition—planning, with the implementation as the requirements dictate?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, I think I can allay the fears of the hon. member, because the water resources commission has done a considerable amount of work in these very fields. I have here a report of a number of pipelines where preliminary studies have been made. If you would like to have that information I will be glad to give it to you. It describes some of the problems inherent in this type of project.

This work—the preliminary studies I refer to—was done in 1962, some of it perhaps prior to that time. They made preliminary investigations as to the cost of pipelines required to pipe water from the Great Lakes to areas in Ontario which appear to require water from other than local sources.

The line from Lake Huron to London—the estimated cost is $16.5 million; an alternative line from Lake Erie to Port Stanley, St. Thomas and London, is a little over $20 million. Lake Erie to Grand Valley—that is the Lake Erie, Simcoe, Waterford, Brantford, Kitchener, Paris, Preston, Galt, Guelph, Waterloo, Hespeler area—$30 million. Lake Huron to Grand Valley—Clinton, Seaforth, Dublin, Mitchell, Stratford, New Hamburg, Baden, Waterloo, Kitchener, Ayr, Galt, Guelph, Brantford—over $38 million. Port Dover, Jarvis, Hagersville, Cayuga, Caledonia—approximately $2.5 million. Cedar Springs—that is Lake Erie, Chatham, Blenheim, Ridgetown—over $4.5 million.

These studies were initial studies only, with limited feasibility studies. The cost of a complete study, for instance, of constructing a line from Lake Huron to London, is in the neighbourhood of $100,000. It will be easily seen that it is not possible for us to undertake a complete study of all of these lines, because the economics of it, the feasibility, have to be taken into consideration; and these lines have to be within the financial capabilities of the municipalities which would be drawing water from the projected pipeline.

These lines were examined in this latter respect; that is the feasibility that the city of London has decided to build a line from Grand Bend on Lake Huron to London; and this project has now been undertaken by the city of London through its public utilities commission.

The Ontario Water Resources Commission has not yet held the public hearings with respect to the implications, if I may refer to them in that manner, or the possibility of water being supplied to users along the line, so I am not in a position to answer your question. Only the water resources commission can answer that, when they have had the public hearings and have seen how much interest there is among the municipalities which could be served along this pipeline.

With respect to the alternative line—which was the line from Lake Erie through to London, through Port Stanley and St. Thomas—the cities of London and St. Thomas looked into this and found that it was beyond their financial capacity. The city of St. Thomas decided not to proceed with the line from Grand Bend to London, and then St. Thomas decided to continue using its present water supply which, I believe, is Kettle Creek. Is that correct, is that part of their supply?

In connection with the lines from Lake Erie to Grand Valley and Lake Huron to Grand Valley, from investigations made it appears that Brantford, which is the largest city in that area, now has an adequate supply in quantity and will improve in quality with the elimination of pollution. Kitchener-Waterloo has a new supply of two million gallons a day which ensures sufficient capacity for many years. Galt has an adequate supply for many years and two capped wells not in use at present. Guelph has an adequate supply and, with the erection of the Arkell dam on the Eramosa, they have a suitable supply for the future.

While the present water used by these municipalities is quite hard, the use of detergents has made it more acceptable to householders. It would thus appear that the installation of a pipeline to the Grand River area, from either Lake Huron or Lake Erie, is premature.

The line from Port Dover, Jarvis, Hagersville, and so on: investigations have disclosed that while this pipeline is desirable because of the quality of the waters at Caledonia and Hagersville, it is beyond the economic capacities of the two municipalities concerned.

Lake Erie, Cedar Springs area through Chatham, Blenheim, Ridgetown, and so on: due to a large commitment for sewage works by the city of Chatham, this municipality decided to defer any participation in a pipeline.

Now, since this is the largest municipality which would be required to bear the greatest financial responsibility, it becomes unfeasible to construct this pipeline with the smaller municipalities only participating.

Line to serve Corunna, Cartwright, Bridgen, Moore townships supply: the report is that there is some possibility that this system may go forward in part and further negotiations and studies are being conducted to determine whether this is financially feasible for the municipalities involved.

Regarding the line from Lake Ontario to Brantford and Kitchener: this pipeline was not considered as the static head from Lake Ontario to Brantford is 459 feet whereas the static head from Lake Erie to Brantford is 278 feet. This difference in static head rules out the Lake Ontario route from the power cost standpoint.

I would say, Mr. Chairman, that these matters are kept under close observation and as developments take place in the areas or change occurs in the financial situation of the municipalities involved, that more detailed studies will be conducted so that they will be available through the water resources commission and made available to the municipalities concerned.

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister a question. Was the water plant that was built for the mentally retarded children at Cedar Springs designed to supply water to other communities in that area?

Another thing, while I am on my feet, Mr. Chairman, I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. Minister an article of March 27, 1964, where there was a zone meeting of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture. Representatives of four counties, Essex, Kent, Lambton and Middlesex asked, or recommended, to the water resources commission to make a study of the feasibility of supplying a lake pipeline grid in southwestern Ontario. They were urging for a hydro-type water pipeline grid. Now, will anything be done in that request? Will there be a study made?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, insofar as the water plant at the Cedar Springs hospital is concerned, it was built by The Department of Public Works and is not to supply any municipalities but is to supply the Cedar Springs hospital.

With respect to the next item, I understand from the general manager of the commission that this request is being given very serious consideration and in due course of time contact will be made with the counties involved and their municipalities.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Chairman, some four or five years ago the former Minister of Planning and Development, Mr. Nickle, was up in the Long Beach area and they opened a park there. The present hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs was also at that meeting and when we opened the park at Long Beach some three or four years ago.

Mr. Nickle at that time looked at the feasibility of bringing water though an area that originates in my hon. friend's riding in Welland, from Lorraine Creek down through into the Niagara river again. There is a village there that they call Douglastown that puts up with a filtration system of their own that does not adequately supply fresh water. At that time the Minister from Kingston, Mr. Nickle, said that they would make a survey of this area. They did that for us and from that day to this we have yet to see the plans, or know whether it is feasible or not. I hear by the "grapevine" that it can be done.

Now my question is to the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management: This afternoon I think he made a statement that there has been an increase in the amount given to municipalities or counties which cared to go into the possibility of obtaining fresh water and opening up areas and developing ponds. Did I get that information correct?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Seventy-five per cent for reservoirs or farm ponds.

Mr. Bukator: Farm ponds only.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Or reservoirs.

Mr. Bukator: Or reservoirs.

Well, I would like the project I speak of, Mr. Chairman, to a reservoir. I think that to bring fresh water from Lake Erie through Lorraine Creek, down into the Black Creek area and back into the Niagara River, is not only feasible but I understand there are plans in one of the departments now which indicate it can be done. It could be done by four or five hon. Ministers in the front benches. I would just like to be put on the right track. I have brought this issue up annually.

Now, the Minister of Planning and Development—Mr. Macaulay I think, at that time, was Economics and Lord knows what; and then, from that particular group, I believe now it has gone to water resources; and from water resources I understand the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart) will look at this kindly because it will assist farmers. It will assist farmers for irrigation. It will help the farmers throughout that whole area. It will help them in their gardening.

What I am trying to find out is: Since that meeting we had a month or so ago in Niagara Falls—and I am addressing the hon. Minister of Agriculture—has it changed now? Should I consult the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs, or do I go to the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts) for this project? The Niagara regional development group feel this can be done, and should have been done, many years ago. There is not a man in that particular organization who does not believe that this could be done, and will help a lot of people, as far as irrigation is concerned, as far as farming is concerned, as far as conservation is concerned.

I hate to do this every time I get to my feet, but the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Morningstar) has had representations made to him and I have had the county council group talking with me, and at the moment I am going to let you in on a little secret. He is supposed to make an appointment with some department, and I am supposed to join him, and we are going to talk over this project again.

I do not know a better place to find out who in heaven's name to talk to—do we talk to the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management, the hon. Minister of Agriculture, the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs or do we go to the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests? Mind you, only five years in the Legislature does not enlighten one to know in what direction to head. But if I can get this now—

An hon. member: Try the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman).

Mr. Bukator: Yes, that might be the answer to my problem. We should go to the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions.

To get back to the subject I think is very important to that area, I am asking the hon. Minister, by way of a question: Which Minister do we talk to about this project, and the feasibility of it? I understand a survey has been made. We would like to get our hands on that and find out whether it can be done.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, if the hon. member would give me an opportunity, I would be glad to answer him.

Mr. Bukator: I did not want to quit because I get so few opportunities to speak.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The project to which the hon. member refers, or to which the hon. member has referred, is a project under The Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act, which is a joint programme of Ontario and the federal government. The gentleman the hon. member should see is the director of ARDA for Ontario, Mr. Crown, whose office is in The Department of Agriculture. I understand from the hon. Minister of Agriculture that an appointment date has already been set.

Mr. Bukator: This is where the government does not let the Opposition in on what goes on.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, may I respectfully suggest that sometimes a four-cent stamp—and it does not cost you four cents writing these days—could get all that information in due course of time. We pay a lot of attention to the requests which come from the hon. members of the Opposition because we do not want any criticism, at least not in the House. This project, to which the hon. member has made reference, is in the hands of the ARDA director. Once the hon. member gets this appointment and attends at this appointment with the representatives of the municipalities or the counties, whatever it is, and the director then approves this project, it still will require approval from Ottawa.

Once it is approved here, it has to go to Ottawa; then it comes back. But in the past the experience has been that these projects are handled quite fast. I would suggest to the hon. member that it is being taken care of, and will be taken care of in due course of time—which will be soon.

Mr. Bukator: I would just like to make one point, Mr. Chairman. "A four-cent stamp," the hon. Minister said, and then "in due course of time." I think if I were to look into my records, I would find maybe I have spent 16 cents for stamps, and the due course of time has not been completed as yet. Now then, I am pleased that Mr. Crown is handling this because he was the executive secretary at that time for Mr. Nickle. I am very pleased that you have put me on the right track; and you can rest assured that I will not miss the opportunity of which you spoke. I feel that this is good for more than the few people along that creek.

You talk about your water table, in bringing water to areas where you can have ponds and control dams. You will no doubt re-elect the hon. member for Welland for ever, if he gets this project through. And I would like to see him in there.

Mr. E. P. Morningstar (Welland): Mr. Chairman, this is something—

Mr. MacDonald: This is the last word.

Mr. Morningstar: —that the hon. member for Niagara Falls and myself, Mr. Chairman, have been interested in for a number of years—the getting of fresh water through this Black Creek area. When it is possible to do this it will create recreation centres, and so on and so forth; but in connection with this, as the hon. member knows, there is also a drainage problem in the township of Humberstone.

I have been attending meetings of the Niagara Regional Development Association. It was asking for this report from The Department of Lands and Forests; a survey was supposed to have been made. The hon. Minister of Lands and Forests advises me that this survey is not completed, Mr. Chairman, that the Niagara Peninsula Conservation Authority is asking for a report on the whole area there and the department is making a report on the Chippawa creek, which is holding up the survey. I was also advised, as the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs informed the House, that it really should come under the ARDA, which is connected with the federal government. So you see, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen, it is quite a complicated project. But I am sure that we will get this ironed out eventually, or get it finalized one way or another.

Mr. H. S. Racine (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, could I ask a question of the hon. Minister regarding the sewage disposal plant being constructed in Ottawa? First, I would like to know whether grants are available from the provincial government for the construction of that sewage disposal plant. Second, I would like to know whether there is any agreement with the province of Quebec; because if we install this sewage disposal plant in Ottawa, and the province of Quebec does not co-operate in order to clean up the river and do the same thing on their side of the river, the money being spent now on this sewage disposal plant will be lost.

Is there any agreement of any kind in the case of an interprovincial river like the Ottawa?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Did I understand the hon. member to say that this plant was under construction now?

Mr. Racine: The sewage disposal plant? Well, so I understand.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I thought it was completed and officially opened some time last year. Is there only one plant?

An hon. member: It is completed.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, I will accept then that it is completed. Offhand, I do not know what grants were paid under it. There are different types of grants available, depending on the time of the year the construction takes place. I am sorry, we just could not have all our books here. Could we get the information for the hon. member in the next few days?

Mr. Racine: Yes, surely. Now, what about the other question?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I do not know what the other question was.

Mr. Racine: The question of some reciprocity between the provinces. Is there any agreement? I understand that there are a number of municipalities, perhaps even in Ontario, that have no sewage disposal plant. Naturally we have done our share in the Ottawa area; what happens in the other areas?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I am sorry to say, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member has asked a rather embarrassing question. Embarrassing insofar as Quebec is concerned, because unfortunately it appears that there is not the same effort being put forth by the municipalities on the Quebec side as there is by the municipalities on the Ontario side. We have to live with these things and do the best we can with our neighbours, do our best to live with them.

I know that a number of municipalities on the Ottawa river on our side, on the Ontario side, have projects underway at the present time and others planned for the near future which will greatly alleviate the matter of pollution in the Ottawa. Just how far we can go in influencing Quebec, I think, would depend on the example that we set by doing our best to control the pollution so far as we are responsible for it.

Mr. Racine: I had no intention, Mr. Chairman, of embarrassing the hon. Minister, but I was just wondering whether there was any agreement. I think possibly there might be a possibility of getting together with the authorities in Quebec in order to arrive at some agreement regarding this problem.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, I have one problem concerning a development that may take place on the Detroit River. It is across the international boundary, it is the filling in of approximately 34 acres as an extension to Peche Island.

Now, it is under study by the Michigan State Legislature as to permission being granted to the development company for putting this fill into the Detroit River. Because this is fairly close to the intake of Windsor's water supply, the fill that may be used might have some harmful effect on the water that is being supplied to the local municipalities.

Now this is across an international boundary line. More than likely, it would entail some type of negotiation between the province of Ontario and the state of Michigan. Is the department in contact with the state of Michigan as to this development and could the hon. Minister give us some assurance that the type of fill that may be used, according to any agreement with the state of Michigan, would not have any harmful effect on the water supply coming into the city of Windsor?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I understand, Mr. Chairman, that this matter is in the jurisdiction of the International Joint Commission. I also understand from the general manager of the OWRC that this matter was on the agenda for the IJC meeting which was held in Buffalo a month or so ago and I am advised that every effort will be made, that any material that is placed in that river in this particular area will have no bad effects on water supply going to anyone.

Mr. Newman: I thank the hon. Minister.

Mr. R. J. Boyer (Muskoka): Mr. Chairman, the statutory item listed in The Department of Energy and Resources Management estimates provides for a grant-in-aid of rural hydro-electric services in northern Ontario. The statute concerned is called The Rural Hydro-Electric Distribution Act, under which, formerly, all of Ontario benefited, until the day came a few years ago when all major needs for extensions had been met in the south and the programme was limited to the northeastern and northwestern regions of Ontario Hydro. For some years this item has been used for the purpose of introducing a statement to this honourable House on Hydro matters generally.

Therefore, as a representative of the Legislature on the Ontario Hydro Commission, it is a privilege to be able to outline Hydro's operations during 1963 and some of the more important developments of the past three months. I cannot deal at great length, nor to any depth, with many aspects of Hydro's numerous services, projects and plans, yet I hope I may be able to leave you with a comprehensive picture. If there are areas of the commission's activities which seem to need more detailed explanation, and hon. members have questions, I will try to furnish further details.

May I also mention to the House that the standing committee on government commissions will be meeting tomorrow morning at ten o'clock when the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission will be the authority that will be before that committee. The chairman and commissioners and senior management of Hydro will be present in order to answer questions from the members of the committee.

Mr. Chairman, a good indicator of economic growth in Ontario is the continuing rise in electric power requirements and the increasing uses of this form of energy. The year 1963 illustrates this well. After some levelling in power demands in the first quarter, there was a steady upward trend which continued to the end of the year. The climax was reached in mid-December when we recorded an unprecedented demand of 6,797,000 kilowatts. This compared to the 1962 peak was greater by eight per cent, or expressed in kilowatts, an increase of 504,000 kilowatts.

The net revenue from the sale of primary power and energy in 1963 was approximately $270,000,000 compared with $249,300,000 in 1962 for an increase of about eight per cent. It is reassuring to note that primary energy provided in March, 1964, last month, increased over March of last year by 8.1 per cent, and that the rate of increase of the first three months of the current year over last year's first quarter has been of almost similar proportions.

Let me describe our power resources. At present, Ontario Hydro has 65 hydraulic plants throughout the province, with a combined total dependable capacity of 5,031,000 kilowatts. We also have four major thermal plants with a combined capacity of 2,108,000 kilowatts, and contracts for purchased power, chiefly with Quebec, totalling 617,000 kilowatts. The total capability of the provincial system has now reached 7,756,000 kilowatts.

In addition to this, the nuclear power demonstration plant at Rolphton is now operating and is rated at 20,000 kilowatts. Comparing the total supply capability with the mid-December peak demand leaves us a power reserve of approximately 14 per cent under normal operating conditions.

It is interesting to observe that thermal generation in 1963 approached 25 per cent of the output from all of the commission's plants.

In the House today we have heard of low water levels. I would add that much below normal water levels on Lakes Erie and Ontario during almost two years, coupled with low river flows in most of the province, have continued to emphasize the importance of thermal-electric generation to Hydro's east system in southern and northeastern Ontario. In October, for example, the flow of the Niagara River was the lowest in 103 years of record for that month.

Ice conditions which plagued us in past years presented further problems to our Niagara generating complex. In January and February of 1963, as a result of these conditions which restricted river flow, thermal generation reached 35 per cent of all generation in the east system. Again in 1964, ice conditions on the Niagara hampered production.

I should note that continuing studies have been made by the authorities interested in the important role of the Niagara River into ways and means of reducing the serious annual ice problem. Ontario Hydro and the power authority of the state of New York have submitted a proposal through the Canadian and United States governments to the International Joint Commission requesting approval of the construction and operation of a boom designed to prevent or at least limit the sporadic but massive discharges of ice from Lake Erie into the Niagara River. This ice boom would be about two miles long and would be placed in Lake Erie above the water intake for the city of Buffalo where the velocities are less than 1.5 feet per second. If the ice boom is successful, as is anticipated, great benefits will accrue to the communities along the Niagara River.

It is important to note, that the combined effect of ice conditions and low water levels—on the Niagara River alone—caused an energy loss of 800 million kilowatt-hours in the first three months of 1964. In other words, approximately 320,000 tons of coal had to be burned by our thermal plants to make up this deficit.

The ever-increasing reliance on thermal generation has focused attention on the importance of having adequate supplies of coal. While, of necessity, the greater part of our coal has been purchased from the United States, I am happy to say that we were able to negotiate a satisfactory agreement with Nova Scotia coal mining interests to supply us with a total of 2,850,000 tons of coal to be delivered between 1963 and 1967. This amount is the maximum that Nova Scotia can supply us in that period.

This coal contract is undoubtedly of great significance to the future of coal-mining operations in Cape Breton, as it is to Canada's overall economy. To give some idea of the quantities of coal we have been purchasing, I will give the figures for the past three years. In 1961, we bought about half a million tons; the following year, around a million and a half tons, and in 1963 our coal purchases reached 3.5 million tons.

As more coal-fired plants are built and our present ones expanded, coal will become an even greater item in our purchasing.

Earlier in this session, I endeavoured to answer certain unfounded statements which became current in the province over the past few months to the effect that in our sale of energy, particularly in respect to residential electric heating, Hydro's rates were not sufficient to pay the cost of fuel used at our generating stations. The implication seemed to have been that Hydro was providing unfair competition in this field.

Sir, I assert again that this type of statement is completely at variance with fact. I emphasize that all costs, including purchase of coal, are met in the attractive rates offered for electric heating. Further, even if all the electric heating power requirements were met by generation at our coal-burning stations—and this is not the case—the cost of coal still would represent only one-third of the electric heating rate. I stress this, since I wish all hon. members to be informed on this point.

As an interesting sidelight, I may say that our coal purchases in Nova Scotia have influenced the Ontario economy in another direction. So that these larger tonnages from Nova Scotia may be delivered directly to our Lake Ontario sites, a shipyard at Port Weller, near St. Catharines, has constructed on behalf of a leading Canadian shipping company a self-unloading coal carrier which will be used to make these deliveries. The firm which has had the ship built is the one which has obtained the contract from Nova Scotia interests for coal movement to Ontario. This ship is 680 feet in length and will have capacity for more than 22,000 tons of coal each trip. It will be among the largest ocean-going ships to use the St. Lawrence Seaway and the largest ocean-going vessel built on the Great Lakes. In May last year, at a significant ceremony at Port Weller, the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario (Mr. Roberts) officially laid the keel at the start of construction.

On April 25, that is this coming Saturday, at the shipyard of Port Weller Dry Docks Limited, the christening and commissioning of this splendid craft, which will bear the name S.S. Cape Breton Miner, will take place under the gracious sponsorship of Mrs. John Roberts.

While, as I have indicated, our thermal-electric generation was much in the limelight during 1963, there was no slackening in our continuing programme to harness those remaining hydraulic sites which are capable of economic development.

In the James Bay watershed, workmen carried on with the development of water power resources in the rock, muskeg and bush in the area some 500 miles north of this capital city. By the year's end, we brought four new generating units into service with a combined total capacity of 209,000 kilowatts at Little Long and Otter Rapids.

These locations are in the interesting riding represented by the hon. member for Cochrane North (Mr. Brunelle). Several hon. members have in recent years had opportunity to visit Otter Rapids, on the Abitibi River. Late last summer an official opening ceremony took place at this plant. Little Long generating station is 30 miles west of Otter Rapids, 42 miles north of Kapuskasing. Within 15 miles of Little Long two additional plants are under development, the Harmon and Kipling stations, which when completed by 1966 will raise the total output from this new northeastern power complex to 560,000 kilowatts.

This work has not been easy, and we do well to pay tribute to the men who so diligently work summer and winter, often when the temperature is many degrees below zero, through muskeg and rock, through black flies and mosquitoes in the early summer, distant from the amenities of towns and cities, and yet maintaining a good morale and an interesting community life. It is to the credit of Ontario Hydro that we have such large numbers of employees who work so hard for the commission and in turn for all the people of this great province. I hope we shall never become too immersed and impressed with facts and figures which emerge after all the work is done, and thereby overlook the individual people who have worked together loyally and hard, since it is they who have been responsible for the very progress which I am now endeavouring to describe.

The pivotal point of the $200 million hydro-electric complex on the James Bay watershed, together with the EHV transmission line, is the Pinard transformer station. Power from the Little Long and Otter Rapids generating stations is now being transmitted to the Sudbury area on EHV lines at 230,000 volts. The second half of this link will be extended to Toronto by 1966.

At that time, sir, the entire line will be carrying power at 500,000 volts. This is the first major line of this voltage and length on the North American continent. Good progress is being made in clearing the right-of-way and erecting the structures which will carry this line in the sections between the Severn River and the French River.

I wish to make known to the House that the possibilities of further hydro-electric sites are being carefully considered. Engineering studies are to be completed within several weeks on the feasibility of the development of a site at Mountain Chute on the Madawaska River. It will be some time before all engineering and economic considerations are firmly established, but this is one of a quite limited number of sites where it may be possible to add to our hydraulic power resources.

In 1963 Hydro's thermal-electric capacity reached 2,108,000 kilowatts. This includes the Thunder Bay generating station, which officially was accepted for service at the end of July. For the present, this station at Fort William serves as standby to provide security of service to northwestern Ontario in the event of low stream flows or a sharp increase in energy demands from our customers in that area who have the capacity to absorb large blocks of power on short notice.

Good progress continued on Units 3 and 4 at our Lakeview generating station, just to the west of Metropolitan Toronto. To bring Lakeview to its full potential, another four units are to be added. When completed by 1968, the Lakeview development, with eight units, will have a total capacity of 2,400,000 kilowatts, making it the largest thermal-electric power plant in Canada, and among the largest in the world.

Following thorough investigation of several sites in the London-Windsor-Sarnia area, the commission recently announced approval for the construction of a new coal-fired, thermal-electric station on the St. Clair River, two miles south of Courtright. Initially, the new plant will comprise two 500,000-kilowatt units, both of which will be in service by 1969. It might be added that the site will permit further expansion if required in the more distant future. I point out, Mr. Chairman, that the largest coal-fired units now operated by Hydro are 300,000 kilowatts, and the decision to increase the size to 500,000 kilowatt units at this plant is yet another step in closing the cost gap between coal-fired and hydraulic generating stations. The need for a plant in this area has developed because of the rapid growth of power demands throughout southwestern Ontario.

Canada's first full-scale nuclear power station at Douglas Point, between Kincardine and Port Elgin on Lake Huron, continues on its course to completion. Last summer the 60-ton reactor vessel or calandria in which the nuclear reaction takes place, arrived at the site, having been shipped entirely by water from Montreal. The Douglas Point project is to be completed by 1965 and it will give us 200,000 kilowatts.

As you already know, Mr. Chairman, the nuclear power demonstration station at Rolphton on the Ottawa River has been successfully operated for over a year and a half. A great deal of operating experience was gained from this station and scientists have developed technical knowledge that is invaluable to future development of nuclear power stations.

So much is this so, that we are prepared to undertake the development of a one million kilowatt nuclear-electric station, in co-operation with others. Negotiations are underway between the Ontario government, the Canadian government and Ontario Hydro as to the basis upon which initial financing and its subsequent recovery will be shared. Operation of this new plant is scheduled for 1970. Its location will be at a site to be approved by the Atomic Energy Control Board of Canada.

Even as new electric power generating sources are being developed, Hydro has continued to seek other methods of generation which can economically cope with peak capacities.

One of these methods is the pumped-storage scheme which permits energy, produced by conventional generating stations during low demand hours of the day, to be converted to a large amount of short-term peak capacity. As will be remembered, Hydro completed the first such plant at Niagara in 1958.

You will also recall, Mr. Chairman, from information given to the House, in the previous Parliament, that in May of 1961 Hydro took out one-year options of land near Delphi Point, about eight miles west of Collingwood on the Georgian Bay. Since that time, we have virtually completed buying 1,000 acres of land.

The purchase of land at Delphi Point is part of our long-term planning to meet the province's future electric power requirements. Although actual construction of this project may not proceed for some time, we have purchased this land now to avoid disruption to future commercial and residential developments which otherwise would likely take place in the area.

I should emphasize, for the benefit of those concerned, that neither the water level of Georgian Bay nor skiing activities will be interfered with. While it is too early to go into details, we anticipate that the hydraulic plant at this site can produce one million kilowatts or more.

In planning for the power needs of an ever-developing province, it is essential to use our resources to the fullest degree economically possible, and Delphi Point, in due course, will illustrate the same.

We passed a significant milestone in our rural electrification programme when, a year ago, we gained our 500,000th rural customer, despite losses of some 85,000 customers from the rural system to urban commissions since 1949 through municipal annexations. The rural electrification programme launched in 1912 by Hydro's first chairman, Sir Adam Beck, is reaching the saturation point with more than 97 per cent of the rural population now supplied with electricity, including 137,000 farms. Our total of 49,000 miles of rural distribution line is enough to girdle the globe twice.

Extension of service to rural areas has been a paramount objective in our overall programme to provide low-cost electricity to all parts of Ontario. The contributions electricity has made to the social and economic progress in rural Ontario over the past half-century are immeasurable.

Originally, rural hydro service supplied power to farms only but now it embraces commercial establishments, hamlets, summer residences and fringe areas of towns and cities.

The greatest expansion of our rural systems has occurred since 1945. Between 1953 and 1963, the number of hamlet customers increased by 49 per cent to a total of 224,000, while farm customers rose by 2.5 per cent to 137,000. Farm and hamlet customers nearly doubled their average consumption of power in this decade.

Also in this ten-year period, summer cottagers increased by 87 per cent to 108,000, indicating the importance of electricity in supporting the province's tourist trade. I can testify to the great importance of rural hydro in my own part of the province in enhancing the attractiveness of our lakeland areas where the advantages of modern living are welcomed during vacations as in any other time of the year.

Electricity has helped to revolutionize farming in Ontario over the years, by introducing a host of labour-saving devices. Today we have approximately 400 electrical applications available to farms, narrowing the difference between farm and city services almost to the vanishing point.

In the decade up to 1963, Ontario's farm cash income has been increased by 32 per cent despite a decrease in acreage under cultivation and a 22 per cent reduction in the agricultural labour force.

In the same decade Ontario farmers nearly doubled their use of electricity, and the average cost per kilowatt-hour declined by 17 per cent. Meanwhile, and this comparison is significant, the price index of services and commodities used by farmers rose 22 per cent.

Due to the phenomenal growth of our province, power demands in Ontario have been doubling every ten to twelve years, giving us an average yearly increase of 6.5 per cent of an ever-increasing total. In order that Hydro shall keep ahead of demands, we must estimate well into the future and take steps to make certain that they are met. This is not always an easy thing, as you will agree, especially when you realize that it takes around four years from the moment of decision until a major plant is in service.

In projecting estimates to the end of this decade, we see an interesting growth pattern emerging. May I take time briefly to review steps we are taking today to be ready for 1970.

I would like to place on record a percentage breakdown of what we expect to be our generation sources in the year 1970.

Hydro-electric stations will account for nearly 50 per cent of system capacity, which is a decline from its present 65 per cent. Conventional thermal-electric will rise to 42 per cent, and nuclear will account for around six per cent. The remainder of our resources will consist of purchased power.

I may assure the House that should our provincial economy spurt forward to such an extent that we need even greater generating capacity than now estimated, we have additional means of providing for this. We can increase capacity in some of our present plants, or develop entirely new sites. The sum of these statistics is that we need never fear being unable to cope with the growth of our province. We deem it our duty to ensure that Ontario is never hampered in the future by reason of power shortages.

This brings me to another very important development which has been continuing for a number of years. It is that of power interchanges and interconnections with other neighbouring electrical utilities.

These interconnections are growing in importance, both from the standpoint of economics and security. Although our total purchases of power from other utilities declined in 1963, this outside source of energy did benefit us directly when we could buy substantial amounts of power as required.

In September of last year, our east system began operating in electrical synchronism with Hydro-Quebec, improving security for both utilities. Through a system of these interconnections we are now in a position where we can operate in parallel with a growing electrical grid system which has a combined capacity of 150 million kilowatts and stretches across more than half of the North American continent. Eventually, this grid will be extended to encompass the greater part of North America.

I come now to the matter of rates. Ontario enjoys a unique distinction in that the per capita consumption of electricity in our province is one of the highest in the world. Although statistics are not yet available for 1963, the 1962 figures show the annual per capita energy consumption, expressed in kilowatt-hours, to be as follows: Ontario, 6,300; Canada, 6,200; United States, 5,100; United Kingdom, 2,850; and France, 1,750.

And while we are one of the largest consumers of electric energy in the world, we also enjoy the distinction of paying one of the lowest rates anywhere. Let me illustrate this by way of some examples: average costs per kilowatt-hour to householders in Ontario in 1962 were 1.32 cents; compare this with the residential and farm average cost per kilowatt-hour in the United States, which is 2.41 cents, or the United Kingdom where it is 1.96 cents.

The commercial average cost per kilowatt-hour has decreased in the decade up to 1962, by 2.8 per cent—now standing at 1.41 cents as compared to the United States with 2.37 cents.

I will give one more comparison and that is the average cost per kilowatt-hour for total power consumed; that is to say, for residential, commercial, farm and industrial requirements. The Ontario average is .91 cents a kilowatt-hour, compared with 1.68 cents per kilowatt-hour in the United States.

So, it can be seen, we have achieved a record in Ontario that is the envy of the world. This is something of which not everyone in Ontario is aware; but then too many people are inclined to take their blessings for granted.

There are many reasons why Ontario should enjoy this significant general advantage, ranging from effective administration to economical operation and to large consumption. Modern living, with more wage-earners in each household, has contributed to a greater diversification of electrical uses. Peaks have been spread out; more appliances are now in use. Increased diversification of the power load is our aim as much as high consumption. The more energy we use the lower the average cost.

Today Ontario Hydro is continuing its efforts to maintain rates at their present levels. This is the prime reason why we carry out the extensive load-building operation of which I wish to speak.

A point often mentioned to me is that we are paying more for electricity today than we were, say, 20 or 30 years ago. It is true that our total bills may be higher, yet in actual fact we are paying less per kilowatt-hour. The difference lies in our increased uses of electric energy. As early as the 1940's there were only about 40 appliances available for the average home. Today the number of appliances and labour-saving devices number more than 100.

In our load-building programme for 1963, in common with other electrical utility organizations across the continent, we used the theme "make your comfort complete with electric heat." As a result, electric heating made a major breakthrough into the mass heating market with the establishment of three electrically-heated housing subdivisions in the province. By the year-end, we had 7,600 electrically-heated homes and numerous churches, motels, schools and apartment buildings. The target for this year is another 5,000 homes.

Electric water-heating shared the load-building limelight and an estimated 100,000 electric water heaters were installed in Ontario homes during the year. This includes the customers of the municipal utilities as well as those served directly by Hydro.

There are a number of ideas for extending the load-building campaign this year. One is the continued emphasis on upgrading the service available to Ontario farmers so that the most efficient use may be made of their equipment. Last year we upgraded 3,010 farms to 100 or 200 ampere services. This year we expect to upgrade 3,000 more farms to 100 ampere service and 500 farms to 200 ampere service.

Mr. Chairman, may I observe that a surprisingly large number of people believe that Ontario Hydro does not pay taxes. Now it is true that we supply power at cost and do not operate on a profit basis, therefore we do not make any profits and have no tax to pay on profits. Hydro's municipal tax payments and grants in lieu of taxes last year amounted to $4,400,000.

We also pay for the water we borrow to produce electricity. Last year, even with river flows below normal, we paid more than $6,000,000 in water rental charges to the provincial and federal governments.

That comes to ten and a half million dollars to all three levels of government. I should also say that the local utilities commissions paid another $1,800,000 to their municipalities in taxes.

Something more. Hydro is subject to the same sales taxes as any other organization.

In 1963, we paid over $2,500,000 in provincial sales tax, gasoline tax and federal custom duties.

It is estimated that the extended federal sales tax on building materials and production equipment, which will be fully in effect in 1965, will add something like $4,000,000 to $5,000,000 annually to our costs.

One important aspect of the commission's function towards fulfilling our obligation of supplying electric power at the lowest possible cost is to ensure that all its operations are performed both efficiently and economically.

The management of the commission continues to give top priority to using the most up-to-date management methods and practices in use in the business world, and welcomes expert comparison of its record in this regard with any of the leading private organizations in the western world. Our programmes in this connection include: electronic data processing; work measurement and performance standards; system and methods analysis; work simplification training; aggressive utilization of plant automation; complete budgeting and control techniques, and load and cost trend forecasting. As an added check, our methods and organization and financial matters have been closely analyzed by independent firms to ensure that they are efficient and up to date.

Constantly we are seeking more efficient and less costly ways of providing service without sacrificing its quality. Our research aids in this cause. For example, I was interested to learn lately that by taking advantage of modern technology, engineers can get more than two and a half times more electricity from a ton of coal than was possible 35 years ago.

In the past half-century, Ontario Hydro's research division has contributed greatly to the commission's numerous pioneering advances in the electrical utility field. This important group provides research and testing services for most technical phases of the commission's operations. The varied activities of our research staff, carried out in a modern laboratory, as well as in the field, are of great significance in the task of economically meeting the constantly increasing demands for electric power in the province. These research services help to ensure that the most advanced engineering practices, consistent with sound economy, are applied throughout the Hydro system.

Savings are also being undertaken in administrative work wherever possible without reducing the service expected. Good business practices are required and these are regularly reviewed. We are very conscious of the need to reduce the pressure of costs on our rate structures.

Mr. Chairman, as has been evident from previous debates in the House, we are all conscious of the forthcoming centenary of Confederation. It is an acknowledged fact that massive generation and distribution of low-cost electricity has been a most significant factor in the growth of Ontario and its emergence as the foremost province of Canada. Ontario Hydro's pioneering role in public utility operation and in many fields of engineering has won the commission international recognition as one of the largest and most outstanding electrical organizations of the world.

It was appropriate, therefore, to give consideration to establishing an electrical museum to commemorate these years of progress. Besides saluting the centennial, such a museum would serve as well to provide a permanent home for various representative pieces of electrical equipment now in storage at numerous locations. Preliminary work has begun under the direction of a planning committee on this interesting work, and Ontario Hydro's efforts will proceed in collaboration with the government's committee on the science and industry museum.

Also of historical interest, may I note that in 1963, in co-operation with local municipal authorities and others, Ontario Hydro erected plaques marking historic electric generation sites. Further, I would report that the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) in August unveiled an Ontario historic site marker at Wasdell Falls on the Severn River in the presence of a gathering of representatives of Hydro, nearby municipalities and historical organizations. This was the first generating station built by Ontario Hydro.

I was grateful at that time that Dr. Otto Holden, now retired from the service of Ontario Hydro, was able to be present, for the Wasdell Falls station was his first engineering project and he carried through the construction of that first generating station built by Ontario Hydro at that location in central Ontario.

It is interesting that other countries of the world also have a high regard for the hydro-electric know-how achieved by commission personnel. Hydro is sending a twelve-man team to commission and be responsible for the initial operation of Ghana's hydro-electric scheme, scheduled for operation next year.

Ghana is the most recent developing country to seek the aid of experienced Hydro engineers and administrators. A ten-man Hydro team is now on a similar assignment in Iran at the Dez River hydro-electric project. Pakistan, Lebanon, Brazil, Trinidad and Tobago are among countries which also have drawn on the experience of Ontario Hydro personnel.

I hope now to answer a few questions as to Hydro which have arisen already in the House and elsewhere. Before doing so, I would like to pay tribute to the work of the present hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management, who entered on his new duties a few months ago and already has demonstrated his abilities as a good administrator. I wish also to refer to his predecessor, the hon. member for Riverdale, with whom I was associated not only in his position as Minister of Energy Resources but also as a fellow-member of the Ontario Hydro Commission.

My hon. friend from Riverdale became a member of the Ontario Hydro Commission and second vice-chairman in 1958 and first vice-chairman in 1961. He relinquished the latter position later the same year but retained a seat on the Commission until his retirement from the executive council last October. His five years of association with Hydro will be remembered by the commission personnel because of his deep interest in Hydro affairs and the many valuable proposals he put forward touching on the administration of the commission's business. I think it may be said that the hon. member for Riverdale strove to keep the members of the House as fully informed on Hydro affairs as was feasible—an aim which any representative of the House serving on the Hydro commission should, in my view, follow in the most ample form possible.

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Chairman, I really do not know where to start after the speech just made by the vice-chairman of Hydro. This information that I have before me just came into my hands within the last week. I have the brief on the proposed ice boom in Lake Erie and I think the only thing I might say about that is, to quote the mayor of Niagara Falls:

You have interfered with the Niagara River and Niagara Falls long enough and it is about time you quit interfering with God's creation.

Those were his words. I think that is sufficient on the boom question until it goes further.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am very upset about a letter I received.

It says: "Ontario Hydro Regional News Release." Now let me show you just how they go about taking more water off the Niagara River without telling you they are doing it.

Plans to deepen the Chippawa power canal in conjunction with work now underway to clean and rehabilitate the 43-year-old waterway, were announced today by Ontario Hydro. The Hydro spokesman emphasized the deepening of the canal will not affect the amount of water passing over Niagara Falls, which is regulated by an international treaty between Canada and the United States.

The additional water will be diverted from Hydro's Cascade plant, which the Ontario power and the Toronto power built in 1905 and 1906, by the enlarged canal and used in the more modern Beck generating station downstream.

Deepening of the canal will increase its capacity by 6,500 cubic feet a second, representing an 11 per cent increase in electrical output in the Beck plant. The canal will be deepened over a five-mile section downstream from the Montrose gate with cages and ducts varying up to a maximum of 12 feet. Further downstream, another mile and a half section will be widened to a total width varying from 75 to 90 feet. The original plan to rehabilitate the Chippawa canal was made necessary by debris which has reduced the flow of water to the Beck plant.

Hydro informed the city of Niagara Falls on January 21 that it was considering the proposal to deepen the waterway in conjunction with the rehabilitation job. The decision to proceed this year was made because of potential savings in completing both jobs simultaneously and also to minimize losses on the proposed proposition of electricity while Niagara River flows are below normal.

Primary estimates indicated the combined project will cost approximately $11 million. Additional construction workers needed will be hired through the National Employment Services in Niagara Falls.

The only good feature in that letter is that a total of 400 men are expected to be hired locally.

The canal is now scheduled to close about May 1. It will be reopened later this year, then closed again in 1965, to complete the project. The Beck plant will continue to operate during the shutdown. Temporary facilities being built by Ontario Hydro will assure an adequate supply of fresh water for Niagara Falls and dispose of discharges from the city sewage treatment plant when the canal is closed.

Then the last three lines of this letter state:

After the canal deepening project is complete the Ontario power and the Toronto power plants will continue to operate when water is available for power production.

First they say they are going to deepen the Welland Canal, or the Chippawa Creek. Second, they are going to take off 6,500 cubic feet per second at the Chippawa Creek. They are going to divert this water into the Chippawa Creek, because naturally your canal will be deepened. You are not going to let that water go through your control gates because it is going the other way now and it will further deteriorate the beauty of the Niagara River.

There is no other way to explain it. The water goes into these tunnels and into Toronto power at Dufferin Island, or in about that vicinity, and enters the Ontario power at about that point and it will naturally not go over the falls, because it goes to the new cut in the deepening.

Now correct me at this point, if you like, Mr. Vice-Chairman. I cannot see it any other way and I would like an answer to this one. When the time comes, no doubt you will explain it.

They talk about changing and deepening the old canal by about 12 feet and widening the outlet from 75 to 90 feet. You are, naturally, going to take advantage of this water, because you say you are going to increase your power output by taking the 6,500 cubic feet per second by 11 per cent in the Adam Beck stations—and that is in the letter—that you are going to increase your power output by 11 per cent using the 6,500 cubic feet per second. Then in the final analysis, when this project is finished, you say in the last three lines of your letter after the canal deepening project is complete the Ontario power and the Toronto power plants will continue to operate when water is available for power production.

As I see it, six and a half times two is 13,000 cubic feet per second. Now this is your own information that you submitted to me through mail by a news letter. As I said before, the people of Niagara Falls have been rooked for many years. You were telling us a few minutes ago that you pay taxes. You went on to tell us the figure of the money that you pay. This is good. But let me tell you something, you pay to the city of Niagara Falls approximately, you can correct me by a few thousand one way or another, $300,000 a year. Mr. Vice-Chairman, if you were paying your taxes the same as the Canadian Niagara Power Company pays, because they are private enterprise, you would be paying to the city of Niagara Falls $1.3 million. Canadian Niagara, a private enterprise, pays within a few thousand dollars of what Hydro pays, for 111 acres with one small plant. Hydro utilizes some 3,500 acres for their many projects and their many plants, and only pay the same amount of money as Canadian Niagara does.

We were talking this afternoon about transmission lines and the gas companies—

An hon. member: The score is two to nothing.

Mr. Bukator: In favour of Detroit? The power in the Toronto hockey team is taking quite a beating tonight.

An hon. member: It is good for Niagara Falls, of course.

Mr. Bukator: It is not good for Niagara Falls.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): This is a good one, the Tories are defending public enterprise and the Liberals private enterprise.

Mr. MacDonald: This is not the first time that argument has been advanced.

Mr. Bukator: I do not know about the Liberals, but I do believe this, that I think with respect to Niagara Falls and that particular riding that I represent, I do believe the Hydro has been taking them long enough and it is about time they faced the facts of life. I think it is about time the government started to treat us the way we should be treated.

Now I am going to tell you something. You can take Hansard tomorrow if you will and correct me, and I will say within a few thousand dollars you are taking the city of Niagara Falls for about $1 million, and you stand up before us here tonight and say you are paying taxes. You might be paying into the federal government and you might be paying into the provincial government, but I can assure you you are not paying into the municipalities which are entitled to it; because at the Soo they have a power plant and they pay full taxes, as private enterprise does. And I might say this about the Canadian Niagara: They not only pay full taxes but their rates are no higher than Hydro. This means that the administration by private enterprise is a lot better than Hydro as I see it from where I stand.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Chairman, that is all right. I do not mind putting up with this pair of hecklers. They have to get their nickel's worth in sooner or later, they might as well take it out on me as anybody.

I will go back to my original argument. The vice-chairman of Hydro cannot stand on his feet here and tell us that they are paying their just dues, because I am going to give you another comparison. If you have a one-storey garage, your assessment according to the provincial manual is about $1.95 per square foot; and this is all the assessment you charge to Hydro on their structures. No matter how big or how high, on a one-floor basis at about $1.95 a square foot—that is what they pay their grants in lieu of taxes on. Now show me again, Mr. Vice-Chairman, if you will, where I am wrong.

It was a nice speech he made this afternoon. As a matter of fact I was almost about to applaud him when he was talking about the millions they pay, and how they pay sales tax. Why should they not pay sales tax?

Let us take the canal for example. You are deepening it, and are taking 6,500 cubic feet per second through that canal, which makes it much more treacherous. You are going to deepen it; you are going to widen it in some areas; it is about time you decided! I will tell the vice-chairman: It will not be as pleasant for you people in the Niagara riding when I get back there and tell them what you are up to now.

This letter indicates to me that you are taking them for the third or fourth time, in not paying your just dues. I can assure you that every association in the Niagara riding will know what you are up to. You are diverting water again off the Niagara river, some 6,500 cubic feet according to your own figures, and I can assure you again that when you reopen those plants and put the new project into existence you will take another 6,500 cubic feet according to your own admission—

Mr. G. H. Peck (Scarborough Centre): That helps the employment situation in Niagara Falls.

An hon. member: It kills the tourist business.

Mr. Bukator: Have fun, boys!

An hon. member: The Tory government is good to Niagara Falls.

Mr. Bukator: The Tory government is good to everybody but Niagara Falls.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): And Windsor. Just the Tory ridings.

An hon. member: George said it.

Mr. Bukator: George not only said it, he is going to tell it again and again. When you people come into Niagara Falls you had better be prepared to tell the Niagara Falls council that the least you will do for them is cap that canal.

I get a kick out of the hon. vice-chairman of Hydro. I understand the hon. vice-chairman of Hydro gets quite a chunk of money for the position he holds, and he makes one speech here a year on Hydro. My hon. colleague here read it in last year's Hansard; it was almost the same thing. The only difference is that Mrs. Roberts is going to christen the ship. A year ago, the hon. Prime Minister was there at the laying of the keel. But, over and above that, there is no change in this particular speech from what we got a year ago.

An hon. member: That is more progress than usual.

Mr. Bukator: Yes, they have built another boat. You know, it is a funny thing; I will give you people a little lecture in grammar or spelling. "B-u" spells "Bu", and "k-a-t" spells "kat", and "o-r" makes Bukator. Try that in your book. I have been getting "Dekator", "Buekator", "Buckator" and "Buckatory"; and if you cannot handle that one, just call me "George", I do not mind. But let me tell the hon. vice-chairman this is not a laughing matter.

Mr. Boyer: I am not laughing.

Mr. Bukator: I know he is not. And I want to tell him something: I can assure him that if the papers will give me half a break I will make speech after speech to every organization in the city of Niagara Falls until we bring it to their attention that you are again taking them—taking more water off Niagara Falls—and you are not paying them any more in grants in lieu of taxes.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton): The mayor is happy.

Mr. Bukator: Yes, the mayor is happy—except once he was not happy.

An hon. member: When was that?

Mr. Bukator: The odd part of it, and I told this to the hon. vice-chairman in the hall, and I might as well tell him now, is that I play a lone hand. And I can assure you that the mayor of the city of Niagara Falls, and the council of the city of Niagara Falls, should respect their member to this point, at least, to invite me in to do their footwork for them in the Legislature.

Mr. Peck: They know the hon. member better than we do, though.

Mr. Bukator: Is that right? I think maybe the mayor might be accused of playing a little politics. He is good to you. But, being the rebel I have been for many years—and I am going to continue to be—you are going to hear from me. I speak on behalf of my riding and I can assure you that if you would like to get into the political scheme—I think you had a member run down there too; I think he won one poll, I believe, out of 130-odd.

I tell you I am very upset to get this heckling from this left wing group. Did I get the impression from them that one cannot speak on behalf of his riding when it is not being treated right, without having to belong to some particular party or group? If that is so, then I might just as well go home because I sometimes do not agree with my own party.

But fair is fair, and I can assure you that Hydro has not been fair. So, to draw it to your attention again, and you can correct me if I am wrong, the Canadian Niagara Power plant owns 111 acres and only one unit and they pay as much in taxes, because they are private enterprise, as Hydro does for 3,500 acres with its many structures. All I am asking from this government, and all I am asking from the hon. Minister of whatever he might be—I cannot remember all the positions they hand out in this government from year to year, the hon. Minister of Energy and whatever it might be, Resources Management—is that he—with his clean linen, because he is new at this time and, as you know, you cannot get tainted too quickly—take a good look at this and tell me where I am wrong, if I am wrong.

I think I have covered the ground pretty well. This is like playing the record over from a year ago because I found out what the vice-chairman did.

Mr. Peck: Is that the same speech as last year?

Mr. Bukator: Pretty well. But I did not read it out of the book. Let me tell you something, gentlemen: The gas company comes and puts a transmission line—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Bukator: The gas company puts in a transmission line along the road. On the powerhouse, the Hydro puts this pole line, with an ugly mess along our streets, parallel to its competitor. The gas company pays taxes for the business they do through that line. All you do is make an ugly mess and cut a swathe through every town, village, township and city in the province, and you pay not one red cent for that privilege. You can correct me there if I am wrong.

I think there has been enough said on the subject, but I tell you this: As long as you are in competition with private enterprise you should do the same thing as they do, and that is pay your taxes.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Niagara Falls can always be depended upon to give the House interesting material, particularly when he is speaking of affairs in his own riding. He presents the same in a rather novel manner which attracts our attention. Out of what he has said tonight, I would like to give him and the House certain assurances. The first I should mention is that we in Hydro are very conscious of the tourist attractions of Niagara Falls city, and the river and the great cataract there; and it is our purpose to maintain, as far as nature permits, a good flow of water which can be seen, particularly during the tourist season in the daytime hours.

I want to assure the hon. member, in connection with the important work of cleaning the power canal and deepening it, that the water over the falls is not going to be affected. When there is an abundance of water, the older plants which are often called the Cascade plants, may be operated. But when this is not the case, more efficient use is made of water through Sir Adam Beck No. 2 plant. I would point out that this work is being done, sir, in these present times of low water levels. This is a favourable period, so far as work of this type goes, to proceed with this important renovation and deepening work. The work will mean much to the city of Niagara Falls in employment, as somebody did mention.

I want to say that we were most particular to consult with the municipal authorities, with industrial concerns along the banks of the canal and with all concerned, before beginning this work in order that we should maintain good relations with everyone in the city. Accordingly, we have been able to make provision for a number of special public services and I think we have met with the satisfaction of the authorities in the city.

Now as to Hydro's taxes. May I point out, sir, that it was this government which some years ago established the principle of paying a tax grant for hydro plants. This has been paid for a matter, I think, of eight or ten years. What I am referring to has been done in the time I have been in Parliament, and then the far more extensive arrangement and plan of paying grants in lieu of taxes was brought about in 1960 or thereabouts. I will just take time to review what Hydro is called upon under The Power Commission Act to pay.

On land that we hold, we pay an amount equivalent to what would be paid if the land were taxed in a normal manner by the municipality. What is paid on buildings depends on the use of the building. Those used exclusively for executive or administrative purposes require payment of taxes levied in the usual manner by the municipality. Then, on buildings which are used in connection with generating, transforming or auxiliary equipment or machinery, the assessment is based—as the hon. member for Niagara Falls mentioned—on $2 a square foot of inside area at ground level, multiplied by the equalization factor used in that particular year by The Department of Municipal Affairs. Occasionally as well there are voluntary payments to municipalities for loss of revenue from former tax paying private power companies whose assets have been acquired by Hydro. This applies to a certain extent in Niagara Falls. There is then business assessment taxation. An additional assessment of 60 per cent of the assessed value already established for lands and buildings is what is paid. To this is applied the local business tax rate and the amount owing is paid at the same time as property taxes. No business taxes are paid on properties used for residential purposes, that is understood, or on properties rented by Hydro, because of course in the latter case the tenant would pay.

I want to refer, if I may, directly to the beautiful and great city of Niagara Falls. I draw to the attention of my hon. friend the great admiration there exists on every hand for his home riding.

The hon. member has given a figure of what he estimates the taxes paid by Hydro to be in his city. He mentioned a figure of $300,000.

Mr. Bukator: A few thousand one way or the other.

Mr. Boyer: Well, Mr. Chairman, the new or enlarged city of Niagara Falls received from Ontario Hydro in 1963, almost $400,000, grants in lieu of taxes. I suggest this is a very sizeable sum indeed, in the fiscal picture of any municipality. This is as provided in The Power Commission Act, excepting that the city of Niagara Falls at present receives a special grant of $75,000, this latter having had its origin many years ago when Hydro first took over private power companies at the Falls. I referred to that a moment ago.

Hydro pays normal realty taxes on all its holdings, except the basic installations which form the power system itself.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that there was a comparison made earlier today as to the generating stations of Hydro and installations of natural gas companies. I think that all will agree that there is a difference in the location and the use of the land on which generating stations sit. You would not find any other industry locating over the side of a cliff or in the midst of a stream. Anything that is paid on a generating station in such a location, is extra money for that municipality, because you would not find any other factory or business locating in those particular places. Good land, on the other hand, is used by other people and brings in its own form of municipal revenue.

Mr. Bukator: How about the Port Credit plant?

An hon. member: That is not your riding.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Chairman, I say just in conclusion of this matter that the system of Hydro grants as it has developed over the years and is now embodied in The Power Commission Act is designed to meet the interests of all concerned in an equitable manner, without undue benefit or sacrifice on the part of anyone, as seems fitting in the operation of a public enterprise such as Hydro.

Mr. Morningstar: Mr. Chairman, just one question to the vice-chairman. I was wondering if the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission is considering putting a steam plant in Welland county. I see you have spread them throughout the province and I did hear there was some talk of locating a steam plant, probably in the town of Port Colborne. There are great facilities there for a plant of that nature.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Chairman, I am delighted to answer the question from my hon. friend from Welland. I must say that a number of officials from Welland county came to the Ontario Hydro offices one day to present a brief on this question. I have heard it said that we now have enough briefs from various localities in the province to choke a horse, but I do not say that with any disrespect for Port Colborne. I say that we have this week had two groups present briefs. We are receiving a number each month.

The decision of the location of the new plant to which I referred has not yet been made. I might say it is not a steam plant but rather the location of the new nuclear reactor plant with which we are concerned, but we are not yet in a position to make a decision as to the location. But certainly Port Colborne will be given fullest consideration by the commission.

Mr. Morningstar: I thank the hon. vice-chairman very much.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, there are two or three relatively brief points I would like to raise with the hon. Minister.

One, I do not hail from Cape Breton, but I have a soft spot in my heart for all the MacDonalds down there and I understand that a growing number of them are becoming unemployed because of the persistent closing of mines and therefore I was puzzled by the comment of the hon. vice-chairman to the effect that the amount of coal that you are getting from Cape Breton is all that can be delivered and that presumably you would get more if more could be delivered.

Could the hon. vice-chairman solve that little mystery for me? Is it a shortage of bottoms?

Mr. Boyer: We have made a contract with the coal interests in Nova Scotia and we understand that this is the limit of what is able to be supplied under the arrangements made between ourselves, public bodies, and the coal interests of Cape Breton.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, unless there is a shortage of boats for bringing it up, it does not add up. However, I will not pursue the matter; it is primarily a Nova Scotian problem.

The vice-chairman referred to the Lakehead plant still being a standby. I recall a great deal of politicking over this plant two or three years ago, when it was discovered that upon completion it was not going to be used because of overestimates in requirements. Overestimates had been gleaned from the various industries because of a change in the whole market relationship.

This was all right for a year or so but I am puzzled by the fact that now when two years have gone by—one year, I am corrected—and there still is not even a normal growth to bring the plant into production. I wonder if the hon. vice-chairman might comment on this. Has there not been a normal growth, the usual normal growth in the consumption of power which might bring this plant into use?

Second, in that connection, on a number of occasions when I have gone to northwestern Ontario I have run into considerable public discussion on the advisability of exporting power to the United States. Admittedly it would have to be on a short-term basis, so that if our needs ever developed this power would be available to meet them; but if it is power developed from water, and if there is a possibility of export, it seems to me that one is just missing a good bet. Because every hour, every day, every week that goes by is an hour or a day or a week lost in terms of production which might be exported to help our balance of trade with the United States. In short, what is the picture in this connection, and has there been any consideration of the possibility of short-term export of power to get that plant into operation?

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Chairman, may I first say that the hon. member appears to refer to me as the "Minister", and I know he did not mean to give me that much higher rank.

I say, sir, that in the northwest region we are exporting power to the United States; but what is exported depends upon the market there. I am sure if there is a requirement, or a request for further power to be supplied, this will be a matter of negotiation and very welcome to us.

There has been a growth, of course, over the past several years in the primary peak requirements in the northwest system. The demand in 1960 was 433,300 kilowatts; this has risen now to 445,500. There is something in what the hon. member for York South has said as to the market expected at the time the decision was made. That would have been, of course, years before the plant was ready for commissioning. Yet withal, I say that this puts the northwest region of our great province in a very favourable position with adequate power resources for many years ahead.

This plant will be in operation, it is expected, within the next year; and I think that all hon. members from the northwest will realize that when they are going out to sell that region as a good location for industry or commercial enterprise, this is one of the great things which they may offer to the world.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I agree with the underlying argument of the last comments of the vice-chairman. This is obviously a point to plug if you are promoting northwestern Ontario. But it is getting to be too much of a luxury when you have a plant, which costs a considerable number of millions of dollars, sitting idle. I would hope, if I conclude correctly from the comments of the hon. vice-chairman, that they would be glad to enter into an agreement if somebody from the American side asked; but does this not mean that you have not done some looking around for the possibility of short-term sales if you have a plant sitting idle? I would also hope—and I am wondering if the hon. vice-chairman would comment on this: Is the prospective expansion of some of the pulp and paper companies at the Lakehead the kind of development which is going to use up a sizeable proportion of the production of this plant?

Mr. Boyer: That is correct, certainly.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, let me turn to a third point I want to raise. This is one which was alluded to earlier. I am a little surprised that the hon. vice-chairman, with his usual efficiency, had not included it in his report. It is the public discussion, which has gone on once again in the Sarnia area, as to the possibility of using natural gas, in that new plant, rather than coal. I understand that we are going to be using something like $8 million worth of coal, all of it imported, in this plant. I would like to have some rather convincing argument and statistics as to why there was not a possibility of using natural gas and perhaps pre-empting, as has been suggested by some of the people locally, the Sombra township storage area for a storage basin to meet the requirements of this plant. What is the picture there?

Mr. Boyer: Well, Mr. Chairman, I did remember that the hon. member for York South spoke of this proposal earlier in the session. At that time, of course, the new thermal generating station which has just lately been announced for the Courtright location on the St. Clair river was only a matter of conjecture; but the hon. member spoke then of the possibilities of a new natural gas pipeline from western Canada coming into Ontario near Sarnia. Of course in that area there are great underground storage areas for natural gas. I take it that the hon. member had representations made to him on behalf of those who are interested in these storage areas. We have also heard from them and this matter has been given study. I may say, too, that we have also held discussions with representatives of the natural gas industry.

In this connection may I say that when preparation was being made, when plans were going ahead for the Courtright plant, Hydro did review the possibilities of using fuels other than coal in this particular plant. Indeed Hydro has done so for all its conventional thermal plants. Accordingly the possibility of using natural gas was considered for this particular plant.

During the last quarter of 1963, in particular, there were discussions with gas suppliers. At that time the conclusion was that the proposal would be uneconomical even for a base load plant. It may be, sir, that further information will become available as to a possible supply of natural gas at a sufficiently low price, yet I can only refer to what is known today.

In Ontario Hydro's planning of thermal generation, it is expected that in the future a large fraction of the energy load growth will be supplied from nuclear generating stations. If this condition obtains, the fossil-fired thermal plants will be used principally to supply peak loads with corresponding reductions in fuel consumption.

I am told, sir, that for technical reasons this type of operation would tend to make gas fueling of such plants even less desirable from the economic standpoint.

Another consideration is probably this: A one-million kilowatt plant would take approximately one-half of the capacity of the Trans-Canada pipeline. As I recall what the hon. member said here in January, he spoke of the prospect of a new line coming from western Canada, through the United States and crossing into Canada at Sarnia. We have not any information about this. We have no idea as to the possibilities of a price that can compete with coal. Nevertheless, I am going to say that as in the past Ontario Hydro will review this matter with the intention of taking any economic advantage should it become available.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, will the vice-chairman state the cost of the generation of electricity by water, by coal and, lastly by atomic energy; the cost of generation per kilowatt hour?

Mr. Boyer: I wonder if I might just say to the hon. member that if he would care to come to the government commissions committee tomorrow morning, there are technical people who will be present who will be able to provide an answer very easily to his question.

Mr. Newman: I prefer to get the information in the House because I asked for information once before from the same hon. member and I did not receive it so I would prefer to have the answer in the House.

Mr. Boyer: I wonder what that information might be?

Mr. Newman: I did not hear the hon. member, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Boyer: I wonder if I might ask the hon. member what that information was that he did not obtain.

Mr. Newman: One year ago I asked a question concerning scholarships that were given to students attending various universities, and the University of Windsor had been left out. I asked the hon. member if he was going to consider seeing that Hydro scholarships were also available at the University of Windsor. At no time did I receive a reply and I thought I was entitled to the courtesy of a reply.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member is entitled to the courtesy of a reply and I will give it now. At the time he made this inquiry it had happened that the personnel department of Ontario Hydro was making a study of the scholarship awards of Ontario Hydro to a certain number of universities in the province and it was realized that the list of universities had grown. The whole subject was a matter for review and accordingly we have decided upon an entirely different plan.

I will not take the time of the House at this hour to go into this exhaustively, but I want to say that we have decided, with the advice of The Ontario Department of Education, to change the system. Instead of scholarships to the same limited number of universities, we will make available a bursary in the amount of $500 each to nine universities, commencing with the academic year of 1964 and 1965. These universities are: University of Toronto, Queen's University, University of Western Ontario, University of Windsor, McMaster University, University of Guelph—which is to be established, University of Waterloo, Carleton University and the University of Ottawa.

Each bursary is to be identified as having been given by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario and is to be awarded to a second-year student in applied science and engineering, in commerce and business administration, or in mathematics and physics at the discretion of the university student aid committee. Each of these universities has been advised of the change and they have accepted this as an arrangement which they prefer and which they think will probably aid young students in their second year to a greater extent than the scholarships plan of the past.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the hon. member for his reply. He could have sent that to me in a letter the same way as every other Minister replies to questions that are asked in the House and are not answered during the course of the debates. This is important. After all we have a university in Windsor and we are entitled to the same consideration that is given to any other university in the province.

An hon. member: What about Laurentian University?

Mr. Newman: Laurentian did not ask. I did ask for it.

Mr. Chairman, the next question of the hon. member is: During the studies for sites of the new thermal electrical plant, I am fairly certain that the community from which I come did not submit any brief, but I noticed that we were turned down. Would the hon. member care to give a reason why they were turned down, because directly across the lake from us is a fairly large American installation—that is the reactor plant at Monroe, Michigan—for the manufacture of electricity by atomic energy.

Now the Essex county area had been turned—

Mr. Boyer: May I point out, Mr. Chairman, that Windsor already has a steam plant?

Mr. Newman: I am not mentioning that. I am simply asking why were they turned down. Was there something wrong with the area? Were they—

Mr. Boyer: I do not follow the hon. member. Who turned who down?

Mr. Newman: The hon. member called it a site for a thermal electrical plant. Now he mentioned earlier in the evening that Windsor was studied as a possible site for that plant and mentioned that it was—

Mr. Boyer: Excuse me, Mr. Chairman, I did not say that.

Mr. Newman: The hon. member did not say that? I will apologize to him, because I understood that he did and wrote it down during the course of his comments.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry if the hon. member misunderstood what I tried to say, but as I recall my statement, I mentioned that there had been a survey of the requirements of the London-Sarnia-Windsor area as to power and arising out of this there was a decision to install a generating station in that part of the province. The present location that has been decided upon at Courtright meets all the engineering requirements and really, the decision has been made on the basis of recommendations by our engineering department.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I do not argue with the location of the present site. The only thing is I understood, wrongly so, that the hon. member had mentioned that Windsor is being studied.

Mr. Troy: The chairman said it was being studied, the chairman of Hydro.

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): You can study anything, you do not have to build—

Mr. Newman: I did not say you had to build a plant at all. I simply tried to point out to you that directly across the lake there is a thermal electrical plant.

The next point, Mr. Chairman, concerns the electrical historical sites. Apparently Hydro is setting up plaques in various parts of the province. May I suggest to the hon. member that he consider one in the Windsor area as the first electrical street railway in the world, if I am not mistaken, was located along the Detroit river in the city of Windsor.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased to learn of this and I would invite the hon. member to get what information he can about the history of the railway. I would ask him if he would be good enough to write me a letter and tell me about it. We are interested in these matters and I already mentioned the museum and, if nothing else, we certainly could include references in the museum to this. But the matter of placing a plaque is also being considered.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I assume the hon. member will provide me with staff to look into this item?

The next, Mr. Chairman, is the importation of inferior electrical appliances into the province. What control is Hydro exercising over this vast flood of electronic equipment that is now plaguing or entering the Canadian market? Much of it is fairly good, but some of it is sub-standard and I doubt if it would pass CSA regulations.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Chairman, this is a matter of much concern to Hydro. The hon. members may have read in the newspapers just lately statements by Ontario Hydro as to the concern we have as to the dangerous appliances which are now coming into Ontario and being sold in our stores. I think I should make the hon. members acquainted with the terms of part of our release.

We have noted that wholesalers who ignore Ontario Electric Safety Regulations are flooding this province with sub-standard radios and other small electric appliances.

Now, this is what the hon. member has said.

Our electrical inspection department has noted that thousands of unapproved appliances are now in use or available at retail outlets. The problem is one which is, perhaps, general in the province. Foreign radio and television sets probably make up the bulk of the appliances which are potentially dangerous, but unapproved toasters, percolators and plug-in bath warmers are also being distributed.

Although all electrical goods displayed, advertised, sold or operated in Ontario must have a seal of approval from the Canadian Standards Association or Ontario Hydro, there are no federal regulations governing safety standards for imported appliances. To assist Hydro's approvals group in coping with the flood of unapproved appliances, 160 inspectors who normally check wiring installations, are devoting part of their time now to checking retail outlets. Store owners are being asked to remove unapproved appliances from their shelves and their co-operation is being asked by Hydro to trace appliances. Reputable foreign manufacturers obtain CSA approval before their appliances are exported. Unapproved appliances, which often do not even bear the name of the manufacturer, are imported by wholesalers who operate from any number of custom bonded warehouses.

I am very glad to bring this matter to the attention of the hon. members and I would ask the co-operation of all hon. members of the House in acquainting the public with the dangers that there may be in using appliances which do not have the proper CSA seal of approval.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, if I may pursue this one step further.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): You have been pursuing it for quite a while.

Mr. Newman: I have only been on my feet for the last three or four questions. You have had all day to speak if you wish. You could have spoken earlier. Mr. Chairman, has the hon. member ever approached the authorities in Ottawa?

Mr. Boyer: No, I do not think I should be the one to approach the authorities in Ottawa.

Mr. Newman: Well, has the hon. member's government attempted to approach the authorities in Ottawa with the hope of putting some type of restrictions on the import of some of this electronic equipment; requiring it as it first enters the country to have a Hydro seal or a CSA seal before it be permitted for sale to the public?

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to hear the hon. member advocate that. I invite him as a citizen of Canada to write a letter to the authorities himself and draw this to the attention of the people at Ottawa. We will do our part, do not ever worry.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, how juvenile can a member get? If the vice-chairman will not come along and undertake to do a thing like that, I think he should step aside and let someone else do it for him.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. vice-chairman a question in regard to what programme Hydro has in regard to enlarging areas a Hydro office will service. Now, in the riding I have the honour to represent, two years ago they closed the Hydro office in the town of Bothwell. Just lately they have notified the town of Ridgetown that their office will be closed in October. Now this programme, if it is a plan by Hydro, strikes a severe blow to these towns that have been notified.

In the town of Ridgetown, which has been notified that their office will be closed in October, it will mean 30 families in that town will maybe move to another area from which the Ridgetown area will be served. Is this a programme of Hydro to continually increase the area in which one Hydro office will service, or has the Ontario Hydro a plan to gradually bring the Hydro offices into the cities of southwestern Ontario? This strikes a severe blow to these towns, to lose their Hydro office, Mr. Vice-Chairman.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has suggested that perhaps the intention is to centralize the area offices in cities. I must say that perhaps the contrary is more exact. These rural operating area offices are for the rural people, really, of the province and I have heard it said that sometimes when it is necessary to make reorganizations that a town, which is under a local commission, feels that somehow or other their service will be reduced. This is not the case, of course. I am very glad to reassure the hon. member for Kent East, that in the adjustments that are made from time to time in the organization of area offices and regions, that every recognition is given to the fact that personnel located in certain places do add to the local economy. I might say this: That in my own part of the country I remember reading—I think it was 24 years ago—where 4 or 5 areas were amalgamated into one with one fell swoop. These days are quite different from that. We have, today, much improved highways. We have communications systems between our trucks—two-way radios. We have far better ways for notifying people of service breakdowns and can have a staff there quickly.

We sometimes have situations where construction work has been completed, in a section of the county, or in some county where they have the very best of electrical service, and then there is not the same need for staff. Consequently, in the interests of good business, we have to look at the possibilities of drawing together a couple of areas.

I want to say that if anything of this sort is done at Ridgetown that this will not mean a removal of the personnel from that area entirely, because it will be necessary to leave there an electrical inspector, the forestry crew and probably a service truck. These will operate under whatever place is chosen to take in a slightly larger area.

I think that all hon. members of the House will realize that we are the same as other utilities—the railways, the telephone company and so on—which have to make their arrangements in the most economical way possible. Hence the matter that the hon. member has raised here tonight. I want to assure him that we want to do our very best for his part of the country.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Vice-Chairman, I would like to ask if we would get a reduced rate if these areas are consolidated.

Mr. Boyer: I think I can say, sir, that these matters will lead to the maintenance of the present low rates we have in this province.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would like to revert to the matter which was raised in a preliminary way by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville. The answer of the vice-chairman of the commission was simply to read a press statement that the commission issued recently and which, I think, most of us have read. I did not hear him indicate anything that either the commission or the government planned to do about this problem of dangerous appliances, as he calls them, which have been imported into the country and put on to the market illegally in Ontario. The hon. member has referred to them as "dangerous" appliances and I think that is an understatement. I would like to quote an article which appeared recently in the Toronto Telegram referring to an interview, or a press conference, with George Milne of the Hydro's inspection department. Mr. Milne is quoted as saying:

—a state of emergency existed with regard to public safety.

He went on to say, with regard to the radios which are illegally on the market, and which I think are considered to be the most dangerous and also the most numerous product:

They have a live chassis and zero safety precautions.

He then went on to say:

If a child were to pull the knobs off this and touch the spindle he would be playing with death, and a person removing tubes for inspection would be electrocuted if he were in contact with a metal sink, radiator or any grounded object.

I would say, Mr. Chairman, that the situation is much more serious than the hon. member's answer would seem to indicate. Mr. Milne is also quoted as saying that the fines of $25 and $50 which have been levied so far are only a licence to operate. I think that comes to the crux of the problem. As I understand the present law, the penalty for displaying or selling appliances which do not carry the CSA or Hydro seal of approval is a fine of between $10 and $50, yet people can make small fortunes out of selling these very dangerous appliances. Naturally they can sell them cheaply but the reason they can sell them cheaply is because they are so dangerous; and a fine of $10 to $50 seems absolutely ridiculous in view of the kind of public danger which these unscrupulous operators create.

Mr. Milne is quoted in the Toronto Telegram as saying: "Jail is the only penalty stiff enough for those who knowingly sell appliances which could kill innocent children or the teenagers likely to buy cheap radios." And I would agree with him if that is an accurate summary of what he said. I think a jail sentence is quite in order for a person who would do this sort of thing, especially for more than one offence; but if these fellows can sell these dangerous appliances illegally, then go down to court and pay $50 and come back and start doing it all over again, I think we will have considerable trouble clearing the situation up. As Mr. Milne also pointed out in a story in the Toronto Globe and Mail:

With electrical appliances sold in almost all types of retail outlets from drug stores to grocerias, it has become impossible to police the sales adequately.

That being so, the one way to discourage unscrupulous people from trying to make a quick buck this way is to make it very dangerous for them to operate.

I had hoped that when the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville first raised the question, the vice-chairman of the commission would have announced some sort of policy the government planned to take; but all he did was just read a press release from Hydro calling attention to the seriousness of the problem.

Does the government plan to do anything about it or not? If so, Mr. Chairman, what do they plan to do?

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member started off by saying that nothing was being done. The government did not seem to have any policy, and Ontario Hydro did not seem to have any policy, and so forth—and then, at the end of his remarks, he advised the House that evidently there are fines being imposed on these people—

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I did not say any of those things.

Mr. Boyer: I am going to point out—

Mr. Bryden: Point of order, Mr. Chairman.

I really would suggest to the hon. member that he contributes nothing to the discussion by his deliberate misquotation of what I said. I did not make any of the statements he attributed to me. I stated merely that his answer was to quote from a press release from Hydro, and that was not an adequate answer.

Mr. Boyer: I do not think that is a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Bryden: I did not say that Hydro was not doing anything. I did not say that anybody was not doing anything. I was asking what they were doing, and I would suggest the hon. member take it from there and indicate if you are doing anything.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Chairman, I think that the hon. member is rather excited and, in making his speech, he overlooked the fact that I had advised the House what Hydro was doing. I called attention to the fact that he indicated to us that nothing was being done and we had no policy; and then he came down at the end of his address and referred to fines which had already been imposed.

I suggest that we are on the trail of people who are bringing these unapproved articles into our province. I have already said that 160 inspectors who normally check wiring installations are devoting part of their time to checking retail outlets.

The hon. member for Woodbine, Mr. Chairman, has also read to us an item about live-chassis radio sets and so forth. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that an endeavour is being made, in connection with some of these articles, to prosecute people who are supplying them under the Criminal Code of Canada. We regard this as a very serious matter but I would point out that Ontario is the province which has adopted the Canadian Standards Association requirements in approving appliances. As far as I know, we are the only province which has done this, and this is intended for the safety of our people. That is the type of thing we are doing, and we are following this up with inspections and are on the trail of these people.

Who called attention to this matter? It was Ontario Hydro, because we were concerned about it in the province today.

Mr. Bryden: Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, after all that diversion, we can get to the question I asked. I will try to put it in the simplest possible terms for the benefit of the hon. vice-chairman of the commission.

I quoted an officer of Hydro's own inspection department, who said that the penalties are not adequate. I quite concede, I did not deny, I did not even suggest, that Hydro was not doing what it can within the terms of existing law. It has put a large number of inspectors to work on this job. I realize that. The hon. vice-chairman has already said it; I did not think it was necessary to repeat it. They have taken people to court; they have secured convictions; but, as Mr. Milne, who I take it is the man in charge of this operation has said, the fines of $25 and $50 which have been levied so far are only a licence to operate. This is the point, and I would suggest that until the hon. vice-chairman is prepared to give us an answer on this point he is just evading the whole issue.

Is the government prepared to do anything? Has it any plans to impose penalties or to provide for penalties that will genuinely discourage this sort of thing? I have no doubt that the Hydro inspectors are doing everything possible. It is a difficult job apparently, but are you going to change the law so that when they get the evidence on somebody they will get a conviction which means something?

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Chairman, I was promised I would be asked a very simple question, but I think there was so much embroidery added to it that I could follow all of what may be in the hon. member's mind.

I say that this matter involves customs, regulations and so forth. It involves law, the law of our country. I do not think that I am the appropriate person to stand in this House and deal with matters having to do with law enforcement in this province. But I can tell you what we are trying to do in Ontario Hydro, is to call to the attention of the public the dangers that are in these unauthorized appliances. We are following it up in the courts of the land. As I mentioned already, Mr. Chairman, we are endeavouring to prosecute under the Criminal Code in certain instances.

I do not think it is required of me to say more than that.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that it is and I will put the question again. The penalties provided in our laws are stated to be inadequate. Now this surely is not a great, deep, metaphysical problem; the penalties are inadequate. The government has it within its power to bring in amendments to the law to make the penalties adequate, so is it prepared to do that or is it not? Or is it just going to let this situation carry on?

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, it is too bad we do not have some of these appliances around here tonight, we might put a plug in some of these people.

Now, the hon. vice-chairman of Hydro said, in an answer to a question of the hon. member for Woodbine, that he could not answer it; we have the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) here tonight—

Mr. Bryden: And the hon. Prime Minister—is he unconcerned about this?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, if we knew whether this was the Criminal Code where the penalty is too small, or if it is a statute of Ontario over which one has control—

Mr. Bryden: Does the hon. Prime Minister not know the regulations?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I do not know.

Mr. Bryden: Does the hon. Prime Minister mean to say that you people over there have not been paying any attention to this problem that your Hydro people have been up against?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I have sat and listened to this entire debate, if you may dignify it by such a term.

Mr. Bryden: I will venture a suggestion to the hon. Prime Minister, who is a lawyer, and to his hon. Attorney General beside him. If they take a look at it they will find it is a matter provided for in the laws of Ontario. I would suggest that they might at least take a look at it and see if it is. If it is then consider remedies that can be taken in this House.

I really cannot understand why we have this evasion of an issue. Why can the government not just come in with a bill to tighten the law up?

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): I listened to the hon. member for Woodbine, and as he read the article from which he quoted, it seemed to me that what he said was that the penalties which were being imposed by the courts were inadequate. Now I must confess that having no notice of this question, I have not had an opportunity to look up the section under which these charges are laid. They may be Ontario law, they may very possibly be the Criminal Code. But what very often happens, and we are often faced with this situation, is that a magistrate in a court and magistrates in various courts have different ideas of penalties. I think the article which the hon. member read said that the penalties which the courts were imposing were inadequate—

Mr. Bryden: The maximum penalty under the law is $50.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Fifty dollars! And the penalties which the hon. member read were being imposed were $20 and $25.

Mr. Bryden: Twenty-five dollars and $50.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: So that at least the magistrate could have gone considerably higher.

Mr. Bryden: They have gone to $50 which is as far as they can go. The problem should be studied with a view to providing a heavier penalty.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would be glad to do that. I would suggest to the hon. member that a $50 penalty may not be adequate and I think it is well to be brought to the attention of the House so that legislation may be brought about to increase it. But quite often you have a $50 maximum and a magistrate imposes a $20, or $5 or $10 penalty. This is a situation you face quite often.

Mr. Bryden: I realize that, but I do not think this is the problem here, Mr. Chairman. However, I would be very happy if the hon. Attorney General would look into it. He has the facilities to do that and if he could see fit to make a statement at a later time I think everyone would be satisfied.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, I have some questions.

I refer to the question of the hon. member for Windsor - Walkerville of the hon. vice-chairman, in which he said that they had not considered sites in the Windsor area. I notice that the Ontario Hydro chairman, in his report to the district taken from Hydro News, that Mr. Strike revealed that a number of sites in the Windsor, London, Sarnia areas have been investigated. Arrangements are under way, he said, for studies and soil investigation tests in an area near Courtright and he also announced that London Public Utilities Commission indicated a site at Port Stanley was available. So I presume that the Windsor area was also considered.

Mr. Chairman, in regard to a contract, clearing of wooded lands in the townships of Conger, Freeman, Gibson and Baxter, the successful tender for this contract was the Fowler Construction Company Limited of Bracebridge, at slightly over $200 per acre. It just happens that the successful tenderer comes from the home town of the vice-chairman, but I do not say that fact has anything to do with the awarding of the contract.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): No, no, the hon. member did not even think of it.

Mr. Troy: No, I said I did not think so. But I wanted to ask this question: It says of the total number of 15 tenders received this was the lowest meeting tendering conditions. Might I ask how many of the 15 tenderers met the tendering conditions and what was their price breakdown? I do not need them now, I can get them later.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Chairman, I would not know how many met the tendering conditions, but I think there were two firms which evidently did not meet them. I remember in particular about this matter, that one group that tendered did not submit any list of equipment, any financial statement, any record of experience and so forth.

But I am not able to answer a question as to how many of the others might not have met the tendering requirements. The main thing is that they all quoted above the firm that was successful in tendering. I might say it is a firm that quite often bids on public works, and performs satisfactorily and indeed in this area had experience in clearing the right-of-way for Highway 103 through exactly the same country involved in the bid on the work of clearing through Conger, Freeman, Gibson and Baxter.

I think that is all I need to say. I assure you, if you need any assurance, that it was entirely coincidence—

Mr. Troy: Oh I know that!

Mr. Boyer: —that this firm was located in the same area in which I live.

Mr. Troy: The press have recognized that too. May I ask the vice-chairman what you spend annually on this programme you have advertising "Live Better Electrically" on radio and TV and through the press?

Mr. Boyer: I do not believe that I am able to give the figure at the moment, sir. Perhaps that is one of the questions we might deal with tomorrow. In any event, I do not know that I am too anxious to reveal to our committee the monetary extent of our programme.

Mr. Troy: The reason that I ask, is that you are using this advertising programme and as you get more and more that subscribe to it and then become users because of that programme, it means more and more plants have to be developed, more and more costly plants. As I pointed out this afternoon, on another subject, as you come in the buildings, you find that it says—

Mr. MacDonald: The Liberals once again, they want Hydro to go down rather than up.

Mr. Troy: —that coal is very expensive and Hydro is not available, so then possibly some other—well you talked about gas yourself, you were promoting it.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Troy: You were discussing it, Mr. Vice-Chairman. Does Hydro tender its capital work, or does Hydro do all its own construction?

Mr. Boyer: I take it that the hon. member wants me to speak on the matter of tendering, or contracting out?

Mr. Troy: Yes, because Public Works say they save money by contracting out.

Mr. Boyer: Well, we think that there should be, perhaps, a combination of the two methods. It is quite often asked—in fact there have been articles in the daily press this winter—as to our policy in this respect. Some people think that Ontario Hydro does not contract out enough of its work. But on the other hand, our non-management employees, through their unions, have often requested that there be no contracting out clauses in their contract. Now, I can summarize our policy.

It is a judicious combination of contractors and our own forces to achieve Ontario Hydro's construction programme objectives with the maximum economy. The percentage of work assigned to contractors varies from time to time as the nature and extent of the work load changes. On a current project, over 40 per cent of direct construction work has been contracted. All conventional construction work, such as office buildings, service centres, operators' houses, colony community buildings and the like are carried out under contract.

Tenders are also called for certain construction elements associated with transformer and distributing stations. A major transmission line has been built under contract in the past year. I might also add that, generally, road construction and earth-moving work required by Ontario Hydro is performed under contract. Hydro does not manufacture any equipment and the installation of all major equipment is on a contract basis.

In 1963, of all projects about one-third was contracted out. This figure applies to the total work programme, including substantial amounts of specialized line and station work which would be found impractical to contract in a programme so complex. Ontario Hydro's experience bears out that its policy is very satisfactory. Hydro does not agree with those who say that it would be more economical to have all construction work done by outside people. In fact, in a programme that is as varied and as large as Ontario Hydro's, it would be most undesirable and uneconomic to follow such a course. It is believed that many of the contractors who say Ontario Hydro should not do its own work lack an understanding of the nature of the programme. That is not to say that the other extreme of a total do-it-yourself approach would be economical either since Ontario Hydro is aware that certain work is more economically provided by contractors during periods of strong competition.

Mr. Troy: May I ask the vice-chairman what is the basic wage per hour for a common labourer at Hydro?

Mr. Boyer: I wonder if I might ask the hon. member for Nipissing if he would care to put that question at the government commissions committee meeting in the morning?

Mr. Troy: And I will also ask about the difference in wage levels of your engineering staff compared to the engineers in other branches of the civil service.

Now, one final question. Has the Atomic Energy Control Board yet given approval to Ontario Hydro to erect an atomic powered plant, similar to the Douglas Point plant, on Lake Ontario near Frenchman's Bay or Clarkson? Did you get that approval?

Mr. Boyer: Well, sir, I do not think we have made application for that as yet.

Mr. Troy: Well, it is rather strange that the chairman—

Mr. Boyer: I think that perhaps there was a misunderstanding of the chairman's statement. I think perhaps the chairman's views, as expressed at the time they appeared in the paper, were actually not properly presented in the article that subsequently appeared. I think what the chairman was trying to do was to explain the different attitudes there may be to the location of a plant of this nature close to a settled community as compared with earlier thoughts on this subject. Therefore he mentioned a particular location. That is not to say we have made any application for approval of this site.

Mr. Troy: It was discussed at length all over the province six or seven months ago. Do you mean to tell me you have not even applied yet?

Mr. Boyer: That is right.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, back at the beginning of the session, I put a question on the order paper to which an answer was provided on March 3. Since the answer, in my opinion, leaves much to be desired, I would like to pursue the matter a little further now. The question was as follows:

1. Has the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario acquired title to the lands described as the "remaining lands" in the agreement between Dimensional Investments Limited and the commission, dated March 11, 1959?

2. If so, (a) what amounts were paid for the said land, (b) when and (c) to whom?

3. If not, what steps are being or have been taken to acquire title to these lands?

Now the answer to the first question, asking if Hydro has acquired title, was "not yet".

This is only five years later, but the answer is "not yet."

The second question, asking amounts and so on is answered as follows: "Answered by 1."

The third question, asking what steps are being or have been taken to acquire title to these lands, was answered as follows:

The action in the Supreme Court of Ontario by Ontario Hydro against Dimensional Investments is not yet concluded.

Now, I am going to suggest to the vice-chairman of the commission, that that answer has nothing to do with my question at all. I believe that Hydro did launch an action against Dimensional Investments—for what purpose I am not sure—at least two years ago. I think it may have been even longer than that.

Now, sir, I am surprised that nothing has come of the action yet. But in any case, the action could not possibly produce the lands concerned for Hydro because Dimensional Investments does not own the lands, and never did own them. Hydro paid Dimensional Investments for them, but Dimensional Investments never at any time had title to these lands. Thus this reference to an action in the Supreme Court of Ontario has no relevance to the question that I asked.

The question that I asked is, what are you doing to get these lands? A large sum of money was paid—I cannot remember now how much it was—five years ago, for a substantial amount of property on an Indian reserve near Sarnia. The Hydro never did get all of the land involved. There are two small parcels extending across two of the—well, one of them across an existing power line which cannot, therefore, be developed beyond its present level. The other extends across a strip of land that was bought for the purpose of a new power line, but no power line can be built there because there is a strip 100 yards wide or so that goes right across it and the Hydro has no right of way or anything else over this land now.

This is certainly a serious situation. I would like to know if Hydro has any prospect of ever getting those two strips across two of these legs in the packages of land they bought. Certainly a court action against Dimensional will not get the land since Dimensional never did have it.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Chairman, I think I can say nothing more beyond the reply which has already been given and which was placed on the order paper and answered accordingly. As to whether we think we have a prospect of getting this land, I think we have. We certainly trust that this is the case.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, could the hon. member explain how he hopes to get land from somebody who does not have it?

Mr. Boyer: The hon. member has taken the opportunity to place on the record his thoughts on this subject and I think that we will have to leave it at that. I cannot answer any more than has been answered already in this House.

Mr. Bryden: What he means is that he is not going to get this land.

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): How do you know?

Mr. Bryden: I spent a great deal of time studying the Dimensional deal.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: How do you know?

Mr. Bryden: I know—

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Did they buy it?

Mr. Bryden: They did not buy it, no.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: They might, though.

Mr. Bryden: On what basis are they going to buy it? The whole reason why Dimensional did not get title and did not hand over title to Hydro was that the Indian who was the locatee on the land was holding them up and will hold them up until the cows come home. They are never going to get it from him.

An hon. member: There are no cows down there.

Mr. Chairman: This concludes the estimates of The Department of Energy and Resources Management.

Mr. MacDonald: Are we having ONR tomorrow? We have not had the ONR as yet.

Mr. Chairman: I am advised that there is no vote for the ONR and I was not given—

Mr. MacDonald: Now just a minute, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chairman: —anything other than Hydro, besides the votes, to be considered.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I thought it was clearly understood that details with regard to ONR were going to be considered under the estimates of this department.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I think if the hon. members want to debate the report that was tabled in the House last week, we will ask the committee on government commissions to give us a date and we can go back there and debate it at that time.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, this is a deliberate violation of the understanding of what was going to be the order of business in this House. We have been before the committee twice already and as far as I am concerned I had all of the report that the hon. Minister has now got at that time.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: That is right.

Mr. MacDonald: So that this is not the case. It is a case of debating this in the House. It was our clear understanding; I spoke of it in the introduction. As a matter of fact, the hon. member, the acting chairman, was going to comment at that time but I left the detailed questions till later.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, all sorts of things have happened since this report. This is to December 31, 1963. We are having a complete change in the operation of the ONR.

Mr. Chairman: Order! The Minister has made a statement and I do not see any place in any of the votes—

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Prime Minister said so. He said we could debate the ONR—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, we can find a place if this is to be discussed in the House. I was not here when this procedure was established.

In any event we have always been able to find an opportunity to debate anything we think needs debating in the House. Now, it may be if there is nothing in the estimates covering Ontario Northland Railway, we can very easily list on the order paper the report that is here in the House and call it for debate and debate it.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, debate is not what we are looking for. We have many chances to debate. What we are looking for is an opportunity to question and get some answers in view of the fast developing situation with the ONR. I thought we had an understanding that all of these agencies were going to be reporting through certain of the estimates and certainly my recollection is that the hon. Prime Minister indicated that both the ONR and Hydro would be reporting to

The Department of Energy and Resources Management.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: If I made such an undertaking, of course I will carry it out. In any event, I suggest that the committee now rise and report progress.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that the committee of supply rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report progress and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow I would like to go to the order paper for second readings that need to be dealt with in order that those bills may go to committee. There are a good many second readings and also there are some second readings of other public bills and orders with which we may deal. I assume most of these have been on the order paper for some time and you are ready to deal with them. There are some resolutions as well. I have marked here number two, number nine and number ten in the resolutions with which we might deal. Number seven, I would say, has been dealt with today. Some of these have been dealt with in the general debates and in the estimates that have taken place.

In any event, among the other motions under part three of the order paper notices, I would say we will call number two, number nine and number ten. We will feel free to call any of the second readings that are on the order paper and then I will arrange with you, if we can do both, to hold the debate on the Ontario Northland Railway.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11.20 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 22, 1964

The House met at 2 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are always pleased to have visitors to the Legislature and today we welcome, as guests in the west gallery, students from School Area No. 2, Waterloo township.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Mr. D. A. Evans (Simcoe Centre), from the standing committee on labour, legal and municipal bills, presented the committee's sixth report which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bill without amendment:

Bill No. 64, An Act to set aside a certain tax sale of land in the township of Herschel for the relief of Wallace Bullied and Norah Bullied.

Your committee begs to report the following bills with certain amendments:

Bill No. 60, An Act to amend The Assessment Act.

Bill No. 62, An Act to amend The Department of Municipal Affairs Act.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of bills.

THE ONTARIO WATER RESOURCES COMMISSION ACT

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Ontario Water Resources Commission Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of these amendments is to strengthen the administration of the Ontario Water Resources Commission. A complete explanation will be given on later readings.

THE ONTARIO HURRICANE RELIEF FUND ACT, 1955

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Ontario Hurricane Relief Fund Act, 1955.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, every hon. member of this House will recall with sorrow the disastrous results of Hurricane Hazel which devastated this area for two days in October of 1954. My constituency of York West was particularly hard hit by the hurricane and I vividly remember the astounding loss of life and property damage which was left in its wake.

As a result of this disaster, a public fund was subscribed and a portion of this fund was subsequently turned over to the Workmen's Compensation Board to be administered under The Ontario Hurricane Relief Fund Act, which was passed in the Legislature in 1955. These funds, in the amount of $169,470, were to be used by the board for the purpose of providing assistance to the widows, orphans, and dependent children of those who lost their lives as a result of Hurricane Hazel. The Act stipulated that the relief and assistance was to be paid in accordance with the terms of The Workmen's Compensation Act as it then was.

In accordance with the agreement, entered into between the Workmen's Compensation Board and the Ontario Hurricane Relief Fund, which was a corporation set up for the purpose of administering donations received, periodic revaluations of the funds on hand have been carried out. Certain of the widows have remarried and are thus no longer in receipt of pensions. The situation has therefore been created where the assets in the fund are somewhat in excess of liabilities.

There is presently sufficient money in the fund to permit all pensions to orphans and dependent children to be increased to the present standard under existing legislation contained in The Workmen's Compensation Act. Under the legislation passed in the last session, pensions were increased for children to $40 per month. This bill is designed to bring the pensions of children receiving benefits under this special fund up to this amount.

This bill further gives the Workmen's Compensation Board the power to continue payments to these children so long as they remain in school or in some educational institute. It must be emphasized that the funds with which this bill deals are not the regular funds handled by the Workmen's Compensation Board, but rather are funds received through donations made at the time of Hurricane Hazel.

THE DEPARTMENT OF UNIVERSITY AFFAIRS

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to establish The Department of University Affairs.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to introduce another bill and then I will comment on both of them at once.

ONTARIO UNIVERSITIES CAPITAL AID CORPORATION

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to incorporate the Ontario Universities Capital Aid Corporation.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, it is with some pleasure that I introduce these two bills concerning the universities of our province. As there is a change in government policy here, I will make a fairly full statement. I am going to table this afternoon the report of the advisory committee on university affairs. Next week we will be dealing with the estimates of The Department of Education and I think we might at that time debate what is in these bills. It will fall within the context of those estimates and the sums which are being voted for the universities. Between now and then hon. members will have an opportunity to examine these bills.

As all hon. members of the House are aware, the interest and involvement of the government of Ontario in university matters dates back to our beginnings as a province. Over this 170-year period the nature of the relationship between the government and the universities has varied considerably. Through the greater part of the period it has been customary for the universities, through their officials, to deal directly with the Prime Minister and/or the Minister of Education in their relationships with the government. At some times, particularly during the last century and the early part of this century, it was a common practice to appoint special committees, and indeed Royal commissions were appointed on occasion, to handle specific questions and suggest courses of action and particular plans and programmes in regard to the affairs of our universities. The last such commission reported on university finances in 1921.

In more recent times, it has become apparent that with the complexities of university education, emphasized by the rapid growth in enrolments, the government, in order to deal adequately and equitably with our institutions of higher learning, required sound, experienced advice on a more continuous basis than the previous basis of appointing various ad hoc committees and commissions when they were required.

As early as the 1940s, Dr. R. C. Wallace, a retired principal of Queen's University, and following him, Dr. J. G. Althouse, chief director of education for the province, were asked to undertake the work of co-ordinating our university efforts and the task of advising the government on the appropriate forms of action the government should take in regard to the universities.

As the university question grew beyond that, a technical committee was the next organization. It was made up of senior civil servants, and undertook similar responsibilities. As a result of their efforts, a more detailed procedure for gathering and analyzing the relevant information, was developed as a basis for the allocation of grants. At the same time the universities were encouraged to undertake a very considerable programme of expansion in order to provide for the young people who, it was evident then, were going to be knocking at the doors.

Early in 1961, it was felt that the committee would benefit from the provision of representation from outside the government, and the advisory committee on university affairs was established. I might say that this committee has rendered some remarkable service, and has overseen the most dramatic increases in government assistance to universities in the history of our province.

It has met on a regular basis with the senior officials and governors of each university to whom we make grants, to review their requests for operating grants, for capital grants and for special grants and its recommendations to the government concerning these matters have been the result of careful analysis and study, all of which is related to these factors I mention.

This committee, in the course of its deliberations and duties, has taken the unprecedented step of calling together the presidents of all the provincially assisted universities to discuss matters of common concern and to discuss with them areas where there was a particular need. During the past few months, the committee has also conducted a similar meeting with the chairmen of the boards of governors of the universities, and with the members of those boards who are handling finance for the universities.

Very important questions have been examined carefully by this committee and, as a result, specific forms of action have been recommended to the government. To give you some examples of what these areas have been: The extended graduate programme, the Ontario new universities library project and the Ontario graduate fellowship programme are cases in point.

These are but a few of the notable accomplishments which this committee has carried out in the relatively brief period of time in which it has functioned and not too many words of praise can be said on behalf of the very dedicated citizens of our province who have rendered service as members of this committee.

During the period of time in which this advisory committee has operated, as in the preceding years, the officials of The Department of Education have carried out the necessary administrative tasks required. Here, too, exceptional service has been given. But it has become increasingly clear in the light of the rapidly expanding enrolments at our universities, the truly fantastic developments in higher education, and the significant increases in both the actual and relative contributions of the province to our universities that the current organization could only be regarded as another step in the evolution of government-university relationships.

Over the last four years, for instance, total provincial grants to our universities have risen from $29 million to over $100 million. Questions and issues related to university growth have increased not only in number of problems, but in the complexity of the problems themselves. Problems, which not long ago could be adequately dealt with by an annual review, now require continuous liaison and more frequent discussion. They must be dealt with on a continuing basis rather than being gathered together and dealt with at one time in the year.

Increasingly in recent months, the advisory committee has found itself in a position that required it to undertake executive functions, a responsibility which the members were reluctant to assume and a responsibility which really could not, in all fairness, be given to them. At the same time, once its recommendations were made and accepted by the government, it found that it lacked in many instances, the necessary staff to implement them effectively.

Therefore, it has become evident, that what is required is a full-time organization that can deal adequately with the numerous and complex problems associated with higher education—and deal with it on a continuous basis. The advisory committee was the first body to draw the matter to our attention and we concur with their observations in this regard. It is our feeling that a full-time Department of University Affairs will meet the needs of this situation, as I have sketched them here, and it is the next logical step in the development of our university-government relations. We are encouraged in this attitude by the favourable response we have received from university officials across the province since the government's decision to establish such a department was announced in the Speech from the Throne.

It is also our feeling, in the light of the already large and significant contributions it has rendered, we must continue to derive the benefit of the experience, the insight and the wise counsel of the advisory committee on university affairs. It is our decision, therefore, that this organization will continue to function and to advise the government on university matters. In order that the heavy load of responsibility befalling individual members may be somewhat reduced, we have decided to increase the size of the committee's membership. This will allow us not only to draw on the services of other outstanding persons, but will allow us to avail ourselves of a greater totality, if I may put it that way, of the knowledge within our community in dealing with university matters. In continuing to function, of course, the advisory committee will have available all the facilities of this new Department of University Affairs, which will serve as its administrative arm.

Now, I would repeat here, Mr. Speaker, what I have said on many other occasions in this House, that in no way is it our intention as a government to interfere with the traditional areas of academic freedom that are possessed by our universities, or the freedoms in which they have grown up and developed over the years. The creation of this new department will not change that fundamental policy of government in any way whatsoever. However, there are areas of common concern, especially as they relate to university expansion and financing. It is only through the fullest type of co-operative effort that the solution to the problems related to these matters will be found. The duties of The Department of University Affairs, as I shall presently outline them, will be carried out in the full spirit of such co-operation.

The new department will, of course, be required to undertake a number of very important responsibilities. It will be the agency of government through which we shall maintain day-to-day communication with our universities. At the same time the department will be asked to work closely with the universities in finding answers to some of the important problems which we face in the years ahead. For example, we must undertake some very fundamental studies as to per student costs, both as they relate to operating and capital requirements, and as they apply to the various faculties and schools of our universities.

We need further analysis of university enrolments and we need continued projections of enrolments so that we are at all times aware of the extent of our future needs. We need an examination of the whole field of student aid, so that we may be assured that we have the most effective programmes and that no deserving student lacks the financial resources to continue in higher education if he is able. It is contemplated that a very careful look will be taken at possible areas of co-ordination and co-operation among our universities. In addition, attempts will be made to determine the needs for residential accommodation on the various campuses of our province. We must also give thought as to the methods by which both private citizens and industry might be encouraged to give greater support to our universities.

We must do research, investigation and study into the relationship between the work of the universities in regard to all other forms of higher education. At the same time, on a continuing basis, we must pay attention to developments in other jurisdictions so that we may benefit, not only from ideas developed ourselves, but from ideas that are being developed in this field in other countries, in other states and in other parts of the world.

As a result of these studies and the extensive experience gained from past relationships with our universities, consideration will be given by the department to devising new procedures for the payment of grants to our universities. We wish to develop here procedures which will be recognized as equitable by all concerned.

At the same time the department will be asked to develop, in co-operation with the universities, methods of ensuring that full value in terms of higher education and in terms of services provided to students will be derived from the vast amounts of public money that will be required to be spent in this area in the next few years. The new department will administer all provincial grants paid to the universities and will maintain a constant scrutiny of the procedures and administrative methods by which this is carried out so that necessary changes in approach can be made when they are required.

Further, in relation to assistance for capital projects, the new department will work in close co-operation with the Ontario Universities Capital Aid Corporation, which is established by the other bill introduced this afternoon. All submissions for capital assistance will be made to The Department of University Affairs and on the recommendation of the Minister the capital aid corporation will purchase debentures in amounts approved for each project. Procedures will be developed to allow detailed discussion between officials of the department and each university regarding proposed building plans on an individual and year-round basis.

In other words, we will have a continuing process whereas in the past it tended to develop into an annual matter dealt with just prior to budget time. With these arrangements, the financing, the capitalizing of construction and so on, can be planned month to month and year to year on a year-round basis.

It is contemplated that the new department, making use of findings from previously mentioned studies, will work with the university officials in developing sound plans for the co-ordination of future expansion in the various faculties, schools and courses. In this way we will be able to eliminate unnecessary duplication of facilities and at the same time we will be able to ensure that no particular area of need is left without provision or no area of education is left undeveloped. We hope, too, that we can develop programmes of co-operation in the purchase and use of various teaching materials and equipment and in this way we can spread the benefits further and at the same time, also spread the cost also on a more realistic basis.

The Department of University Affairs will administer all major programmes of government aid to students thus ensuring that these programmes are fully co-ordinated. At the same time it will work in co-operation with other agencies and institutions which conduct programmes in this field in an attempt, once again, to avoid unnecessary duplication of effort. The department will review all proposed legislation regarding universities, will make recommendations regarding same and from time to time, as the situation requires it, the department will devise and recommend to the government special programmes to meet particular needs.

In this regard I would once again mention to hon. members the Ontario graduate fellowship programme, the Ontario new universities library project and the special fund for temporary accommodation, all of which are special programmes designed to meet certain special needs. All of these have originated within the present organization as I have sketched it, and all of them are functioning successfully. We certainly believe there will be need for similar special functions in the future.

Finally, as I have already mentioned, the department will be asked to serve as the administrative agency for the advisory committee on university affairs and will carry out such other duties as are necessary and as the government may decide are required.

To carry out this extensive list of responsibilities it is planned that the most capable staff we can find will be acquired and organized into a tight but effective organization. Immediately this department is approved in the House, the acquisition of personnel will commence.

Now I can only say that education, as I think we are all aware, is one of the most important areas of responsibility befalling this province. In the last 20 years we have worked very successfully to meet the demands of increased numbers, and changes in programmes brought about population shifts, as a result of changes in our society and our economic life. Our efforts to date in meeting the demands created by this situation have been successful. It is our desire and our wish that we should face the future requirements of the universities with confidence in the knowledge that we are building upon the foundation of the past and that is why I have sketched for hon. members today how this is really an evolutionary process culminating at this time in this department. We believe that it will be an effective organization to carry on adequately for all of our young people.

In regard to the second bill, The Ontario Universities Capital Aid Corporation Act, this bill authorizes the establishment of a Crown corporation under this name whose purpose will be to assist Ontario universities in the financing of an extensive capital construction programme to accommodate the anticipated influx of young people seeking higher education. I am not going to mention the magnitude of this expansion, this will be debated later. I think it is sufficient to say this afternoon that we do face a very, very large increase in the enrolment of our universities and this naturally entails that we must face also extensive expansion of facilities in order to accommodate them, not only on the campuses of our established universities, but on universities yet to be built.

From the point of view of finances, I could just say this: by the estimates of the universities themselves, the provincially assisted universities in the province will spend in excess of $260 million on capital construction during the period 1964 to 1967, and of course we may expect that the assistance of this government will be required to finance a very substantial part of that programme. Thus it becomes apparent that the former system of providing capital construction grants out of current tax revenue on the basis I have sketched here, cannot and should not be continued.

What we really need is a sound method which will spread the cost over a period of years so that we may meet the emergency when we have to really spend a great deal of money in a short time. In addition we need some method of financing this construction which will permit these projects to be spread over a period of time, to be spread, as I have already said, throughout the whole period of the year rather than be dealt with once a year. The methods we have devised will take the form of this corporation.

The objects of the corporation will be to purchase from the universities, bonds and debentures issued by them for capital construction projects that have been approved and have been processed through The Department of University Affairs as I have outlined. Also subject to the approval of the Lieutenant-Governor in council, the corporation will be empowered to borrow, or raise by way of loan, such sums as the corporation deems requisite in carrying out its purposes. It will consist of five members appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in council and subject to the regulations, it will be under the management and control of its members, and it will function and be responsible to the Provincial Treasurer of the province.

Mr. Speaker, that is in essence the broad purpose of these two pieces of legislation which I am introducing this afternoon.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the hon. Prime Minister if this is to be a new portfolio of government or a department within a department?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: No, it is a new department.

Mr. Oliver: Within an existing department?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: No, not within an existing department. It is a completely new department.

Mr. Oliver: Will it have a Minister of its own?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It will have a Minister, yes.

Mr. Oliver: Who is the Minister?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I will announce who the Minister will be in due course.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the hon. Prime Minister a question, particularly for our guidance in handling this aspect of university affairs during the debate on the estimates? My question is: How much of post-secondary education is going to come within the jurisdiction of The Department of University Affairs or, more specifically, will institutions such as OCE and Ryerson come under this department?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: No. Mr. Speaker, at the present time the intent is that this will deal exclusively with the universities as we understand them. In other words, we do not intend to disturb the existing relationship between OCE and The Department of Education, and the development of our institutes of technology.

As I said in regard to the procedure of this, we can have a complete debate rather than—I can call second reading of these bills if this is necessary to observe the formalities during the estimates of The Department of Education, but because the matters are so closely interlocked I think they would be more efficiently debated during the estimates of the department.

THE PUBLIC HOSPITALS ACT

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Public Hospitals Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to authorize the making of loans for construction of hospitals or additions thereto, and to permit of the drawing of regulations to govern the conditions, amounts, terms, and so on.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): I have a question, Mr. Speaker, for the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman). He has had notice of it. Would the hon. Minister comment on the fight which occurred recently in a dormitory of the Guelph Reformatory, when approximately ten inmates were admitted to the reformatory hospital for treatment—the word “admitted” of course being in the sense of entered.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to accommodate the hon. member in commenting on an alleged incident at the Guelph Reformatory.

I have with me a statement from the superintendent, Mr. Charles Sanderson, which reads as follows:

During the eight years I have been superintendent at the Guelph Reformatory, there has never been a fight in a dormitory or elsewhere in the institution which has necessitated the hospitalization of ten inmates or even as many as three.

Of recent months, fights have been very infrequent. Upon no occasion have there been more than two or three inmates involved and upon no occasion has more than one inmate required medical attention.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, there is not a tittle of truth in the allegation which is inherent in the question the hon. member has asked.

However, having been invited by the hon. member to make some comment, I would like to take this opportunity to appeal to him to be more circumspect in the future in the use of allegations which could do a great deal of harm to the corrective work in our institutions. I appreciate that the hon. member has been assigned by his party to be their critic of my department, and I also recognize that it is his right—indeed his duty, as it is of all hon. members of this House—to probe the administration of the government and to criticize, where they feel such criticism is warranted. Nevertheless, there is a great degree of responsibility attached to that right and that duty.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Would the member state his point of order?

Mr. Young: I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if this is an answer to the question. He is commenting on the question of my duties!

Mr. Speaker: I might inform the member that he asked the Minister to comment and did not ask a specific question. He asked him to comment.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: To proceed, Mr. Speaker.

Nevertheless, there is a great degree of responsibility attached to that right and that duty. It seems to me that, unless an hon. member has good reason to believe that the government or any of its officials has been derelict in their responsibilities in a specific situation, he should be most careful in making such allegations. May I suggest to the hon. member that there are many deleterious side-effects which could result from spreading unconfirmed reports about correctional institutions.

Mr. MacDonald: He sounds like the former Attorney General in reference to Dr. Shulman.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: For example, there is some evidence that publicity about fights in one institution has a tendency to create a chain reaction and cause unrest in some of the other institutions. Such rumours also are unfair to a dedicated staff which is doing a very able job.

We must also concern ourselves with the effects such rumours have upon the citizens of the areas in which the various institutions are located. For example, just to mention a few citizens of Guelph, Brampton, Sudbury, Brantford and so on, could be given the impression, by such allegations as those made by the hon. member, that there is a great lack of control within the institutions in their areas, and they would have every reason to be concerned.

I am sure the hon. member for Yorkview, who earlier showed such an interest in the work of our department, would not want to engage in a practice which would have the effect of making our work of correction much more difficult, and I would appeal to the hon. member again to make sure of his facts before making public charges.

I have before, and I again, offer him the facilities of our department and the co-operation of all our officials to ascertain the facts in any given situation at any time.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, having listened to the wisdom from across the floor, may I ask the hon. Minister a supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: You may ask the Minister if he wishes to answer a supplementary question.

Mr. Young: Could I ask the hon. Minister then if he would answer a supplementary question?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, he only asked me to comment originally. Does he want me to make a supplementary comment?

Mr. Young: All right.

Mr. Speaker: No, I am afraid there will be no supplementary comments either. If the member wishes to ask the Minister a supplementary question, I shall allow it if the Minister cares to answer it.

Mr. Young: The question I would ask then in regard to this incident is: Were some people on this occasion treated by the hospital concerned?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, how can I answer, in any case, as the hon. member has not even told me which incidents? He said "recent". If he will be a little more specific, on a specific date or something, I will be glad to get that information for him.

Mr. Young: Does the hon. Minister wish that information at this time, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: I think if the member has a particular date, perhaps the Minister would have to find out if, on that particular date, there was an incident.

Mr. Young: It was April 10.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present to the House the annual report of the civil service—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, we have another question.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, has the hon. Minister of Health any further report to make on the hospitalization of workers at the Allied Chemical plant, near Sarnia because of the effects of phosgene gas? And what is the explanation for the fact that these health problems were not reported to the government at the time of their occurrence?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is exactly the same as I made on April 14. I repeat there have been no incidents of health problems related to phosgene gas. Having listened to the information the hon. member put before you, sir, on a point of order a few days ago, I was rather concerned at the irreconcilability of the answer I gave with the report in the newspapers. I asked for a further investigation and I find that there has been misunderstanding on the part of the hon. member; and in my great zeal to be sure that I answered this question correctly, it made me take a rather narrow view of it.

There have been people hospitalized, but not as a result of exposure to toluene diisocyanate. A number of maintenance workers—the hon. member asked, on April 14, about employees of Allied Chemical—the people involved, sir, were not employees of Allied Chemical but employees of a contractor doing certain maintenance work in cleaning out pipes or some equipment used in the process there.

A number of maintenance workers employed at Allied Chemical were affected by exposure to toluene diisocyanate, which I explained the other day is a plastic chemical used in the operation. The main exposure occurred on March 10 in cleaning out the pipes containing this substance, TDI. Five of these men were hospitalized for periods of from four to 16 days and one is still in hospital, believed to be allergic to this substance.

Now, sir, I am advised that these cases were reported to the workmen's compensation board by the physicians of the companies concerned. This is proper procedure and in keeping with usual custom, my department was advised of these. But frankly, I did not associate that with exposure to phosgene gas because they are totally unrelated.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I beg leave to table a report of the advisory committee on university affairs.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present to the House the annual report of the civil service commission for 1963.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

THE ONTARIO FOOD TERMINAL ACT

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture) moves second reading of Bill No. 98, An Act to amend The Ontario Food Terminal Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE LAW SOCIETY ACT

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General) moves second reading of Bill No. 100, An Act to amend The Law Society Act.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, in connection with Bill No. 100, I think that most of the provisions in there make a fund of good sense, but I notice that the suggestion is that judges emeritus, if you can call them that, be no longer allowed to be benchers or honorary benchers of the law society. I am in favour of that suggestion, but I wonder why Attorneys General emeritus should continue to be honorary benchers of the law society.

I think while you are making the change you could deal with Attorneys General emeritus, or however the plural goes, in the same way as you are dealing with judges. It is conceivable, for instance, Mr. Speaker, that in the crisis that occurred in the last few weeks that we might have had three or four acting Attorneys General for a short period of time and as the changes took place from one to the other, the government could conceivably have ended up with five or six, or whatever number you want, of honorary benchers who could have taken over control of the law society.

I think while you are making the change you could perhaps extend the principle to the whole field.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): The suggestion is very worthy, perhaps, of consideration. I recall that one of the hon. member's colleagues likened the Attorneys General to the wives of King Henry VIII; they might be beheaded from time to time and divorced, and it could be that you could build up quite a society of benchers.

There is a difference, of course, in the functions and tenure of office of judges and Attorneys General and we will take the suggestion under consideration.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take the opportunity to make comments about the revision of this Act as a matter of principle. I would say by way of introduction that my hon. colleague, the hon. member for Downsview, myself and my friend the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Trotter) are all members of this society by virtue of the fact that we carry on practice within the province. In making any observations about it, of course we have to be very circumspect if we value the respect and esteem of our colleagues at the bar. We have to take care in what we say that we do not appear to be mavericks or to be advocating any measures which do not find favour with the benchers of the law society who, for these many years, have had the responsibility of governing our great and noble and honoured profession, one of the oldest professions, of course, within society—

An hon. member: Not the oldest!

Mr. Sopha: Not the oldest—but one of the oldest. I always rue the fact that the legal profession use the name "Law Society of Upper Canada," which is out of date and archaic and no longer reflects the geographic and constitutional entity which the law society covers.

In respect of the principle in section one, I note that in a recent issue of the Ontario Weekly Notes there was reported a meeting of the convocation of the society and the convocation apparently at that meeting dealt at great length with the principle of geographic representation among the benchers.

I want to say at this point that from the democratic point of view the Law Society of Upper Canada is rather unique and, if I may put it, atypical organization in that the law society, so long as I have been a member these ten years, has never held a meeting of the shareholders or the members. The benchers rule and govern the society within the confines of Osgoode Hall in the rooms provided there for their use. Indeed, I think they own a goodly portion of the real estate upon which the administration of justice is carried on. But unlike other corporate bodies in our society, whether they be statutory bodies or whether they be bodies created by letters patent or otherwise, this one never holds a meeting of the shareholders.

There is only one time, so far as I am aware, that in any sense the pluralistic group known as the law society gets together. That is annually, when at the midwinter meeting of the Canadian Bar Association, its Ontario section, the Law Society of Upper Canada tenders a luncheon to the members of the profession for which it pays and at which meeting, the treasurer of the law society—some hon. members will not appreciate, of course, that we lawyers are circumspect and shrewd and astute enough, to make the head man in our society, the treasurer. That shows the basic and innate intelligence of lawyers, the recognition of the fact that the man who controls the money ought to be the head man, and he is.

But it is at that meeting that some form of report is made by the law society to the shareholders.

Now to get back to this recent meeting of convocation, I read very carefully the report of the proceedings in the Ontario Weekly Notes and it seems that the benchers at that time took up the consideration of the geographic distribution of representation on the benchers, the governing body of the society. I think they came to the conclusion that the benchers ought to be divided with something like 50 per cent of them coming from the Metropolitan area of Toronto and 50 per cent coming from elsewhere in the province.

Well, if that has been decided by the benchers as a matter of principle, I say to the hon. Attorney General, through you, Mr. Speaker, that one queries why the statute is now presented in the House and that principle is not embodied in it.

Indeed, it is a strange thing, it always seems strange and anomalous to me, a matter of some paradox that arises from conjecture, that it is the lawyers who write the statutes governing the medical and the dental professions, to name two. The lawyers write those statutes and in those statutes, the lawyers have decreed that enshrined in the statute will be the principle of geographic representation. The doctors and the dentists have no choice about it. They divide the province in those statutes into various areas and they say so many of the governing body of the profession vis-à-vis doctors and dentists shall come from each one of these areas. But as is apparently the case, whereas that principle might be held valid for doctors and dentists, it has never occurred to lawyers that the principle might be valid for them.

For these many decades, the great majority of the governing body of the legal profession has come from the Metropolitan area, with but a few elected from elsewhere in the province. I myself have seen, in the short time that I have been at the bar, that many good men from elsewhere in the province have offered themselves to serve on the benchers but they have been deprived and denied that opportunity by reason of the fact that the great majority vote is here in Metropolitan Toronto. Therefore, a candidate from Metropolitan Toronto is favoured by that circumstance in the result that the great majority of the benchers have been from this area.

Now, I do not really know, not having spoken to many benchers, I cannot recall that many benchers speak to me. Well, I am not suggesting by that that they are not friendly with me. I have, indeed, many good friends who are benchers. But I cannot recall whether the benchers have arrived at a point in their thinking that they have decided that the geographical representation that I have outlined shall be the way the profession shall be governed in the future. But I would think that the hon. Attorney General—I suspect he has read that report of the convocation—might at this time ask the benchers of the law society whether they found that principle to be such an inviting one that he is ready to enshrine it in statutory form. Therefore the amendment to section 5 that is proposed in section one of this, the amending statute, might go further than it already goes.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, the denying of “judges emeritus” was the phrase of my hon. friend from Downsview, denying them the opportunity to sit, as a right, as ex-officio benchers of the law society, is a good democratic principle. It is a good democratic principle, at least in an enlightened age of democracy. They really have no right by virtue of the fact that they were formerly judges of the High Court, any more than ex-Attorneys General have the right. It is a matter of democratic principle. They do not have the right, especially when we are getting so many ex-Attorneys General alive at the one time. They might some time be able to sway the deliberations of the governing body of the profession.

I am not even sure, and I run the risk of the displeasure of my older and wiser and more experienced brethren in the profession, when I say that as a matter of democratic principle I am not at all sure that a person who is elected at three succeeding quinquennial elections ought to be a lifetime bencher. It rather puts an undue emphasis on age, on status, and on inflexibility of outlook. It does not encourage the prevalence of the point of view of the younger man. Like the Senate of Canada, it is inclined to become a nice place for retirement. And many, of course, of the benchers who presently govern the profession, are there by virtue of the fact that they have been elected for three succeeding five-year terms.

As a matter of principle, I am not even certain that the election to the governing body of the profession ought not to be more frequent than every five years. The Americans, I notice, with the presidency have an election every four. By practice we have one every four, where we have the opportunity at least, of changing those who govern us. Most corporate bodies have one every year, when the shareholders meet and they have an opportunity to toss out those in charge of affairs. I do not know that as a matter of democracy the benchers of the law society should be in the unique position of being there for five years.

But of all of these things, if any of the benchers read the words I have said, I hope they will at least vouchsafe to me that I have tried to make the comments moderate and intelligent and directed toward a reform in the best interests, not only of the members of the profession, but in the interests of the public generally.

I have no other axe to grind, save that. But in putting these things forward, as a mere matter of principle, I also want to remind the governing body of our profession that in many ways, as never before, our profession—great and noble and honoured and esteemed as it is—is under a certain measure of review by the public. I would be blind and I would ask my hearers to put their heads in the sand, if I did not direct their attention to the fact that there has been much adverse publicity about the legal profession in recent years. I can blame part of it on my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. Whicher), who used the opportunity at one time in the House, to make some rather adroit and direct remarks—penetrating remarks—about the legal profession and what ought to be done in respect of it.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Give them the needle.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, one might adopt those words.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: It is a medical term.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, that is a medical term, is it not? So, for all of those reasons, I say in closing that the Act is not apparently up to date with the thinking of the benchers, because since the Act has been moved in the House, this convocation has come out and the benchers appear to be willing to go further than this Act envisages in its amending section. Therefore, I say that we would be willing, on this side, if the benchers want to put another section in here to provide for geographic representation on that body then, speaking for myself and I am sure for many others, it would be a very welcome change.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member and I am not going to comment at any length at this time due to the fact that the report from the convocation of the benchers was produced after this bill was introduced. I am not sure that it went firmly forward into idea of geographic representation. And my hon. friend is aware that the election of benchers is democratic, at least to this extent that they are elected by all qualified members of the legal profession. However, the suggestion is one well worthy of consideration and we will take it under consideration.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE JUVENILE AND FAMILY COURTS ACT

Hon. Mr. Wishart moves second reading of Bill No. 101, An Act to amend The Juvenile and Family Courts Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT ACT

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways) moves second reading of Bill No. 122, An Act to amend The Highway Improvement Act.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on this. I am very pleased that the government has finally seen the light of day and paid attention to the resolution passed by the city council in the city of Windsor and endorsed by the town of Riverside. This is something we have been fighting for for two years, and I think it is just the thing we have asked for—the suburban roads commission's assessment to be on an equalized provincial basis.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

LOCAL ROADS BOARDS

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton moves second reading of Bill No. 123, An Act to provide for the establishment of local roads boards in territory without municipal organization.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a brief comment on this bill.

As I have stated before, this government is following a policy of modernizing, as time and circumstances permit, the financial and administrative methods available to the many road authorities in the province which provide the day-to-day management for a very essential part of the transportation network on which the social and economic well-being of the province depends.

This Act provides for the formation of local roads areas and election of local roads boards to administer the local roads within these areas and is a further indication of that policy of modernization. It provides a more efficient and equitable method of administering some 5,000 miles of public roads in those parts of Ontario without municipal organization, most of which are now under the administration of statute labour boards.

In comparing this Act with The Statute Labour Act the hon. members will note the principles of local participation in the cost of local roads, and local direction of work on local roads have been maintained.

The major changes and improvements are:

1. The Department of Highways forces will perform the work laid out by the elected representatives of the local people. This will allow full use of the department's specialized equipment and trained technical staff, thereby increasing the efficiency and effectiveness of the operations.

2. The department will provide a higher level of financial aid, varying from "2-for-1", or 66% per cent, to "4-for-1" or 80 per cent, depending on the frontage of Crown lots. This is in keeping with the increase in subsidy given to certain of the townships last year, though on a different basis.

3. This Act provides three alternative methods of assessing the lands within the local roads areas by the boards. If all the property is assessed under The Provincial Land Tax Act, this assessment will be used by the boards. If this assessment is not complete, but all the lands in the area are assessed in one school section under The Public Schools Act, then such assessment will be used by the boards. Finally, if neither of these assessments are available, provision is made for the boards to assess the lands under a simple schedule established in the Act.

It is not the intention of this government to repeal The Statute Labour Act at this time, nor to force the present statute labour boards to use this new Act. However, I am certain that when the advantages of this new system are understood by the people in unorganized areas, they will abandon statute labour for this new and more efficient system.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE ONTARIO MUNICIPAL EMPLOYEES RETIREMENT SYSTEM ACT, 1961-62

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs) moves second reading of Bill No. 110, An Act to amend The Ontario Municipal Employees Retirement System Act, 1961-62.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE MUNICIPAL UNCONDITIONAL GRANTS ACT

Hon. Mr. Spooner moves second reading of Bill No. 111, An Act to amend The Municipal Unconditional Grants Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

SPECIAL RESIDENTIAL AND SHELTERED CARE

Hon. Mr. Dymond moves second reading of Bill No. 118, An Act to provide homes for persons requiring special residential and sheltered care.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE MUNICIPALITY OF METROPOLITAN TORONTO ACT

Hon. Mr. Spooner moves second reading of Bill No. 120, An Act to amend The Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto Act.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence (St. George): Mr. Speaker, on Bill No. 120, I wonder if the hon. Minister could advise us if the government has any intention of bringing in a further amendment to the Metropolitan Toronto Act this year regarding the Metropolitan Toronto licensing commission? As I understood a position earlier taken by the hon. Minister, there was to be no amendments at all in the Metro Toronto bill this year. And if there had been, the government was going to at least take under serious consideration the question of appeals from the decisions of the Metropolitan Toronto licensing commission, and the sections in the Metro Toronto Act which relate thereto.

Is the hon. Minister in a position to advise the House today if there will be any further amending bill later this year?

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the whole question of the Metro government in this area is under review by Mr. Goldenberg and I have no intention to present any additional amendments, particularly any amendment dealing with the licensing commission for Metro.

Mr. Singer: Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. George raises a good point. I do not know that it was within really the terms of reference addressed to Mr. Goldenberg dealing with licensing commissions—that sort of thing—and the hon. member for St. George—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): I was just wondering, Mr. Speaker, how is this relevant to the principle of this bill?

Mr. Singer: Well, the principle of the bill deals with the unique municipal organization called Metropolitan Toronto and this is about the only opportunity—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I am quite patient but that is a long stretch, a very long stretch.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE MUNICIPAL ACT

Hon. Mr. Spooner moves second reading of Bill No. 121, An Act to amend The Municipal Act.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: This Bill No. 121 will go to the committee on municipal law and will be completely—or a very careful, detailed examination will be made there.

Mr. Singer: And Bill No. 120, too?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, is it necessary that Bill No. 120 should go to the committee?

Mr. Singer: It is the one I am concerned about.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: If the hon. member wants to make a speech about the licensing commission, why it is quite all right with me. We will have both of them go to the committee on municipal law, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE FATAL ACCIDENTS ACT

Mr. Sopha moves second reading of Bill No. 22, An Act to amend The Fatal Accidents Act.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence (Russell): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might have the opportunity of speaking against this bill at this particular point?

The reason I rise, sir, is because I suggest that the bill as proposed by the hon. member for Sudbury is an unnecessary piece of legislation. I am going to say as a start in my very brief remarks, Mr. Speaker, that in the result I disagree with the hon. member for Sudbury on grounds of principle as well as on legal grounds. Having said that I disagree with him on legal grounds, this might be an appropriate point in our discussion to congratulate him upon his recent elevation to the position of Queen's Counsel, learned in the law. I hope that nothing I will say will in any way reflect upon that distinction.

Mr. Speaker, if this bill itself were dealing only with matters of small technicalities or small cost and if in the result they bore in some way upon widows and children, I think that all of us in this House, myself and the hon. member for Sudbury, would all be agreed that this Act was well founded. But the basic suggestion I would like to put before you, Mr. Speaker, and before the hon. member for Sudbury, is that his bill is essentially misconceived in that it expresses, it is an amending Act but it expresses, what I with deference submit is the law as it presently exists. The amendment which the hon. member proposes in his bill reads:

It is not necessary to obtain letters probate or letters of administration in order to bring an action under this section.

The essence of my submission, Mr. Speaker, is that this is exactly what the law is at this time. In other words, as a matter of law it is not necessary to obtain letters probate or letters of administration in order to bring an action under the section referred to, the section being section seven of the present Fatal Accidents Act. And briefly, that section says, Mr. Speaker, section seven of the present Act:

If there is no executor or administrator of the deceased, the action may be brought by all or any of the persons for whose benefit the action would have been if it had been brought by such executor or administrator.

In other words, if there is no executor or administrator then the people who are beneficially entitled, a widow, orphans, the beneficiaries themselves, can bring the action.

Mr. Speaker, I have had a brief look at the law on the point and I will not burden the House as one would in court with a long list of cases, but for the purposes of the record I would like to mention four of them if I might.

Going back to 1898, we have a case in which the courts have held that it was not necessary to have an administrator under the circumstances. In 1922 we have another case following the same line. In 1924 another case. In 1937 another case, and a leading one, Male vs. Silverwoods Dairies, which held that administration or appointment of executors was not necessary.

In 1957 the point was followed up again in a case in which the judge said, briefly, that he, the presiding judge of the court, could not override the plain wording of the section, the plain wording of the section that I have quoted, Mr. Speaker.

This being the fact, with respect—in some 42 years one cannot find a recorded case saying that it is necessary to appoint an administrator or executor under these circumstances. So I repeat, sir, that it appears that the proposed legislation is redundant.

The answer that might be brought is: If there is any question why not pass a bill, it will not do any harm? I think the hon. member for Sudbury would be the first to agree with me that futile legislation is certainly not something we would wish. Perhaps more important, there is always the possibility that if we were to pass a bill such as, in fact Bill No. 22, the courts themselves and the legal profession involved with circumstances pertinent to this point, might assume that this was in some way changing the law and that some present rights—some existing rights—were thereby affected. Conceivably the rights existing under limitations in the law themselves could be affected.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that there are some circumstances when obviously, without propounding a thesis, an amendment of this kind or general amendments of standing legislation would be well founded.

The first obviously is at a time when the circumstances involving this particular legislation show that it is out of date. I would submit that is not the case today.

The second obvious example would be where the operation of a particular statute, as we sometimes find in our taxing legislation, the operation by the civil service itself produces results which none of the hon. members of this House would have intended, Mr. Speaker.

Another situation would be where the interpretation by the courts has produced results which neither the government nor hon. members of the House had intended.

A fourth would be where you had a series of confusing cases going in different directions and appeals which show that the wording was in fact obscure.

Finally a situation in which there was some consensus of opinion in the legal profession, or among judges or in the Attorney General's office or with the public, as to the fact the law might be obscure.

So far as I can see, sir, none of these more obvious and basic qualifications are met under the present circumstances. I submit again that the case law is in fact consistent and has been for nearly 50 years that the wording of the present section seven of the Act is clear, and, that therefore there is no need for the passage of a bill such as Bill No. 22.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of my hon. friend from Russell. He and I, I am sure, will share the belief that it would ill behove ourselves to burden the House for long with a discussion of an extremely technical point that really concerns only lawyers. In all that he has said I would say to him in the spirit of utmost friendliness that he may be closer to the mark than he was in his last speech when he advocated the endorsement of the Ontario pension plan.

The length of his remarks gives me some measure of support that this bill may be needed. I put it forward for the sole purpose of clearing up what I felt to be an obscurity in the statute. It is true that there is judicial interpretation that supports the point of view that he takes. I, sir, went to a law officer of the Crown and I suggested that the government bring forward a bill to add the section that is proposed to be added in Bill No. 22. That plea fell on deaf ears.

Then I was moved to introduce this bill myself. And I was moved to do so because only three or four months ago, when I appeared on behalf of a widow in the high court before a learned judge of that court, with an action under The Fatal Accidents Act, among the first things that the judge said to me was: "Mr. Sopha, where are the letters of administration upon which this action is founded?" Now, an action under The Fatal Accidents Act, of course, is a statutory action, one that did not exist at common law. The Fatal Accidents Act is known in Britain as Lord Campbell's Act, having been suggested or written by a very learned lord of his day and time; I think perhaps a half a century ago.

Section seven of the Act as it now stands seems to have in it an inherent ambiguity and it seems on a plain reading that an interpretation may be attributed to it that it is necessary for a person who sues under that statute—usually a widow or widower, and sometimes dependent children if both parents have been killed—it seems to be capable of an interpretation that it is necessary to have letters of administration or letters probate if the action is brought before six months have expired from the date of the death of the deceased. Of course that is what led to the learned judge's comments to me, the action having been started within six months. But if the person who brings the action waits more than six months, then the statute seems to say that an action may be brought by dependents.

This section is quite a lengthy one and any reading of it, as has been done by my hon. friend from Russell, lends itself to that possible interpretation. He cites three cases. I am familiar with those cases. I will pay this compliment of appreciation to him. I was familiar with two of them and he brought the third one, the Silverwood case, to my attention, for which I am grateful. Those are cases in the High Court, the most inferior of the supreme courts of judicature. It may well be that those cases, having been decided in the High Court, at some future time an appellate tribunal or the Supreme Court of Canada might decide upon a different interpretation. It would be a disastrous thing if the widow brought an action under The Fatal Accidents Act, not having secured letters of administration, a year having gone by since the death of her spouse, and then to have it ruled that her action was a nullity. That would be disastrous.

There would be no repair for that situation because, the year having gone by under The Highway Traffic Act, she would then be out of court with no relief or compensation for her injury, loss or damage or for any dependent children. That is another one of the reasons that I tender this amendment, for, sadly, it is very frequently the case that a widow who comes to consult a lawyer—her husband having been killed on one of our highways or as a result of the tortious act of a third person otherwise—that there is no estate that required taking out letters of administration otherwise. Her husband, in many, many cases that have come to me, leaves nothing other than, perhaps an insurance policy, perhaps some furniture, perhaps a very small balance in the bank. Otherwise he leaves nothing for the sustenance of his wife and children.

Then, sir, the lawyer does not want to go through the expense of taking out letters of administration at all. He accordingly prepares an application to the Surrogate Court to dispense with a bond and to allow the grant of letters of administration to go without the necessity of filing a bond.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in one fell swoop by the adoption of this reasoned amendment—a reasoned amendment I say because it is in the words of the law officers of the Crown who very kindly drafted it for me. It is their language and it is what I want to put forward. By this adoption of this amendment it would take away from the mind of the judge who questioned me in that case where he said: "Mr. Sopha, where are the letters of administration?" and I said: "My lord, I have not got them, I have not got any". So he said: "Oh, well, this case is not defended anyway so we will just overlook that." It was very kind of him, very kind of him. Had he taken the contrary position I could well have been in trouble. I might not even be here if I had got into that kind of trouble. But that is the way he disposed of it.

I want to take away that query from that judge's mind. So that hereafter, when one of the 22 or 23 judges of the High Court—and I say to my hon. friend from Russell it may be that there are a number of the 23 learned men in jurisprudence who are not familiar with those three cases that he and I are familiar with. I want to take away from them all or any of them any doubt about the necessity of taking out letters probate or letters of administration by saying that in an action brought under The Fatal Accidents Act in the clearest possible terms it is not necessary to have them in order to pursue the action. That is the reason the amendments were put forward and I hope that it finds favour from all corners of the House.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park) moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL EXHIBITION ASSOCIATION

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine) moves second reading of Bill No. 28, An Act respecting the meetings of the board of directors of the Canadian National Exhibition Association.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some comments in support of the second reading of this bill. I think the arguments in favour of its adoption are overwhelming and I feel confident that it will be approved.

This bill relates, as its title indicates, to meetings of the board of directors of the Canadian National Exhibition Association. It is a subject that was dear to the heart of the late Mayor Summerville of Toronto. He believed, as I believe and as I think most of the city council of Toronto believes, that the meetings of the board of directors of the CNE Association ought to be open to the public in the same way as meetings of local boards, of municipal councils and so on.

The bill is in much the same terms. In fact, I think it is in identical terms mutatis mutandis with municipal legislation. The normal procedure would be, if this bill were passed, that the meetings would be open to the public. But if some matter affecting private negotiations, where disclosure would obviously be disadvantageous to the association should occur, there is a provision whereby the public could be excluded from those meetings. It is the same principle exactly as applies to municipal councils, boards of education and other local boards.

The city of Toronto, last year I think it was, or it may have been the year before last, but at any rate, during the last session of the Legislature, the city brought in a bill to amend the private statute under which the Canadian National Exhibition Association is incorporated. This bill had as its purpose the same purpose as in Bill No. 28, now before you. It was brought in, however, as a private bill from the city of Toronto. That is the only way the city of Toronto could bring legislation of this kind before the House. Members of the private bills committee, by no means unanimously but by majority vote, turned down the bill, but not on its merits. In fact, several of the hon. members at that time who stated that they planned to vote against the bill, indicated that they favoured its principle. The same thing happened when the matter came to the House. I moved an amendment to the report of the private bills committee, to instruct the committee to reconsider this bill. We had a division in the House on that vote and then we heard the same sort of speeches from several hon. members on all sides of the House.

There were a great many hon. members, of course, including all the members of this group, who voted in favour of the principle of the bill. There were many others who said they had nothing against the principle, but technically it was out of order. What was this technicality, Mr. Speaker? The technicality was that it is not in order for one private group to bring in a bill to amend a statute which relates to another private organization. That may not be the best method of expression technically, but I think it gets the substance across.

It was objected that the city of Toronto as a private organization, or an organization bringing in a private bill, could not amend another private statute which was not its own. That was the statute of the Canadian National Exhibition Association. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that was a very small technicality, and without too much merit.

As a matter of fact, the standing orders committee solicited a memorandum from Mr. Silk, who was then assistant deputy Attorney General. The memorandum was placed before the private bills committee on this technicality, and Mr. Silk did say that he did not think the bill brought in by the city of Toronto was truly a private bill in that it was not a bill for the particular interest or benefit of any person or persons. So, I suppose—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member is discussing that bill, or the bill now before the House?

Mr. Bryden: Well, I think, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is there some measure of relevancy?

Mr. Bryden: This is all background to the bill before the House. As a matter of fact, the bill I am talking about is in identical terms to the—

Mr. Speaker: The principle of both bills is identical?

Mr. Bryden: The principle is absolutely identical. I am just trying to explain how it came about that I have seen fit to bring in a public bill on this issue. At any rate, I only have about one more comment on the background, Mr. Speaker.

As I say, Mr. Silk indicated that the bill was not a bill for the particular interest or benefit of any person or persons and therefore, in his opinion, it was not truly a private bill. He did, however, say in the same memorandum, and I think we should bear this in mind:

It is appropriate to point out at this point also that although it is the function of this office to prepare opinions of law based on the decisions of courts which, on the principle of stare decisis, are found by previous decisions of courts of equal or higher jurisdiction, that furnishing of an opinion with regard to a matter over which the Legislature has final jurisdiction, is somewhat different. For I know that you, as Clerk of the House, realize the greater flexibility in the proceedings of the Legislature and of the right of the Legislature to make final determinations in matters of this kind, notwithstanding previous rulings.

It was my opinion last year, Mr. Speaker, that we should have considered the matter on its merits and forgotten the petty technicalities since there is no doubt, as Mr. Silk says, that this Legislature has the power to do so if it sees fit.

However, the view of the majority of the House was against me. So I have brought in—as a matter of fact, last year I brought in a bill but it was fairly late in the session. It was never called for debate. It was a bill exactly incorporating the principle. In fact it was in the language of the city of Toronto bill, and I have brought it forward again this year in exactly the same terms: providing that notwithstanding anything that may be contained in any other Act, the meetings of the board of directors of the CNE Association are open to the public, subject to the reservations I mentioned earlier.

I do not think that there can now be any technicality raised. This is a public bill, and a public bill can certainly amend a private statute directly or indirectly. However, this one does not purport to amend the private statute. It is a statute standing by itself. I think that the principle incorporated in the bill simply cannot be impeached.

It is ridiculous to regard the Canadian National Exhibition Association as if it were a purely private organization with no public responsibility at all in the same way, shall we say, as a religious order or something like that. The Canadian National Exhibition Association is technically not a local board, but for all practical purposes it is. It administers a large exhibition in the city of Toronto, on property owned by the city of Toronto and by the citizens of Toronto. The city of Toronto is responsible for all of its deficits.

The taxpayers of Toronto have a direct liability with regard to the financial operations of this corporation, and yet the citizens of Toronto are not permitted to sit in in some sort of public gallery when the meetings of this board are held. They are treated as pariahs. It is none of their business what is done by this board with their money. I submit that this is a wrong principle. The citizens of Toronto have a right to know what this board is doing with their money.

There are representatives of the city council there, but the citizens themselves have no opportunity to find out what is going on. At city council meetings there are obviously representatives of the city present; they are all representatives of the city. But surely the citizens have a right to see what their representatives are doing? That is a basic principle of democracy. Citizens have a right to know what the elected representative is doing. If they do not like what he is doing, they may want to get rid of him on another occasion. It is a preposterous principle to me that this board, operating an important public function involving the taxes of the citizens of Toronto, should be able to sit behind closed doors without the citizens of Toronto knowing what it is doing.

I want to provide to the House certain information the city solicitor and city treasurer of Toronto have been kind enough to provide to me regarding the financial operations of the CNE Association. I am quoting an extract from a letter of March 18, 1963, about a year ago, from Mr. Callow, the city solicitor, in which he says:

All land on which the Canadian National Exhibition is situated is owned by the city. The city owns all the Canadian National Exhibition buildings. The city is responsible for debenture debt incurred in respect of the Canadian National Exhibition Association now amounting to $9,563,465.37.

That was in 1963. And then:

While under the terms of an agreement with the Canadian National Exhibition the city derives any surplus arising from its operations, such surplus does not nearly cover the debt charges which are incurred. For example, in 1961, the debt charges amounted to $874,905 while the surplus was $231,165. The city therefore was responsible for the difference amounting to $643,740.

That was in 1961.

In 1962, the debt charges amounted to $945,556, while the surplus was $570,114. This left the city responsible for $375,442.

A month or two ago I phoned Mr. Campbell, the city treasurer, to bring those figures up to date. The figures he gave me for 1963 are as follows: The debt charges that the city had to pay in 1963 were $1,054,463. The surplus was $532,853—the operating surplus—leaving the city responsible for a net payment of $521,610.

If my memory serves me correctly that is something like three or four mills in the city of Toronto, Mr. Speaker, that the citizens of Toronto were responsible for in 1963 with regard to the financial operations of the CNE Association. I think when the citizens are responsible for that amount of money they have a right to know what is happening to their money. I do not know of any valid reason why the CNE Association should not be put in the same position as local boards as far as its meetings being open to the public are concerned. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the House would see fit to adopt this bill in principle.

As I have said, last year when the matter was before us many hon. members who did not vote for the bill indicated that they approved its principle. I think that they should have an opportunity now—those who are still here and new hon. members—to indicate their approval of the principle if they do in fact approve it.

I would suggest to the hon. Prime Minister that he should permit the second reading of this bill to come to a vote. I think it could quite properly be a free vote. This is not a government bill and the government, as far as I know, has made no announcement of policy on the matter at all. Therefore the government's life would not be at stake in a vote on this bill. It would be a matter, I take it, of indifference to the government as such as to whether the bill carried or not.

I think it would be appropriate that the hon. members of this House should have an opportunity to indicate whether they personally approve of the principle in much the same way as they do with private bills. Private bills, in the overwhelming majority of cases, are decided not according to party lines or according to government policy but according to the convictions of the individual members.

Mr. Singer: On occasion.

Mr. Bryden: I think this year in particular we have had occasions where there was certainly no sign of party discipline. This is a matter where originally an attempt was made to deal with it by private legislation. It does not involve government policy and I think it should be settled according to the individual convictions of the hon. members. I would hope that the hon. Prime Minister will permit it to come to a vote and permit the vote to be a free vote.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to make a few brief remarks in support of this bill.

The exhibition held here in this particular area belongs to not only all of the people of Ontario but it is the Canadian National Exhibition. For that reason we should lean over backwards in an attempt to show that the operations of this great concern are open to the scrutiny of the press and open so that all the people in Canada can see just how the exhibition carries on.

The Canadian National Exhibition is something of which we should all be proud. It is certainly the finest show of its kind anywhere in the world and for that reason, I think having the public attend open meetings of its board helps to advertise the great work that it has done and it is doing.

If there are certain matters that should not be discussed, perhaps of interest to competitors in large cities to the south that maybe hold similar shows, if we want to keep that quiet, this bill allows that the board of directors can, when necessary, hold meetings that are not necessarily open to the public. But we have a duty in order to help the exhibition to have open meetings.

Even more important than that, Mr. Speaker, it is always dangerous when public monies are involved if a small group of people are more or less ruling the roost and the general public does not know exactly what is going on. We would all be shocked if suddenly the city council or the board of control here in the city of Toronto, said: "No, we must not have the press. We must not have the public." Occasionally there has been a mayor or controller who has advocated that here in Toronto and there has been a great outcry. I think that the Canadian National Exhibition should be judged on the same basis, that where millions of dollars of public money is involved the public should know what is going on.

Also what the board of directors of the Canadian National Exhibition does affects businessmen in the general area where the exhibition is being held. If the exhibition is a success, it is good for business; if it is not a success, it is harmful to the economy of the entire area. Businessmen themselves want to know what is going on.

I would sum up briefly, Mr. Speaker, and say that because the exhibition belongs to the country as a whole the meetings of the board of directors should be open. We are spending public funds, and this probably is the main reason the board of directors should have its meetings open to the public. Third, it affects business as a whole so that the business community should know how things are being handled.

We must avoid this danger of a small group of people—which is becoming so common today where business and labour and everything becomes so centralized into a few hands—we must avoid even giving the impression that this large public corporation is being run by just a few people and possibly for the benefit of a few. It is a public corporation to serve Canada as a whole. I hope with that in mind this bill is supported by the House.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly urge the hon. members not to support this bill. I cannot agree with many of the things that have been said here today and for the benefit of hon. members I would like to point out some of the reasons why we should not support this bill.

For example, the Canadian National Exhibition Association is composed of representatives of all branches of agriculture, commerce and industry throughout Canada, while the city administration is represented on the board of directors by the mayor and seven members of the city council. Now, I think that is a pretty good public representation, Mr. Speaker, and that the elected members of the council are fully aware of what is going on on the board of directors at all times.

As a matter of fact, the press is invited into the meetings from time to time and I understand that following all board meetings a release is given to the press.

Now the association is operating under the terms of an agreement dated November 15, 1954, effective January 1, 1955, whereby the association is solely responsible for holding an annual exhibition and as agent for the city is in charge of the control, management and maintenance of all buildings in Exhibition Park and all parking lots associated therewith.

The exhibition grounds consist of 350 acres located entirely within the city limits and extending a mile and a half along the north shore of Lake Ontario. The buildings, which include 25 permanent structures providing 522,000 square feet of rental space, are connected by 14 miles of paved roadways. Both the grounds and the buildings are owned by the city.

The exhibition has been held annually since 1879, with the exception of the years 1942 to 1946 when the buildings and grounds were used by the armed forces. In 1962 the attendance of 3,009,500 exceeded that of any previous year.

You know, Mr. Speaker, it is rather amusing to hear the Opposition speakers talking about this wonderful show we have here in Toronto, then at the same time suggesting that maybe there might be some skulduggery going on on the board of directors and that we should have them open—which is just a silly thing to say. As a matter of fact, I think one of the reasons why we should leave it just as it is is because many of our public-spirited citizens who serve on this board just do not want to be in a position where they have to take some of the criticism which we, as politicians, expect to get. They are not political. They are businessmen. They are sound businessmen, and farmers, and others who give up their time voluntarily to assist this great exhibition.

As has been noted, Mr. Chairman, the Canadian National Exhibition has been going since 1879 rather successfully. It is said to be the largest annual exhibition in the world and surely if there was any really justifiable reason why these meetings should be open to the press, this would have been done over the past 80 years or so. It has been a most successful operation to date and, Mr. Speaker, I do not see any reason why it should not continue in the same manner as in the past.

As far as the board being the same as other boards and commissions of the city, I would like to quote another legal opinion—we have already had two or three today. This one is from Mr. C. W. Yates, the general municipal counsel of The Department of Municipal Affairs, and he says this:

It should be pointed out that the Canadian National Exhibition is not a local board of the city of Toronto or any other municipality, so that the provisions of The Municipal Act in this regard to open meetings do not apply, nor were they ever intended to apply to the Canadian National Exhibition.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): The hon. member is arguing against himself and does not even know it.

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): He is talking, not you.

Mr. Speaker: Order! I would remind the members, particularly the ones who have spoken, that they were given an audience when they were speaking and I would ask the same for the other members when they are speaking.

Mr. Cowling: Well, Mr. Speaker, one expects a certain amount of that from the other side. It really does not bother me. I like to give it a bit, too, at times.

I should say that the financial operations, as has been pointed out here today, are under the supervision of the city auditor and the city treasurer and the city solicitor. The affairs of the citizens are represented on the board by the elected controllers, the mayor and the aldermen. To change it, or to alter the situation as it stands today, to my mind, Mr. Speaker, would not just be the right thing to do.

We have a great exhibition. It is being operated efficiently and economically and in the best interests of the citizens of our great city. It is the greatest annual exhibition in the world and I cannot see any reason for supporting this amendment. I would urge hon. members not to do so.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to move adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Singer: Surely, Mr. Speaker, the government is somewhat interested in the views of other hon. members of the House. I cannot understand the unnecessary haste in rushing the hon. member in with his adjournment motion.

It is an important topic and I would have thought it would have been only courtesy to inquire whether or not there were other speakers.

Mr. Cowling: I thought everybody had spoken over there. I have no objections to holding this motion.

Mr. Speaker: I want to ask: Does the member wish to speak to the motion?

Mr. Singer: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I do.

I have listened with great interest to the arrant nonsense which comes forth from the hon. member for High Park on occasions like this on many occasions in the House; and this afternoon, too. He seems to be saying—after taking us on a travelogue of the lakefront of the city of Toronto and describing the buildings and the lakeshore and what a wonderful city we have—with all of these things we agree—that because all these things are so fine and handsome there is no need to open the meetings to the public.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think there has been any suggestion of skulduggery or wrongdoing; but if there is nothing to hide why give the appearance that there is something to hide? I would think that since this body deals with public funds and with a public investment of which we are all very proud, there would be an anxiety on the part of all concerned to hold these meetings open to the public, to invite the press in to do whatever reporting seems fit to the press, and not to be handed pre-condensed releases at the end of a meeting.

I cannot imagine, Mr. Speaker, that the city of Toronto council members would have any real objection to discussing such matters as these in public. Nor can I imagine either, Mr. Speaker, that those other members, the members of the agricultural industry and the other members of the board who serve there, would have any objection at all.

I wonder why the objections of the hon. member for High Park are so urgent and so violent. What is he trying to protect? If there is no reason to doubt what is going on in those meetings, I would think the hon. member for High Park would be among the first to welcome open meetings of the board of the Canadian National Exhibition.

For these reasons, sir, I too support this bill.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I shall not speak at length on this but, since it apparently is the intention on the other side of the House to move adjournment, and not have a vote, I just want to make two points. The first one is that it is preposterous to say we are alleging that skulduggery is going on because a bill is introduced to implement a widely accepted principle of democracy. This is the kind of low-level tactics used in dealing with a principle when people want to ignore that principle. In fact, in that connection may I just read one paragraph from a letter which my colleague, the hon. member for Woodbine, got from the city solicitor of Toronto, written at the instruction of the late Donald Summerville:

I thought that you should be aware that the city's proposal to require the association to hold its meetings in public was dealt with by the city council on October 22, 1962 when it was passed unanimously, and subsequently council unanimously reaffirmed this decision at its meeting held on February 18 of this year.

In other words, that a bill introduced by my colleague, to implement what the council of the city of Toronto has unanimously requested in two succeeding years, should be treated in the manner in which the hon. member for High Park has done I think is unforgivable.

Mr. Chairman, my second point is briefly this: If this government introduces bills, and we in the Opposition were to adopt obstructionist tactics—because we happen to be of a different party, even though the principle is highly commended even by many on the government side—and oppose this bill, we would certainly bring ourselves into disrepute before the eyes of the people of the province of Ontario. And I suggest, in the bill which has been discussed before in this House, in which many hon. members on the government side of the House have indicated their support in principle, that the time has now come for an expression of support and principle by the hon. members of the House.

Therefore, if the hon. member for High Park is going to insist on moving adjournment of the debate, we will oppose his motion for an adjournment. We will call for a recorded vote on the motion for adjournment as the only way of expressing our disapproval.

Mr. H. J. Price (St. David): Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Price moves the adjournment of the debate. Shall the motion carry?

Several hon. members: No!

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

As many as are in favour of the motion to adjourn the debate, will please rise.

As many as are opposed to the motion, please rise.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Speaker, the yeas are 56 and the nays 27.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion for adjournment carried.

THE STATUTE LABOUR ACT

Mr. Sopha moves second reading of Bill No. 35, An Act to amend The Statute Labour Act.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to you for getting me an audience.

Mr. MacDonald: How long can the hon. member keep it?

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Speaker, I say to you, sir, and I must get the words out quickly, that we have seen something quite shocking in the way of debasement of parliamentary institutions in this House this afternoon. Two bills have been called, and no person in any position of authority in the government has seen fit to acquaint the House with the views of the government. As for the hon. member for High Park, I do not know what authority he has or what influence he has, but certainly none of us were ever under the impression he has the authority to speak for the government.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I would simply say that when we call a private member's bill it is not necessary for the government to express any opinion on the matter. Our opinion is expressed in the government bills brought before the House. Certainly I do not think it is the intent of introducing and having debates on private member's bills.

Mr. Sopha: Nor has the executive council the right to show contempt for private members of the House, no matter where they sit. Let it be noted that when the other bill, The Fatal Accidents Act, was called, the hon. Attorney General got up and left the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order! Order! I would like to remind the member that Bill No. 35 is before the House and I would ask him to proceed to debate the principle of this bill.

Mr. Sopha: With respect, I am fully aware of that, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Talk about contempt for the Speaker!

Mr. Sopha: I did not utter any contempt.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Sopha: The evil is in the eye of the beholder and the hon. Minister of Labour is quite an expert at it.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Sopha: This bill seeks to repeal section 3 of The Statute Labour Act. If the hon. member for High Park moves the adjournment of this one, he will be adjourning the principle of taxation without representation.

Mr. MacDonald: That will not stop him.

Mr. Sopha: Section 3 of The Statute Labour Act, for any who have not read it recently, reads as follows:

1. Councils of cities, towns, villages and townships may pass by-laws for levying and collecting an annual tax to be known as "poll tax" of not less than $1 and not more than $10 from every male inhabitant of the municipality who (a) is 21 years or over and under 60 years of age, (b) is not exempt from performing statute labour, (c) is not otherwise assessed in the municipality or who is assessed and whose taxes are less than the poll tax and, (d) has not filed with the clerk a certificate showing that he has been assessed, will perform statute labour or pay poll taxes elsewhere in Ontario.

2. Where any person is assessed and his taxes are less than the amount of the poll tax, he is liable to pay the poll tax only.

3. Where any such male inhabitant has been employed by the same person, for not less than 30 days, the employer shall pay over the amount of the tax to the collector on demand out of any wages due to the employee, such payment relieves the employer from any liability to the employee for the amount so paid.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, the chief complaint that I have, among many others about poll tax, is that it is taxation without representation. It is true that municipalities would make use of The Municipal Franchise Extension Act and provide, after a vote of the electorate or the ratepayers, that every male person who is a British subject of the age of 21 years, might have the vote at municipal elections. However, in Ontario there are few municipalities that have availed themselves of that provision. Consequently, the great bulk of persons not otherwise assessed and on the rolls of the municipality have no franchise in the selection of those who shall govern them at the municipal level.

Poll tax, of course, falls in greatest proportion upon single men, because single males make up the great bulk of those who do not own property in the municipality and for that reason would be exempt from the payment of poll tax. Perhaps it is well to find out at this juncture the discriminatory feature in order to leave it and hasten away from it. The discriminatory feature that is involved is the fact that this form of tax is paid only by single men. Certainly it is paid by males only and as I have said, by the nature of the tax, it falls in the greatest proportion on the single male.

There is no comparable tax on single women or, if you like, bachelor girls, and in that sense it is discriminatory because as surely as single men employed in the community are able to pay the tax, avail themselves of municipal services, then the same considerations apply to single women. However, the single women have never been called upon to pay the tax and, in principle—I am not suggesting that single women should pay it, indeed I want to relieve both single men and single women from the liability to pay it—but as a matter of principle there is no philosophic or moral basis that single men should be any more liable to pay a unique and special form of tax than should women, especially when many of the women are gainfully employed.

Now, a poll tax is a very old tax. It was first introduced in England in 1377, so the records show, and at that time the thought of taxing land did not occur to the authorities. Even if it had it probably would have caused civil war in the feudal system of those days. Rather, they taxed persons.

In the introduction of the poll tax and poll, as the word is used in this connection, has nothing to do with voting at all, nor any reference to the place where the vote is taken. It is a word that is a derivative from the old Norman French which means "head". The poll tax was a tax on heads. The introduction of the tax led directly to the revolt of the peasants organized by Wat Tyler in 1380. So you can see, Mr. Speaker, that the reactions to taxes was more violent in those days than it is in the milder times of today.

As introduced, it was a device whereby every citizen in the realm paid a tax fixed at a certain amount per head. Later on in its development it became a tax on aliens only.

The tax was introduced into British North America in the 18th century and it soon became allied, at least in Upper Canada, to the concept of statute labour and the duty of all male persons to contribute their labour to the building of roads. So then it becomes apparent why it is a tax on males only. Certainly in those days, as today, women were not expected to do anything constructive towards the maintenance or the building of roads.

It is still levied under The Statute Labour Act and it is still very closely connected in the words of section 3 of that statute with a notion that has now become archaic that male citizens have an obligation to devote certain days each year to road work. This, of course, is no longer required of any citizen in urban communities.

Mr. Speaker, as I have said, in my view the tax is unfair and discriminatory and it has the effect of depriving those who pay it—or the effect is that those who pay it are deprived of the right to select those who collect taxes from them. For this reason alone, aside from any other, I would think an enlightened government at this stage in the development of our province would see fit to abolish this repressive, regressive and archaic method of collecting taxes.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, it is levied at the local level by councils of municipalities. As a matter of fact a good many municipalities to which I am going to refer specifically do not see fit to collect it at all. A survey was taken by a group, and I am not going to name the group for fear of divulging the author of a communication to me in reference to this tax among the tax collectors and treasurers of municipalities throughout the province, but the comments are illuminating. I was very gratified to receive a letter from the city tax collector of a fairly large urban municipality of this province after my bill went on the order paper and he addressed these very kind words to me. I want to put them into the record as an item of evidence in support of my introduction of this statute:

February 12, 1964

Dear Mr. Sopha:

I am writing to you to offer my congratulations on a fine piece of legislation which you are presently putting through the legislative assembly.

He is too sanguine, sir, he is too sanguine, if I may interpolate at this point, because I will have to inform him that the hon. leader of the government called these bills this afternoon because he wanted to indulge in the playing of games, I suppose.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): I thought the hon. member was against reading complimentary letters in the Legislature.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, he wanted to indulge in playing games, I say, apropos of that muttering of the hon. Provincial Secretary.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: It is the one letter in five years he has had that was complimentary:

Mr. Sopha: The letter, sir, continues:

Your Bill No. 35, designed to repeal the levying of a poll tax in cities, towns, villages and townships, will no doubt meet with the approval of every tax collector in the province.

For your information I have enclosed a photostatic copy of a poll tax survey made in October of 1961 showing the cities levying and not levying a poll tax and comments regarding them.

I have also enclosed a copy of a report on our methods of levying the tax. I sincerely hope that you use all available means at your disposal to ensure that Bill No. 35 is read a second and third time and finally passed.

Well, those are very encouraging words. That is signed, it is on the stationery of a municipal corporation and I am not going to refer to his name in case he might get into trouble and come up under review by those who employ him. I might say though, I will just give a little hint, that he is a tax collector in an urban municipality which is represented by the hon. Minister of the Crown who sits on the first two benches on the other side.

An hon. member: Who now sits?

Mr. Sopha: No, whose seat is on the first two benches.

Now this survey that he provides me I say has some illuminating comments. I am going to pick a few of the cities out in it and read the remark that was made as a result of this inquiry to the tax collectors.

Kitchener, which abolished it for 1964, but was still collecting it when this survey was made, the comment was: "Recommending abolition in 1962."

Brantford said: "Personally consider it not worth the cost."

Sarnia: "The cost to levy and collect is becoming more and more. Also is becoming more of a nuisance to collect."

Peterborough: "Revenue from this source is entirely offset by cost of collection."

Fort William: "Great many complaints that women should be liable too. Act should be revised."

Port Arthur—I say, Port Arthur—

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Now I will listen to this, it might be worthwhile.

Mr. Sopha: Port Arthur: "Recommending abolition of the tax in 1962."

Sault Ste. Marie: "It is an unpopular tax, with men, due to women not paying." Not very gallant in that community, not very chivalrous.

Mr. MacDonald: Gallantry is all concentrated in one man up there.

Mr. Sopha: Guelph: "Difficult to collect in many cases. Antiquated method of taxing."

Calt: "Tax is unpopular. A fair amount of work to administer."

Niagara Falls: "A nuisance, too hard to collect for result obtained."

Stratford—this may be a significant one. I hope not. "Requires considerable follow-up. We think a similar tax should be levied on females."

St. Thomas: "The poll tax is definitely a nuisance tax, the income not worth the bother."

Then I turn to a part of the survey which deals with municipalities which have abolished the tax.

Hamilton abolished it in 1959. North York, Ottawa, the township of York, the township of East York are among those who reported that they had never collected or levied the tax. London, London in the bush—

An hon. member: No representation from London?

Mr. Sopha: No representation from London at this point. They will never be able to carry the message back. London abolished it as of December 31, 1958. I would say that the hon. leader of the government, if he were here in his seat, I would say to him, that we could subscribe to the principle that what is good enough for London is good enough for the rest of the province.

The comment they made from London in reference to the abolition of the tax is: "It was felt that the cost of administration did not warrant its continuance."

Windsor abolished it in 1947. St. Catharines abolished it January 1, 1961 and made the comment: "Had always found it hard to collect."

Kingston, represented of course in this House for many years by that very vigilant and redoubtable defender of the civil rights of all in the democratic process, the former member, William M. Nickle. Kingston, did I say, Mr. Speaker, abolished it in 1937. Cornwall abolished it in 1930: "Too hard to collect. Very poor public relations."

Belleville abolished it in 1957. "Difficulty in collecting," said Belleville, "Found not worth while."

Chatham abolished it in 1941. North Bay abolished it in 1952.

Barrie abolished it in 1950 and the collector and treasurer made the comment that the good people of Barrie found that it was considered inequitable if applied only to males.

So one can see that a good argument can be made for the abolition of this tax from the point of view that any form of taxes should apply to the whole of the province rather than to specific areas. Whether a person lives in Barrie or Sarnia or Kingston or London, on the one hand, or lives in Sault Ste. Marie, Sudbury, Peterborough, Fort William or Guelph, then that person ought to know in a uniform way the type of taxes to which he is subject.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is not much else I want to say about it. I do not want to take the time of the House at any undue length, because I feel that I have made my argument. It just needs to be elaborated.

Mr. G. H. Peck (Scarborough Centre): Is that the same speech as in last year's Hansard?

Mr. Sopha: My answer to my hon. friend is no, because the matter did not come before the House this last year. It came before the House two or three years ago.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say this in conclusion, that I would be perfectly agreeable to living with this tax provided that municipalities which collected it were required as a condition precedent to its collection, to extend the franchise to all those who are required to pay it.

It is not the quantum of tax and it is needless to argue that whereas one home owner may pay $300 or $400 taxes and another may pay only $50, that one by reason of the fact that he pays so much more, or a multiple of what the other pays, that he has a greater right to vote. As I understand the democratic principle, it is that if any person pays any form of taxation whatsoever, notwithstanding the size or the amount that he pays, that that person ought to have a share in selecting those who are to govern. So if the government prefers not to allow this bill to pass, then I would urge them, and I suppose I must really urge the hon. member for High Park.

I observe he is no longer here, he has tired of the proceedings, so I had better address my remarks to the hon. member for St. David, who deputizes for him in these particulars and he might say to those in authority in government who hear me not, that if they will bring forward a measure that will require as a condition precedent that the vote be extended to persons who pay their tax, then the violation of the principle that I have stated of no taxation without representation will be cured and rectified.

Therefore, I say to you, sir, that I invite support for this amended bill from all corners of the House.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the abolition of poll tax as a representative from a small village that is not on that list.

For 12 years I sat in municipal council and the clerk of our village tried to collect the poll tax and he would notify them by letter or otherwise. Some would pay and most would not. We found it rather difficult to try to collect it, but in many instances where a man owned a property and he had a boy, two or three, coming to the age of paying the poll tax, often the father would put the son on the roll as a taxpayer, part owner of his property, and in so doing the son did not have to pay the poll tax and also had a vote in the municipality. So he not only got away from paying the $10 because his dad was fortunate enough to own a home, but along with it he had a vote and often the fathers were men who were aspiring to office in council. We found it very, very unjust; not fair to the ones who could not afford their homes and had children who were compelled by a peculiar law to pay the $10. So I, at that time, did not know what I know today, that municipalities could volunteer on their own to abolish it or at least quit collecting it. I suppose municipalities that do that, actually break the law, or is it permissive legislation?

Mr. Sopha: It is permissive legislation.

Mr. Bukator: Permissive legislation. Well, I would think if you were to—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Were you asking me a question?

Mr. Bukator: Oh, no, I was asking anybody who knows. I got the answer from the hon. member for Sudbury. He seems to be well acquainted with these things, as a matter of fact as well acquainted as anybody in the House.

But I felt at that time it was not fair. Some paid, a very small portion of them did, and so I feel that our hon. member for Sudbury has a bill that is worth looking into. I can imagine what will happen to it. The hon. member for High Park is back again! At least the government may bring in a bill of their own. We will support it, we will work along with them for a change and that will be a little out of the ordinary.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Will you pardon me, because I realize that there are more important matters to be discussed, Mr. Speaker, but as one who is interested in the government of municipalities in this province would you permit me a few moments?

As the hon. member for Sudbury has said, this is permissive legislation. Only a comparatively small number of municipalities in the province have passed the necessary by-law and those which have the collection facilities find it rather a valuable source of revenue. As a matter of fact I have a letter from one of the small cities, in which I am advised that this poll tax represents one-fifth of a mill.

In this country, the development of this particular type of tax applicable only to single men is to provide the municipality with some funds to assist the local ratepayers in the expenditures they have to undertake in the maintenance of certain facilities which, I might suggest to you, are at times used more by single men than they are used by married men. So, under these circumstances, I think we should leave the legislation as it is at the present time, purely permissive; those municipalities who wish to collect it may do so.

I would suggest to the hon. member for Sudbury that the report he was reading was, of course, a report prepared by a number of tax collectors; and of course the tax collectors would like to collect all of their taxes with one cheque each year and then they could stay home the rest of the year.

The thing to bear in mind is that the municipal councils have not passed those opinions you have read out, sir, necessarily; so I would suggest that the matter can be left in the hands of the municipal councils. If they have a tax collector then they instruct him what taxes they want him to collect, and he has to collect them. I would ask the House not to approve this particular piece of legislation.

Mr. Cowling: Is it all right now, Mr. Speaker, to move the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. Speaker: Has every member spoken who wishes to speak to this bill?

Mr. Cowling: moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Clerk of the House: The 29th order, the House in committee of supply; Mr. N. Whitney in the chair.

ONTARIO NORTHLAND TRANSPORTATION COMMISSION

Mr. A. Johnston (Parry Sound): Mr. Chairman, I understood from the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald) and the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Troy) that they had several questions they wished to ask. From their comments I understood they were interested in the changes mentioned, in the operation of the railway, which take effect on Sunday, April 25.

The main reason we are making changes is, of course, to improve the service of the railway to the people in the north country. The hon. member for York South made reference in his comments to the letters of complaint from certain people in the north country regarding changes in the service. In order to be entirely fair I think it should be noted that the complaints he read to the House were all from the one newspaper, the Timiskaming-Speaker.

As a matter of interest to the House, I have favourable comments from all the other municipalities on the line except the one municipality to which the hon. member for York South made reference.

In explaining why we are making this drastic change in our operations, we have found that the revenue from the train which we are deleting has been going down every year for the past ten. The revenue, of course, has been going to the transport companies because we are not able to provide service in time for them to get their express, and their LCL particularly, the same day.

As a matter of fact, at the present time, the LCL from Toronto to Timmins is taking four days to be delivered in Timmins and Cochrane. Under this new merchandizing train which we are operating, starting on Sunday, we propose to give the people of Timmins, Cochrane, and all points north of North Bay, overnight service on LCL, their mail, and their express.

As I said before, I thought that when we had discussed this at government commissions I was quite sure that all of those members on government commissions, including the hon. member for York South and the hon. member for Nipissing, understood thoroughly the proposed changes.

I still hope, Mr. Chairman, that they understand them, and I would be glad to answer any questions they may have in connection with this because I think that it needs some clarification to the members generally, as to what we propose to do.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman, I do not know if I understand thoroughly the reasons for the changes but, as far as I understand it, the Canadian National Railways is certainly the train which brings the freight and mail and passengers from the south to the north, and its terminus is at North Bay. It was going to make certain changes in the operation of its trains 46 and 47 and other trains, and naturally the Ontario Northland had to fit in with that plan.

I might say, too, that while the hon. member for York South had referred in his presentation earlier to complaints from the New Liskeard area, it is my understanding from talking to people along the line that there are other places complaining. I know that the town of Timmins—I do not know just how many signed the petition which was circulated in that town and other places, but I know that the mayor of Timmins was quite concerned in regard to mail. I know that, earlier, I brought to the attention of the hon. Minister (Mr. Simonett) the complaint of the railway mail clerks. They do not subscribe to the proposition of the hon. Minister, that the new services will mean speedier service.

In fact this is their position, and it is set out by the third vice-president of the Association of the Mail Clerks of Canada, their national association. He points out that the supposition that the post office department will use trains 347 and 346—in brackets here it says “the Blue Goose”, and I do not know which train that is—has already been disclaimed publicly:

As seen in our letter of information, that departure time at Toronto was not compatible to our operation. Other reasons are: there is no heat, no one in charge of the car, such as a baggage man, therefore security regulations would not permit first class matter to use this media. Also this train will not leave the passenger terminal at the Union Station. The term “express terminal” could mean in a short time the hump yard at Maple.

Trains 49 and 50—which are known as the Northland:

—will continue to carry mails but the bulk of the mails for the north are not received at Toronto until after train 49 leaves.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Ontario Northland.

Mr. Troy: What is the reference?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: You said Northland.

Mr. Troy: Ontario Northland—

Mr. A. Johnston: The hon. Minister said Ontario.

Mr. Troy: Well, is that not what it is?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Yes, that is right. But you said Northland. I was just correcting you.

Mr. Troy: Thank you very much.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): I do not know how we can get along without the hon. Minister of Mines.

Mr. Troy: I am always glad that we have somebody in the wings to give us the cues.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): I did not think the hon. Minister of Mines had any other northland except Ontario.

Mr. Troy: I may point out here, to hon. members that train 49 leaves Toronto at seven o'clock in the evening and that train, as the vice-president points out, has departed too early for much mail to be processed in Toronto. This is the reason for maintaining a railway post office on train 47.

The moving of processed mail from Toronto to North Bay or North Bay north is not the problem. The delays would stem from overloaded, space-starved terminal post offices trying to complete the business received at that post office first, after which transient mails are processed.

The railways are faced with exactly the same problem: no matter how fast a service exists. One must first of all place the express, freight or mail, on this train to utilize its speed. If, by delaying the departure of this express train for two hours we could serve another 25,000 to 50,000 people this, to me, would seem the proper thing to do.

That is, to delay the express service. That is the first point.

Mr. A. Johnston: Is the hon. member talking about express or mail?

Mr. Troy: This is the presentation of the railway mail clerks' third vice-president. I will repeat his argument there.

The moving of processed mail from Toronto to North Bay or North Bay north is not the problem. The delays would stem from overloaded, space-starved terminal post offices trying to complete the business received by that post office first, after which transient mails are processed.

The railways are faced with exactly the same problem no matter how fast a service exists. One must first of all place the express, freight or mail on this train to utilize its speed.

Presumably he is referring to the new train No. 47.

If by delaying the departure of this express train by two hours we could serve another 25,000 or 50,000 people, this, to me, would seem the proper thing to do.

The figures you have quoted on the effect of change of revenues on the Ontario Northland Railway—the figures you have quoted I can only accept as a true picture, although the difference between direct costing and indirect costing, namely, $650,000, would probably still exist if both 47 and 46 and the express train were withdrawn.

Mr. A. Johnston: May I ask the hon. member a question? What is he referring to by $650,000?

Mr. Troy: This is, I presume, in answer to the hon. Minister's letter of March 6, 1964, to Mr. J. A. Belland.

Mr. A. Johnston: Who quoted the $650,000?

Mr. Troy: In the hon. Minister's letter he brings out this figure under the heading "Effect of Change of Revenues on the Ontario Northland Railway." It goes on: "The annual operating cost is—"

Mr. A. Johnston: The hon. member must have some authority for these figures.

Mr. Troy: Yes, I am just reading the hon. Minister's argument. Apparently there must have been some—

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Read it all then, if you want it in the record.

Mr. Troy: Pardon me?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Read it all.

Mr. Troy: In the hon. Minister's letter, he had a paragraph on the "Effect of Change of Revenues on the Ontario Northland Railway" and Mr. Leason's letter of March 13, 1964 is in answer to the hon. Minister, I presume, to the figures the hon. Minister has quoted—

Hon. Mr. Simonett: That is right. But if you would read my letter then we would get the facts, sir, as they were put by the Minister. I do not know what is in the answer. I do not have it with me.

Mr. Troy: You know your letter.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I know it, yes, but the House does not.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): Well, you read it.

Mr. Troy: I will repeat again:

The figures you have quoted I can only accept as a true picture although the difference between direct costing and indirect costing, namely, $650,000 would probably still exist if both 47 and 46 and the express train were withdrawn.

Now the hon. Minister had said in his letter that the annual operating cost of trains 46 and 47 is between $550,000 and $1,200,000, depending on the amount of indirect costs included. So if you deduct $550,000 from $1,200,000, I think you will arrive at the figure of $650,000.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Would you read that statement again. I said "between".

Mr. Troy: Yes, that is right. The statement you had made; the annual operating costs of trains 46 and 47 is between $550,000 and $1,200,000 depending on the amount of indirect costs included.

Now Mr. Leason's reference concerns the figures the hon. Minister has quoted in his letter of March 13, 1964.

I can only accept as a true picture although the difference between direct costing and indirect costing, namely, $650,000 would probably still exist if both 46 and 47 and the express train were withdrawn.

Trains No. 46 and 47 are the two trains that are now operating as passenger trains, passenger and express and mail to and from Timmins and the express train is the new train to be in service after the changes become effective April 26, 1964. Mr. Leason continues:

Nevertheless, these costs must be met and the amount of revenue we expect to retain on the ONR portion of this operation from the post office will be quite a bit short of your expectations.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: How would the direct costs remain if the trains were not running?

Mr. Troy: I am just commenting on this man's argument.

Nevertheless, these costs must be met, and the amount of revenue you expect to retain on the ONR portion of this operation from the post office will be quite a bit short of your expectations.

Using your figure of $122,000 per annum as the average revenue received from the post office department by the ONR, some $92,227.20 of this figure is paid for the mail car on trains 46 and 47, plus a very conservative estimate of overflow mail in the baggage car. It is handled exclusively by railway mail clerks at no expense to the ONR. Another $8,409.60 per annum is paid. This reduces the revenue now received by the ONR to approximately $20,000.

By using the above figures, Mr. Leason points out:

I cannot possibly accede to your statement that the railway hopes to improve its revenue by this change. Even if I did agree that this service was necessary, with the reduction of commission agents, freight and express people, which is not my concern, the one point we cannot understand is the emphasis placed on the departure time from Toronto by the railways concerned. With very little thought and co-operation both the CNR and the ONR could retain all post office revenues simply by delaying departure of this express train, this new operation you are going to put in on the 27th, until 10.30 p.m., and supplying the car with heat. The schedule, as laid down, could be maintained with the same stops. I am quite sure the railway mail service can very easily adapt its operations to the needs of this train.

The point he brings out is that if you delayed that train for two hours, or at least an hour and a half, you would then also get mail which arrives at the Toronto postal terminal after the departure of train No. 49, and still provide speedy service.

Mr. Leason continues:

The removal of this postal service now, the railway mail clerks allege, will evoke the delays as stated in our previous letter which was sanctioned and accepted as true facts by senior officials of The Post Office Department at Ottawa. It will affect not only the railway mail clerks on the ONR part of the operation, but the CNR portion as well. These men will then displace other people in other centres of Ontario.

The result, of course, is more unemployment; but worse than this is the loss to the citizens of Ontario of 34 specialists in the correct despatching and routing of mails which, to reach this level, takes years of constant study, experience and yearly examinations which demand a mark above 97 per cent to maintain.

The sorting of mail en route is the only method whereby delays can be kept to a minimum and a complete efficient communication system, serving not only industry and commerce but all people in northern Ontario equally.

This letter is signed by K. G. Leason, the third vice-president, who is based with The Post Office Department in the Scarborough area.

Now, just before you answer this, the railway mail clerks also pointed out that under the scheme The Post Office Department is going to have additional terminals, for example, as I indicated previously, Cochrane post office will be a terminal. The railway mail clerks point out that the postal clerks in these smaller places have nothing like the knowledge of despatch and routing of mail the railway mail clerks have; and that if these mail clerks will be taken off there will be no RPOs on the train, the clerks will be back into the North Bay post office. Some of them, I believe, now live in Timmins; I do not know what is going to happen to them. Will they be brought into North Bay? That is a matter, of course, for The Post Office Department.

But, nevertheless, the ONR and the CNR are indirectly responsible, probably directly responsible, for changes; and so you are at least indirectly responsible for the possibility of people being out of work, or in other jobs at less salary. I will just leave that for the moment.

Mr. A. Johnston: In reply to the hon. member for Nipissing, I am assured the mail clerks will not lose their positions. They will stay in Timmins or North Bay. And I am informed that one of their chief complaints is that when they are travelling, and sort mail en route, they get 22 per cent more salary. Of course, personally, I feel sorry for them; they are now grounded and, as a result, they take a reduction in salary. But other than the personal feeling, I do not see why the ONR should subsidize the postal people, because they make their own arrangements as to where these people are.

The hon. member made reference to a poorer service for the people in the north regarding mail. I have here a statement, and I think the hon. member for Nipissing read it too, from the district postal inspector, Mr. Philea—and I would like to read it—in which he states:

The Ontario Northland Railway's efforts to streamline its mail-carrying operations will result in a more efficient service for northern Ontario according to reports from the district director of postal services, J. C. A. Philea.

So I do not think it is quite correct to say that there would be any deterioration of service, because the postal inspector himself says it will be improved.

The hon. member did make mention of the fact that 49 leaves at seven o'clock and some of the mail could be left behind. Probably it is my fault that I did not tell him, when he asked me about this before, that there is a

CNR and ONR joint effort—a tractor-trailer—leaving Toronto at approximately the same time as 47 originally left, which is taking the mail not taken by 49. Once again, the inspector states that this mail will be received in North Bay earlier than before.

In respect to the loss of revenue which has been mentioned, there was an announcement by someone about two months ago in the north country that the ONR stood to lose $400,000 in revenue, or in profit, on the change in our operations. But the total revenue—and this is not profit—which the ONR received last year was $170,000, and we still maintain all of our mail revenue other than what was on 46 and 47.

I would like to point out we still have all of the 49 and 50 mail; we still have all the mail north of Cochrane. It is a very small portion of the mail business we are losing. As a matter of fact, I am informed that we are losing about $60,000 in revenue which actually means, as far as profit is concerned, practically nothing; because we are carrying this mail on an old contract which has not been adjusted for several years.

Mr. Troy: There is one point the acting chairman of the commission brought out, about the railway mail clerks losing salary. I discussed that with the railway mail clerks when we had an interview with them; it was not salary they would lose. I think there was a certain amount of a living allowance when they travelled up and down on the train. What is certain, when they are brought back into the terminals, the post offices, and are not doing the very expert job they had before, is that they may have reductions then. There are certain other points, and I might as well finish mine.

I do know, though, that the chairman says that this new service will benefit the north, and in every way it will be all to the good. Well, we will have to wait and see. We know that the mail is going to be trucked, I understand, from The Post Office Department, I was in Ottawa with the railway mail clerks, and The Post Office Department said they are going to truck it mostly. There will be trucks from North Bay to Kirkland Lake, and Kirkland Lake to Timmins, and so on—about five different services. The complaint of the railway mail clerks is that the ones going to suffer are the small places. Maybe others will speak on this subject.

There are several things about the operation of the railway. We have not yet seen in this House the result of that three-prong survey made by the former Minister of Economics and Development, and who is now the hon. member for Riverdale (Mr. Macaulay). We had a three-prong survey which was going to go into all the operations of the Ontario Northland. That is one of the weaknesses of the present system, we do not get those reports. I am sure that the Legislature would not have been able to take action on it, but at least we could know about these things.

Then again there is the present setup, not only of the commission itself but the management of the railway. With all due respect to the present general manager, he is a communications man. He is originally from a telephone company and one of the services of the Ontario Northland has is a communication system which has been earning money and very likely will be earning more money because of the contract with the federal government—with that new microwave line that you put up there. The hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts) pointed out once in North Bay, they are spending $7 million. But you are getting that $7 million back again, I understand. It is guaranteed and there will be no loss to the ONR.

Now I must say, and I am thinking back over the years since I have been in the north country and that goes a long way back. The one time that the railway, I think, operated at great efficiency with a very fine spirit among the employees and certainly a fine operation of the road, was when there was brought in to operate the railway by the then Prime Minister of this province, Mitchell Hepburn, a very well qualified man from the Canadian National Railways, Mr. Arthur Cavanagh. It operated well; certainly there was good harmony, I know, with the service.

That is one of the complaints which you hear among the working force that, as the chairman knows, there is a certain amount of unrest and has been in the railway. They just wonder why they did not pick a railroad man to be the general manager. I suppose at the present time, though, the service that you operate that is making money is the communications service.

By the way, who made that appointment? Was it made in the time of the acting chairman?

Mr. A. Johnston: The appointment of Mr. Frith?

Mr. Troy: Yes.

Mr. A. Johnston: No, that appointment was made when Colonel Reynolds, who is now deceased, was chairman, just shortly before he retired as chairman. Mr. Frith previously was the manager of our communications system. Fortunately it is our most profitable branch of the service.

I might say, in mitigation with respect to that, that 20 years ago the Ontario Northland was chiefly a railroad operating service. Today it has branched out into the boat lines, it has branched out into hotel management, communications and the various other operations so that a good administrator certainly has merit. But as to who decided Mr. Frith would be general manager, I was not the chairman so I cannot say that.

Mr. Troy: In that report that was presented to the former Minister of Economics and Development, was it recommended by them?

Mr. A. Johnston: I have the Price-Waterhouse report and I appreciate the interest of the hon. member for Nipissing in it. I think probably it would be very fine if he sat down and read the report.

Mr. Troy: Is it too lengthy to have it repeated and given to others that may be interested?

Mr. A. Johnston: I would have to take that under advisement. I have no direction on it yet, so I will discuss it with them again. I think that it would be fair to say this, that Price-Waterhouse did a very comprehensive report on the ONR, on all of the operations. They had Professor McDougall from Queen's also, and as a matter of interest we have implemented all of the recommendations that Price-Waterhouse made except one. One recommendation that Price-Waterhouse made was that the ONR install throughout all their office operations IBM machines, but this involved a very heavy expenditure and, of course, the hon. member for Nipissing and myself know that it would also eventually mean certain layoffs of personnel. I am too sensitive to that and I think he is too, so the one recommendation that we did not implement was the installation of IBM machines.

Mr. Troy: There is one thing about the commission itself; the hon. leader of the government is not here but I can say to the hon. Minister to whom the commission reports, I think it is high time that the commission itself had some reorganization. As the hon. member for York South has pointed out in that letter he had read, at least I think it was a newspaper editorial, Mr. Chairman, that some commission members were not from the area serviced by the Northland at all. Although I must say that the hon. member for Cochrane North (Mr. Brunelle) while not living on the ONR line, nevertheless I think he knows very well the problems of the north. But I think we could dispense now, with all due respect to him, the former member for Algoma-Manitowlin. As I mentioned before, the late Mr. Aubert, when he was appointed, represented labour on the commission I believe, and I think that they should have possibly some voice on the commission.

I should have mentioned this much earlier. I just want to pay—I am sure the House will let me pay—respect to that marvellous location engineer who laid much of the lines of the ONR, the late William R. "Pete" Maher. Pete was a legend in the north country. He was a native of that section of the Ottawa valley from which many of our railroaders have come, both on the CPR, CNR and ONR.

He died just recently and I think that the hon. member for Cochrane North and the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner) will certainly remember that great location engineer, Peter Maher. I just wanted to make some reference to him.

Now I have other complaints in regard to employees. They are somewhat uncertain about what is going to happen with this new LCL service. You are changing the operation to a freight operation. I believe the CNR has taken over the freight shed at North Bay as its terminal and the ONR will take over the CNR shed at Noranda as the ONR terminal. Now what is going to happen to these employees of the ONR based in North Bay and other areas in regard to this change of service of express and freight? What effect will that have? Will they have to go to the CNR and will they do so? Will they retain all their seniority and their pension benefits and other considerations?

Mr. A. Johnston: Arrangements were made when the Ontario Northland Railway assumed the express at Noranda and Cochrane and Timmins that we would take over their employees and their union considerations, their pension plans completely. Then the same thing applied at North Bay, the CNR would take over the Ontario Northland Railway employees.

Those employees who do not wish to transfer to the CNR, have been guaranteed employment with the ONR. My information is that 99 per cent of the employees have gone to the CNR and, in the same vein, I understand all of the CNR employees have come over to the ONR because they lose no seniority whatsoever.

Mr. Troy: Then is there lowering in wages if they stay with the ONR?

Mr. A. Johnston: We pay them the same wages. Does that answer your question?

Mr. Troy: Yes, as long as the seniority and the pension rights and those things are protected and, knowing that they do not want to move, say, from North Bay to Noranda, they will still have employment with the ONR and still be protected.

Mr. A. Johnston: Yes.

Mr. Troy: That is all right. Now, about the port of Moosonee. We have not heard much about it recently. It was one of the dreams of the former member for Victoria, and also of the former chairman of the ONR commission, but there is one thing I want to mention. I believe that the ONR controls all the town-site of Moosonee.

Mr. A. Johnston: Excuse me; I would not say we control it. We own the major number of the lots.

Mr. Troy: Then, since the RCAF is up there, and since the area is growing to some extent, and since you are trying to increase traffic up there, and since we have already had a word of sympathy for our Indian population—the hon. Minister of Public Welfare (Mr. Cecile) has had a committee, and the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts) has a committee, and we are going to do a lot of things for the Indians—it seems to me, Mr. Minister, and Mr. Chairman of the commission—

By the way, I said chairman because I understand the media controlled by that very well-known member of the Conservative Party when he was here in Canada, and who is now Lord Thomson of Fleet—his papers, his radio and his TV stations—are now calling the hon. member for Parry Sound the chairman of the ONR. So would you make that matter legal and make him the chairman, and no longer acting chairman?

But the point—

Hon. Mr. Simonett: That was very heavy, that one.

Mr. Troy: You heard that, Mr. Minister.

I refer to Moosonee, about the fact that the bulk of the area is under the control of the ONR. Why do you not give those Indians an opportunity to get their own lots? Why should they bother building a home, any kind of a decent home, when they have no security in the place? No wonder there are shacks up there. No wonder they live in certain unhealthy conditions.

If only you would give them the opportunity to have their homes, if you only gave them an opportunity to get, not the statute labour board which the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton) was going to set up last year, but services for water and sewage.

This year, I understand, you are going to set up a tent camp up there. Well, I am afraid of possible developments. There is always the possibility that it will be because of the sanitary conditions in that area—that you will be flirting with an epidemic. I suggest that you think of that and give these Indians an opportunity, now that they have a chance for gainful employment at the station and in other ways. I think it would be certainly a great help along that line.

Mr. A. Johnston: Do you want me to comment?

Mr. Troy: Yes, I want you to comment on that.

Mr. A. Johnston: I appreciated that, and one of the reasons we have not handed these lots over to the Indians, of course, is the health hazard there. But we must get the spot settled once and for all.

In the year-end review, I made some comments on this, and if you do not mind, I will read them to you:

The commission is responsible for the administration of the townsite of Moosonee. Because of the increasing frequency of a number of problems relevant to the administration of the townsite, the commissioners have decided that there should be a new and more comprehensive development programme.

In view of the various branches of the government involved, both Dominion and provincial, and including the great problem involving The Department of Indian Affairs, it has been decided that the only reasonable solution would be to hire a firm of engineers and town planners to make a study and to provide the commission with recommendations.

The commission, with the assistance of the community planning branch, asked for tenders to complete this programme and accepted the bid of Project Planning Associates Limited of Toronto. This firm has been asked to secure facts pertaining to the social, physical and economic character of Moosonee area, to enable the government of Ontario to make policy decisions regarding future services for Moosonee.

One of the great problems there, of course, is the sewage, as the hon. member for Nipissing has mentioned. This is government policy and, in all fairness to the ONR, I do not feel that the Ontario Northland Railway should get involved in building sewers.

In my own opinion, I think the ONR should 'revert back to the purpose for which it was originally intended. Certainly the ONR never was intended to build sewers. We now have the report from the community associates. We have just received it. Once again, I would be very glad to make it available to the hon. member for Nipissing.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that if the government of Ontario is quite willing to spend money on a statute labour board, to set up a statute labour board in an area with a mile and a half or two miles of roads, it would certainly be quite willing to do something to provide services, particularly when it is bringing people up there. You are inviting them to come up to this tourist area, and you take responsibility for sanitation and health when you take them up there. I suggest that if the commission does not feel it is its responsibility, then it should recommend to the government that it be done.

There are just one or two other things. You have an office in the city of Toronto; I think I have mentioned this before. On each occasion I go to the sportsmen's show, there is nothing there which is really any publicity of promotion for the Ontario Northland. I think also that here, in the city of Toronto, which is the hub of a great industrial area in which most of the people of Ontario live, you should have promotional men down here as well.

Another thing, too. What are you going to call this particular train you are going to run up there now? Is it to be called the Blue Goose special? Is it?

Mr. A. Johnston: I am not prepared to answer that.

Mr. Troy: I know.

An hon. member: It is a very good name, anyway.

Mr. Troy: Well, it is a very good name, and very descriptive. There was another point but it has escaped my memory at the moment and I will defer now to the hon. member for York South.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, there are a number of comments and questions I would like to make. But let me at the outset say that if I left the impression, because I was quoting only from the Timiskaming-Speaker, that it is my view it is only in that area there is any undercurrent of unhappiness in regard to these decisions, let me disabuse the chairman's mind.

He is aware of the fact that the petition which I tabled with the hon. Minister has names from North Bay, from Cobalt, from Englehart, from New Liskeard, from Larder Lake, from Virginiatown. You attended a meeting in Haileybury at which I think gave you some indication of the temper of the people there. I know I have had personal representations from other places along the line; and maybe, just to cap the whole thing—I thought this was the unkindest cut of all—following the visit to the north of the “whiz-bang” Minister, a story datelined Cobalt, appeared in the North Bay Nugget:

Now I know how Alice felt in Wonderland, Mayor Mamie Cunningham said this morning. Mrs. Cunningham and the Cobalt council had a private session with the Ontario Northland Transportation Commission in a special railroad car Thursday night before the commission attended a public meeting in Haileybury.

And then there is a paragraph in direct quotes:

They are very nice people but completely divorced from reality, she said. If they want to economize I suggest they fire the experts and hire a few housewives.

Now that is really damning with faint praise and in just about as harsh fashion as I have heard for quite some time. I am sure this hard-hitting man of the man's world, our hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management, has never been cut to the quick quite as badly as he is in that comment.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I do not take that out of it.

Mr. MacDonald: You do not take that out of it? Well, each to his own interpretation!

Mr. Chairman, I think some of the difficulties that have arisen with regard to the reactions up in the north are derived from an uncertainty as to exactly what is the commission's position.

For example, I recall during the meeting of the standing committee when the commission came before us that I quoted from the North Bay Nugget, following that meeting in Haileybury, the concluding part of the final paragraph in which it referred to the representatives of the ONR stating that the whole thing is experimental and may be revised after a couple of months. My recollection is that at the meeting this was denied; the chairman said this was not experimental at all. This decision had been made and it looked like a fixed decision.

A day or so ago when we raised the matter again—I have not had a chance to check in Hansard because it has not yet been printed—but my recollection was that the hon. Minister said: “Six months from now we might review the situation.” It is this kind of apparent indecision that I think is creating some of the uncertainty in the north. Indeed, let me take one specific case here. I was interested in the interjections of the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs with regard to the Elk Lake subdivision, because a few years ago, so it has been drawn to my attention, the ONR replaced a $100,000 bridge across the St. Jean Baptiste river at Mileage 10.8 on the Elk Lake division. That took place at the very time when apparently negotiations were going on with regard to discontinuing this line. I am not certain as to whether the negotiations had reached the point of just rampant rumour or some form of official announcement last year, but certainly a real storm broke in that area at the prospect that they were going to close that line down altogether.

Maybe the hon. Minister is in the position, or the chairman is in the position, to confirm this, but certainly there are a great many people in the north who believe that there was heavy political pressure put on this government—indeed right at the level of the hon. Prime Minister or so I have heard it contended many times—as a result of which the consideration of cutting off this subdivision outright has at least gone into abeyance. I do not know how much of this is fact.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): You were listening to rumours like a lot of other people who start them.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I just want to make this point. I repeat I do not know how much of this is fact, but something is sadly wrong when you have created an atmosphere in which these rumours are rampant. The question of whether or not the Elk Lake subdivision is going to be cut off or whether it is not going to be cut off, is a very pertinent point in the minds of the people who are going back to the basic question: is this a development road; or is it, as the editorial in the Timiskaming-Speaker said, being run by a group of people who cannot see past the nearest dollar bill?

However, let me get to one or two specific questions. In the course of that meeting at Haileybury, as reported in the Northern Daily News in this instance, there is a paragraph that says:

Acting ONR chairman Allister Johnston, Parry Sound, said that the railroad had not yet purchased Grant's Transport but did not deny that negotiations were underway. He promised that the ONR would let the citizens know if the purchase is seriously contemplated.

I wonder if the chairman would comment on the present status of these negotiations.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: We did not create the rumours.

Mr. A. Johnston: That is exactly correct. They asked me had we purchased Grant's Transport and the answer was no. And they said: If you do purchase it, will you let us know? And I said, we sure will let you know; and the situation is still the same today.

Mr. MacDonald: Are there negotiations for the purchase—

Mr. A. Johnston: No, sir.

Mr. MacDonald: None at all? It is all rumour, too?

Mr. A. Johnston: It is all rumour, the same as Elk Lake. In connection with Elk Lake, how can we stop rumours? We have not made any change in our operations at Elk Lake in the last ten years.

Mr. Troy: Do you want to, though?

Mr. A. Johnston: No, but how do you stop rumours there when people start talking about it? There are rumours about elections all the time but it is just newspaper talk.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: It is still running.

Mr. MacDonald: It was contended that there were negotiations to cut that line off.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: With whom?

Mr. MacDonald: If the hon. Minister says there is absolutely no foundation, I will accept that.

Mr. A. Johnston: In a lighter vein, I would like to say to the hon. member for York South I have here a recent clipping. You mentioned Cobalt and said that we were treating them like Alice in Wonderland. I have a recent clipping in which you might be interested from Mamie Cunningham in which she states:

You get a devil of a lot more today by negotiations than by putting out a blue goose.

Someone made reference to that:

Mrs. Cunningham, fresh from Toronto, said that she had consulted with the ONR chairman and had managed to get service to Cobalt the same as before.

I would be willing to send it over, if you want me to. As far as I know, the only municipality that has really complained, and you say you have petitions from various people—

Mr. MacDonald: I tabled it with the hon. Minister.

Mr. A. Johnston: You tabled them, but I have received favourable comments from every municipality on the line. At the present time the only one that was against the proposed changes was the town of Haileybury. In fairness to them I cannot quite blame them because they wanted to have the centralization for the area at Haileybury, but New Liskeard being much the larger town we centralized our services there and naturally Haileybury objected to it.

Mr. MacDonald: I would say that the number of names on that petition from Englehart would suggest that there is considerable concern in that town. However, let us not argue about who is concerned one way or the other—

Mr. A. Johnston: That is very interesting, because the mayor of Englehart was in to see me Saturday afternoon and I asked him were the people happy and he said, "We are perfectly happy in Englehart; we always have problems but we have nothing of any consequence."

Mr. MacDonald: I am glad to have that on the record; I will send that Hansard back to a few of them.

Now let me get down to two basic points that I want to raise. These are very basic. When we were before the standing committee on government commissions there was considerable discussion as to whether or not the ONR has not now become too heavy. As somebody put it, it is "all chiefs and no Indians."

I must say at the time the hon. Minister momentarily silenced me by revealing that there had been this investigation by the Price-Waterhouse Company and his contention then was that Price-Waterhouse had, in effect, endorsed the present structure and that you were living within that structure; indeed, that there was even one position that you had not filled because of the criticism.

Now the more I have reflected on this and the more people who are living in that area are considering it, they find this difficult to believe and to understand. Because the fact of the matter is, Mr. Chairman, that the ONR some 40 years ago now was running three times as many trains and there was only a handful of top officials. I have heard it said it was four, I have heard it said it was five or six or seven.

Now, it may well be that Price-Waterhouse has said that this is a great and growing railroad, that you need these many departments. I acknowledge that there have been new facets of the activity of the ONR in your boats and in your hotels and things of this nature. But I still find it difficult to understand why the commission used to be three and the commission is now five. You had three times as many trains running back in the 1920s and yet you had only this handful of officials.

Indeed, it was pointed out to me that back in those days wheat was routed over from the CNR to the east coast, that livestock were carried from Cochrane to North Bay. During the winters of 1920, 1921, 1922 and 1923 a train was cleared through New Liskeard every 34 minutes during 24 hours. And now, with this big overhead, this does not happen every seven hours. In fact, they point out that in 1964—and just let me repeat this for the record, though we dealt with it at the committee—in 1964 these are your chiefs. You have one acting chairman and an assistant, one general manager and an assistant, one superintendent and three assistants, one rule instructor, one trainmaster, one superintendent of transport, one superintendent of freight and express, two chief despatchers, one superintendent of motor power and an assistant, one master mechanic and an assistant, one superintendent of transport, one superintendent of buses, one superintendent of boats and water transportation, one superintendent of dining cars and restaurants, one superintendent of communications and three assistants, one general manager, two public relations in Toronto, one passenger traffic manager, one superintendent of maintenance way employees, four roadmasters, one superintendent of bridges and buildings and one assistant.

Mr. Troy: And there is the research department.

Mr. MacDonald: Quite apart from the research department.

That sounds like a pretty top-heavy organization for a railroad of this size with only 500 miles. If this railroad were developing in the fashion in which it was originally conceived it should develop, then it might begin to justify this. But the simple fact which I do not think the acting chairman can deny is that 40 years ago, with as many chiefs or heads in the ONR as you could count on the fingers of one hand, you were running three times as many trains. In fact the figures, I think, depend on what period you pick.

I wonder if the acting chairman would comment on that aspect again?

Mr. A. Johnston: Well, I was trying to follow the hon. member with my chart and I lost him about half way down. When the hon. member mentioned this at the committee on government commissions, my secretary told me afterwards that he was incorrect in his references to previous employees. I checked it afterwards and I found, since I have been chairman, that there have only been two additional appointments made. But, as a matter of interest, the hon. member says there is an acting chairman and an assistant acting chairman. Who does he mean?

Mr. MacDonald: You haven't an assistant?

Mr. A. Johnston: Well, I would like to know.

But I think there is a lot of merit in what the hon. member for York South says. Maybe all of Price-Waterhouse's recommendations do not have to be necessary, so I am watching these. We have tried to eliminate some of the chiefs, and have a few more braves and a few less chiefs.

Since I have become acting chairman, it is true I did appoint a manager of the Toronto office; and incidentally, the sales office in Toronto has been, in my opinion, very successful; it is a very busy office. I think the hon. member for Nipissing mentioned this.

I think, with an operation such as this, you cannot do too little in public relations. I think you must promote, and if you have something to sell you use people of that type. I personally would sooner have ten salesmen than one assistant superintendent, as the hon. member for York South said. Does that answer the question?

Mr. MacDonald: Well, my final point, Mr. Chairman: I cannot go into detail and argue the necessity for having a different man for each one of these different positions. All I can say is that in 40 years you have certainly proliferated in these positions until you got three or four times as many top people as you had then—and the railway is running fewer trains. On that one point alone it seems to me that the case has considerable validity.

But the basic one, Mr. Chairman, which I think is disturbing the people of the north—and this is what they come back to all the time—is the growing suspicion that the people who are running the ONR are now running a business in which they are so captivated with its ledger that they are forgetting the original objective of the ONR, which was a development railway.

I had somebody up there, who has been on that railway longer than you might think, draw to my attention a comparison between the situation on our side and that on the Quebec side. They sent me a map of the Abitibi section on the Quebec side and pointed out the kind of things which are happening in the development of the frontier of Quebec. I concede that there are other policies the Quebec government has for what might be described as northern or frontier development, apart from what the railway would be expected to do. But certainly the development of northern Quebec puts into the shadow what is happening on the Ontario side.

And since the ONR is our chief instrument for doing this, I think we had better take another look at it.

It is drawn to my attention, for example, that they are now in the process of opening a highway to Rupert House on James Bay. Well, I can recall, God rest his soul, the former chairman, who said that over his dead body would there be a highway built up to James Bay. And indeed it is now being discussed on the Quebec side that they are going to build a railroad to haul the iron ore from Belcher's. Now, this is going to be very interesting and embarrassing.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: It is a pipe dream.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Minister of Mines says it is a pipe dream. If it is a pipe dream, I can tell you there have been at least two elections fought on that pipe dream in this province already, with the Prime Minister of the province leading with this dazzling vision. This was not a Diefenbaker vision, this was a Frost vision—

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: There is plenty of it up there, but not in the Belcher's.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, wherever it is, all I am saying is: Let us not get sidetracked on that unessential detail. There are discussions now going on, so I am told, in northern Quebec, of not only building a road but a railroad right through to James Bay and into that iron ore territory. This is the point which impresses me most in the examination of the ONR's activities. It is true the revenues have tended to decline some in recent years but you yourself, in your annual report which I quoted in my introductory remarks in 1962, indicated that your financial position was a little better.

True, you ran into difficulties last year. You ran into what, we trust, will be non-recurring drops in revenue, such as the New York strike. And you now are facing the prospect of increases in revenues from your communications investigations, from the Boston Creek development. And with all that is happening around Timmins these days, who knows, you may have to double-track the blessed railway to cope with what is happening in northeastern Ontario.

It seemed to me that there was premature panic because of this preoccupation with the ledger sheets. You are getting away from the original objective of the ONR and its development. I would say, as a concluding comment, that if the ONR commission wants to rebuild confidence in northeastern Ontario—and I hope that I can persuade them that at the moment there is enough discussion and enough rumour and enough criticism that confidence is not at the point that it should be—I think it has to give more convincing proof of the fact that the ONR is still a development railway and is willing to take some lead, and even do a bit of pioneering for the development of the northeast in somewhat the same fashion as they are doing on the Quebec side.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, I just want to support what the hon. member for York South has said because we have not got the department in Ontario, as they have in Quebec, in regard to northern affairs. At one time we had, in this province, a Department of Northern Development. Each one of these commissioners will have to be, himself, the one who is most concerned with development. I am sure that even the hon. member for Cochrane North and the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs will also admit that there is a feeling, just as the hon. member for York South has said, that the development picture has been dim.

You have also a transportation truck service. Gosh knows, you were told about 25 years before it was put into operation that you should get into the trucking business; but you have it now and it is called a transfer company, the Star Transfer Company. Anybody would think all you are doing is carrying baggage to a station, or delivering it to some depot. No one would get the impression that the Star Transfer is running from Toronto to Timmins, to Cochrane, to Kirkland Lake and these other places. Have you any intention or any thought of changing the name of that service?

Mr. A. Johnston: We have asked our solicitor to investigate the cost of changing the name to Star Transport Limited, or some such name as that. Of course, before you change the name you must make sure that there is no other company in Canada of that type.

Mr. Troy: How about some Indian name?

Mr. A. Johnston: Well, yes, we could call it the Star Blue Goose, perhaps. But we have asked our legal counsel to look into the possibilities of another name.

Mr. Chairman: This concludes the estimates of The Department of Energy and Resources Management.

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): moves that the committee of supply rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report progress and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Speaker, before moving the adjournment of the House, may I say that it is intended that the estimates of The Department of Economics and Development will be considered tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Allan moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 6.00 o'clock, p.m.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Public Service Superannuation Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of these amendments is, first, to extend the time a civil servant may exercise his option to contribute in respect to continuous past service from six months to one year, and to clarify the intent with respect to the methods of payment in respect to such past service. It also gives civil servants, who are now contributors to the public service superannuation fund but have failed to exercise their former rights in respect of their non-contributive service, another opportunity to establish credit in respect of such service.

It also brings The Public Service Superannuation Act into line with The Pensions Benefit Act, 1962.

THE DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION ACT

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Department of Education Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE SCHOOLS ADMINISTRATION ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Schools Administration Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Speaker, by way of a short statement with respect to these two bills; they refer to retarded children and I would like at this time to make a brief statement as to the past and present legislation this House will be considering.

I think we all would accept the fact that great results have accrued from the time of the inception in 1953 of grants to local associations for retarded children. More than 40 new schools have been constructed with the aid of capital grants from The Department of Education, and more than 400 teachers have received summer course training. At the present time 84 associations are operating 87 schools, with a total enrolment of approximately 2,750 children.

Studies were started immediately after the announcement in the assembly on March 26, 1963, in which it was stated that after consultation with interested organizations steps would be taken to develop a plan whereby the financing of the current operation of schools for trainable retarded children would be placed on a plan whereby the grant from the department would be a percentage of approved cost including approved transportation. The remainder of the funds necessary for the current operation of the schools would be raised by means other than charity drives.

A very detailed analysis of the 1962 financial report was carried out, and consultations were held with a number of organizations, including the Ontario Association for Retarded Children. These studies and consultations revealed the necessity of keeping the local interest high by involvement of the local associations for retarded children, and also by avoiding any geographical boundaries as a barrier to attendance at a school.

So while the local interest will be retained by leaving the title to buildings and property in the hands of the local associations, the school conducted therein shall be under the control of an education authority, on which will serve representatives of those bodies concerned. This education authority will operate the school under regulations and will be paid a grant by The Department of Education. This grant will be a fixed percentage of the approved cost of current operation, including approved transportation.

The remainder of the funds necessary will be raised in the municipal taxes of the municipality in which the pupils reside.

As the plan becomes operable on January 1, 1965, it will herald achievement of the objective of making it unnecessary for local associations to raise money through charity drives for the current operation of the school. At the same time, it retains certain desirable features of the present arrangements.

The year 1953 is regarded, Mr. Speaker, as a momentous year in the development of provisions for trainable retarded children because it was in that year that legislation provided the basis for a plan which has served the movement well. I believe that the year 1964 may well be another milestone in this movement; in this year, provision through this proposed legislation will remove the current operation from the realm of charity drives.

THE PLANNING ACT

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Planning Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of slight amendments in The Planning Act dealing with the duties and responsibilities of the committees of adjustment. The important thing in this amendment is providing authority to municipalities, which have a zoning plan and an official plan, to pass by-laws providing provisions relating to housing conditions and maintenance of housing.

Hon. members may remember that a year or so ago The Department of Municipal Affairs published, after considerable study, a report dealing with this subject of maintenance of dwelling standards and dwelling conditions and so on. This amendment to The Planning Act will provide the authority to municipalities to pass the necessary by-laws.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I have several questions before the orders of the day, the first directed to the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart). Does the hon. Minister contemplate an early amendment to The Meat Inspection Act which would bring northern Ontario within the scope of the Act?

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): An amendment is not necessary, Mr. Speaker, since any exemptions under The Meat Inspection Act are by regulation.

Mr. Troy: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker? Has the hon. Minister had any information from his agriculture representatives informing him that the municipal councils and health bodies are concerned because of the implications of the Act, and because it does not apply to the inspection of meat in northern Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I have had no representations made by any of our Department of Agriculture representatives along the line suggested by the hon. member. All I know about the situation is what I have read in the press, from a statement that I believe was made here during my estimates. It is recorded in Hansard.

Frankly, I think the matter is being exaggerated to some degree for the simple reason that we believe, from the examination of the matter as far as our department is concerned, that there is a greater degree of inspection already in existence of meat used for human consumption in northern Ontario than in any other part of the province of Ontario. I explain this for the simple reason that a good many of the local municipalities have their own inspection service now through their medical officer of health.

A great deal more of the meat that is used in northern Ontario comes in across provincial boundaries and of necessity must be inspected to cross provincial boundaries. This is the information that we have been given. There is no thought whatever of exempting northern Ontario continuously. But to get the plan in operation we felt that here was an area that now enjoyed a greater degree of inspection than any other area at the present time, and so we are trying to get it into operation here and then expand the service into northern Ontario.

Mr. Troy: I hope that the—

Mr. Speaker: The Minister has answered the question and I think that completes this question.

I was going to suggest to the member concerning his second question that as the Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett) is not in his seat, perhaps he could ask the question and if the Minister should happen to take his seat in time I shall give him the opportunity of answering it then, or at some time later.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Speaker, I notice this member of the commission here. I am sure that if my question has been considered—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. The question I have addressed to the Minister of Energy and Resources Management and it should be answered by him.

Mr. Troy: Thank you. This question is addressed to the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts). Did Mr. Carman Naylor of London, Ontario, who is a member of the Dr. Hagey committee studying the proposed Ontario medical insurance plan, speak for the government as reported in the press when he stated that the medical insurance plan will not be ready to start by the beginning of 1965; and further, has he the authority to make comments on the cost of premiums under the plan?

Hon. J. P. Roberts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is, of course, no. The committee, within its terms of reference, has freedom to deal with the matters entrusted to it and any comments the members make are their own. They do not speak for the government.

In answer to the second part of the question that, too, of course, is no. This man has no authority to speak for the government in regard to what the premiums may be.

Mr. Troy: That just confirms the concern of the people—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence (St. George): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, even though this year we were unable to present each of the hon. members, as last year, with a rose, it cannot obscure the fact that today is St. George's Day. Whether one believes in the old story of St. George and his slaying of the dragon or not, does not alter the fact that through the years—for a number of centuries in fact—this has epitomized to the people of the world the eventual triumph of truth, righteousness and justice over the forces of evil. These are the things for which this old story of St. George and the dragon stands. These are the things that the Englishman, and the English in particular in this world today, stand for. Sir, I think, as the member for St. George, that this fact should be brought to the attention of the hon. members of this Legislature especially, as we, of course, are founded upon the British parliamentary system.

As well, sir, today is the day on which we are celebrating the 400th anniversary of the birth of William Shakespeare and I do not think this fact should go unnoticed by the House either. The beauty and the power of the words written by a man almost 400 years ago have had a tremendous influence in the development of the English language and the evolution of the English language. Indeed, it is a tremendous factor still today in influencing the English language. Of course, as we have seen here in our own city of Toronto just lately, Shakespeare is influencing other fields of endeavour, especially in the cultural pursuits of the arts.

Sir, as the member for St. George, I hope that the rest of the hon. members of the Legislature will allow me to say that this Legislature salutes the English and all they stand for, and as well, the memory of William Shakespeare.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, while we are on the subject of birthdays, my hon. friend could have gone a little further in dealing with great people whose birthdays fall today. I understand that the Governor General of Canada, General Vanier, and of equal importance and greater satisfaction, I should say, to those of us on this side, the Right Honourable Lester Pearson, the Prime Minister of Canada, are celebrating their birthdays today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The 16th order, House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS AND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Economics and Development): Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with the report of my department, I would like, not only as a new member of the Legislature but also as a new member of the Cabinet, to express my sincere appreciation not only to the civil servants in my department but to all civil servants for their very great kindnesses to me during these last several weeks since I took office. Their help in getting settled in my department has certainly been of very great assistance in assuming these responsibilities, and to them I am most grateful.

I might also say that I have learned a great deal from the hon. members of the Opposition, not only in personal conversation, but in having had the opportunity to sit here since January 15 and listen to the debates and watch them in action.

It is my intention to review the economy in 1963 and then comment on the outlook for the provincial economy for 1964. I would then like to make some remarks on existing and future programmes of the department and the results we are confident can be achieved, keeping in mind, however, that there are great external economic forces being marshalled throughout the world that can have a major effect on the future of this country and Ontario industrialists in particular.

The present economic situation must be viewed in the context of developments in the Canadian economy over the last few years. On the whole I am pleased to report that our long-term prospects are better than they have appeared for several years. Our main concern is that we may now be on the threshold of a long-term capital investment upswing that should provide exactly the foundation required to meet the employment and growth challenges faced by this province in the sixties.

To fulfil these prospects, all levels of government in Canada must allow the factors of production—labour, capital and natural resources—to work as efficiently as possible, and thus provide us with a maximum rate of economic growth and employment. There will still be some problems that cannot be met through a rapid rate of economic growth alone, and these will have to be dealt with by special measures.

A year ago my predecessor hit the nail on the head in forecasting the increase in the Ontario gross provincial product for 1963. In dollar terms, the GPP advanced by 6.9 per cent last year; however, when price increases are accounted for, the real growth rate was about five per cent. So I believe it is well not to delude ourselves into becoming too complacent if we wish to maintain or improve our productivity and remain competitive.

Manufacturing was the real key to Ontario's economic progress in 1963. Within manufacturing, the most dynamic sector has been the motor vehicle industry and the signs point to a further improvement this year. Production of new motor vehicles increased by 23 per cent in 1963 and for the current year are up 28.5 per cent over last year.

Growth in the motor vehicle industry has exerted demands on many supplying industries such as steel, glass, rubber, electrical, aluminum, nickel, copper, textile, wood and chemical products. We are particularly fortunate that a very high proportion of these suppliers are located in Ontario. These and other associated industries, as well as distribution and servicing industries, have provided higher employment and increased personal incomes. Consumer spending by these employees and their families has exerted demands on food, clothing and other consumer industries providing goods and services.

My department has been particularly heartened by the fact that exports of manufactured goods proved to be another highlight of the economy's performance last year. Much of the department's economic programme in the past two years has been based on the premise that Ontario manufacturers are capable of competing in international markets, and that through an extension of markets into other countries, longer production runs will lead to improvements in manufacturing efficiency.

In 1963, exports of manufactured end products rose by 19 per cent. Among such products, exports of motor vehicles and parts increased by 53 per cent, industrial machinery and parts by 25.6 and farm machinery and parts by 25.1. The industries producing these commodities are overwhelmingly concentrated in Ontario, and continuous efforts urging more direct activity in export markets are, I firmly believe, a must for the future prosperity of this province.

Largely owing to these favourable factors, manufacturing shipments in Ontario increased by 8.3 per cent in 1963 to reach a total of $14,563 million. This was considerably larger than the total for all Canada only 13 years ago. The value of output of transportation equipment alone is estimated to have risen by 19 per cent and to have contributed 32 per cent of the total gain in Ontario manufacturing. Strong rises have also been estimated for the following in 1963: textiles, 16.5 per cent; machinery, 15.1 per cent; rubber, 13.3 per cent and electrical products, 10.8 per cent—all of which are industries employing large numbers of our labour force.

The drive in Ontario's manufacturing sector was supplemented by continued strength in the services, wholesale and retail trade and finance. Farm cash income increased by 6.5 per cent to reach $997 million providing one of the best years on record.

The year 1963 was excellent for Ontario: more people worked than ever before, and they made more money. Sixty thousand new jobs were created, and our unemployment level dropped from 4.3 per cent in 1962 to 3.8 per cent in 1963. By the end of 1963 our unemployment level was down to 3.3 per cent and in March it dropped to 2.5 per cent, seasonally adjusted.

I might add there are 124,000 more people working in Ontario at the end of March, 1964 than there were at the end of March, 1963.

I might add at this time that this level is generally considered as full employment for an economy structured the way the Ontario economy is. In Canada the national average unemployment was 5.5 per cent and in the U.S. 5.7 per cent in 1963. The result of this high level of employment in Ontario meant that labour income in Ontario rose by seven per cent to reach over $9 billion.

I do not intend to go into more detail on the statistical performance of the economy last year. The hon. members have received copies of the January issue of the "Ontario Economic Review" and also the "Ontario Statistical Review," both of which provide useful reference material.

The year 1963 was the third year of expansion following the low point of the last recession reached at the beginning of 1961. In both duration and rate of increase, this current cycle stands in marked contrast to the slow growth period we experienced following 1957.

Changes in monetary and fiscal policies in the United States and monetary and exchange policies in Canada played an important role in bringing us out of the period of slower growth. In addition, grain sales to Communist countries, the trade promotion activities of the Ontario and federal governments, and the more aggressive efforts of Canadian manufacturers in external and domestic markets all contributed greatly. The devalued dollar and slow price rises in Canada compared to the inflation problems now being faced in several European countries have meant that unit costs of production in Canada relative to other countries are at their lowest level for a number of years.

Substantial increases are expected in new machinery and equipment this year. In fact, the recently announced capital investment intentions for 1964 indicate an increase of 14.9 per cent in expenditures on machinery and equipment in Ontario manufacturing this year. The immediate impact on the economy will be reduced by the fact that our machinery and equipment industries are already operating at full capacity. Substantially more than half of the increase anticipated in this investment, therefore, may have to be spent for imported equipment.

We are emphasizing our machinery industry in assessing our prospects for 1964 and subsequent years. Ontario accounts for two-thirds of the Canadian machinery industry and almost 90 per cent of its electrical industrial equipment. This industry offers an excellent example of the increasing competitiveness of Canadian industry, which, while supplying the domestic markets, was also able to export. Canadian exports of industrial machinery and equipment increased by 29.4 per cent between 1961 and 1962 and a further 27 per cent in 1963.

Although there was a significant increase in Canadian expenditures on machinery in 1963, imports of mining, metallurgical, business and printing machinery and other non-farm machinery declined slightly. When we combine this encouraging story with the prospect that Canadian expenditures on machinery will rise rapidly in 1964, we can see an obvious opportunity for a rapid expansion in the capacity of the machinery industry.

In addition to the push that investment will provide to economic activity in 1964, we anticipate a further increase in exports of grains and manufactured goods. Higher incomes of prairie farmers as a result of the wheat sales will support further demand for Ontario-produced farm machinery and consumer goods.

In each succeeding year of an expansion it is more difficult to maintain the rates of increase that were obtained during initial stages of a recovery. The automobile industry is the best example of this. In the past two years its annual increases of well over 20 per cent generated expanded activity in a host of related industries. While we expect a small increase in motor vehicle production in 1964, the industry may not provide the same dynamic stimulus.

Construction is another area where activity may not show a significant increase in 1964. However, we do expect the construction industry to renew its vigour in subsequent years.

In summary, therefore, we believe the rate of growth in the Ontario economy will be about six per cent which is well above the average of the past seven years.

We are confident the Ontario economy can expand at an accelerated rate over the next five years for the following reasons: in the first place, assuming favourable monetary and fiscal policies, the tax reduction in the United States will exert increasing force in expanding consumer and investment demand in the United States over the next two years. This will have a stimulating effect on Canadian exports, mostly of industrial raw materials, but also of those manufactured goods where we have established an ability to compete internationally.

In the second place, the growth in demand in both Canada and the United States will stimulate large capital investment expenditures. In both countries, most industries are operating closer to capacity than has been the case for seven years. Increased profits and aging plant and machinery also contribute to setting the stage for several years of large-scale investment.

As this situation emerges more clearly it will become obvious to business that the sooner a firm increases its capacity, the better it will be enabled to participate in supplying the expanding need and the greater chance it will have of holding or improving its relative position in the market. Knowledge of this fact will tend to advance the date at which new business investment will occur.

If we are correct in anticipating a strong rise in business investment, the multiplier effect will be felt in all parts of the economy in the form of increased production, employment and incomes. Similar forces will be at work in United States, encouraging Canada's exports and reinforcing Canada's economic growth.

Thus the opportunities for growth in the second half of the sixties are most favourable. The requirements of the large United States economy for industrial materials from the considerably smaller Canadian economy will be strong. Therefore, the growth rate for Canada may well be faster than that of the United States. At the same time, we shall continue to encourage further domestic processing of Canadian raw materials.

The basic requirement of the Ontario economy is that we achieve our long-term growth potential. This is much more the core of Ontario's problem than it is for other areas of this country. The economy of Ontario has reached a more mature stage than most of the rest of Canada which is still basically dependent on resource development. Although the prairie provinces do not have an unemployment problem, they are concerned with diversifying their economies to raise the standard of living and cushion them from the shock of a poor harvest or lower export sales, particularly when 80 per cent of their harvest has to be exported to countries which next year may have a good harvest and require no imports.

In British Columbia, although the standard of living is high, there are some unemployment problems that must be met by special measures. In the maritime provinces and much of Quebec there are severe unemployment problems which cannot be solved through an acceleration of national economic growth alone. In Nova Scotia, for example, the declining demand for coal has left large numbers of unemployed who cannot find gainful employment in mining. These regions are attempting to solve their difficulties through an expansion in manufacturing activity, and this may require that people move from the mining centres.

With the exception of some areas, particularly in the north, the Ontario economy is characterized by such a diversification of industry that, with a real rate of economic growth of four or five per cent and high levels of employment, a continuing rise in the standard of living can be maintained. Barring sharp cyclical changes at any given time, those Ontario industries where productivity is rising faster than output, and therefore fewer employees are needed, are balanced by other industries which require more workers. If there are barriers to the free movement of labour and capital, however, we may have high unemployment in one area of the province, while industries in other parts are in great need.

A high rate of labour mobility means that it must be relatively easy for employees to move: (1) from areas where there is a stagnant or declining demand for labour to those where more labour is required, (2) from industries with a receding demand for labour to others that can employ them and (3) from declining occupations to those with good prospects for gainful employment. Studies are now under way in my department and by the federal government on industries and areas which have not been offering new employment opportunities. If these studies reveal long-term trends of dwindling employment, then measures to facilitate labour mobility from them to more productive areas are indicated.

If the economy is to grow at its maximum rate, investments must be concentrated in areas and industries with the greatest growth potential, not only in the interests of the investor, but in the interest of the labour force. Naturally, there are occasions when this general principle may have to be carefully weighed, particularly when there are immediate problems of unemployment and hardship in a specific area. However, financial support or other alternate programmes of assistance to such areas should be planned with the long term in view and steps devised to correct the underlying problems. A patchwork of temporary measures is costly and too often a waste of our human resources. The most helpful way the Ontario government can ensure that investment is directed toward areas and industries of growth potential, is through assisting business to ascertain where the long-term prospects are good. My comment on the machinery industry earlier was an example of pinpointing a likely prospect.

The full potential will not be realized unless continued efforts are made to take full advantage of all opportunities. Growth industries only maintain their growth if they are constantly searching for new techniques, new products, new markets and other means of improving productivity. The Ontario government, through its vocational and technical training programme, its export promotion and import replacement activities, and its assistance to the Ontario Research Foundation, offers many services which will aid industry in attaining these essential increases in productivity.

The federal government must bear the main responsibility for plans affecting the long-term rate of economic growth and for measures designed to round off the excesses of business cycles and provide stability to the economy. The Economic Council of Canada has undertaken the maintenance of long-term, well-rounded economic growth as its chief area of concern. It will be recommending programmes to the government of Canada from time to time concerning future long-range monetary, fiscal and tariff policies. The reports of the Economic Council of Canada will be available and should be most helpful to provincial governments in developing their own economic policies.

We welcome some of the programmes which the federal government has recently undertaken and which have had a beneficial effect on the Ontario economy. The winter bonus for housing construction has undoubtedly been a factor in keeping down the rate of unemployment this winter. The export incentive for automobile parts has had a salutary effect on the Ontario automobile parts of industry. The tax incentive for increased research facilities which Ontario has incorporated into its own corporation tax structure has been a factor in spurring expenditure on research and development in Ontario industry.

Due to Ontario's overwhelming dependence on manufacturing, we are particularly interested in any federal government action which will have an impact on our manufacturing industry. The forthcoming GATT negotiations are a case in point. We agree basically with the federal government desire to consider reductions in the Canadian tariff schedule on the basis of reductions in other countries' tariffs of equivalent advantage to Canada. We are concerned, however, that tariff concessions on manufactured commodities should only be granted if assistance is provided to affected industries to make the necessary adjustments to protect jobs and investment. Any comprehensive effort to aid Canadian industry to adjust to changing international conditions may require a co-ordinated programme of tariff changes, adjustment assistance to both capital and labour, and possible changes in anti-combine legislation and its administration. Changes in anti-combine legislation may be essential in order that there be greater specialization in affected industries while maintaining competitive conditions. The precedent to this has already been established by legislation permitting industry co-operation for export purposes.

One of my first duties after becoming the Minister of Economics and Development was to attend federal-provincial conferences of Premiers and Ministers of trade and industry. As a result of these meetings I am convinced the groundwork has been laid for effective federal-provincial co-operation and co-ordination of economic programmes.

We made known our dissatisfaction with the lack of prior consultation on the part of the federal government when it introduced its incentives to slow growth areas and the Municipal Development Fund. While we cannot assume that such things will not happen in the future, we at least know that we will henceforth be consulted on the revision of the criteria for designating slow growth areas. We will also be given much greater access to federal government statistics and information on economic conditions and prospects. We have agreed on the extent and type of provincial and federal efforts in export and industrial promotion and have co-ordinated the timing of trade missions and exhibitions in other countries. A schedule of regular federal-provincial meetings has been set up to iron out programmes and problems at both ministerial and civil service levels.

Our economic development depends not only on action by the federal government and the province of Ontario, but also implies co-operation with other provinces. For the reasons I outlined earlier, a number of provinces have embarked on programmes to promote industrial development within their own jurisdictions. These efforts can make a substantial contribution to the economic growth of Canada, if the advantages of specialization and rationalization in resource locations are respected, and wasteful duplication of existing facilities is avoided. If instances occur where development plans of the various provinces conflict, a method should be developed of reviewing such plans in the light of the national interest.

The economy of Ontario is more closely attached to the Canadian domestic market than is that of any other province in Canada. This means that Ontario has a vital interest in encouraging increased wealth in other sections. Just as an example, I could mention that one of the chief sources of increased demand for Ontario-manufactured products this year is the prairie farmer, whose income has greatly increased as a result of wheat sales to Communist countries.

Ontario will suffer, of course, if a manufacturing industry is forced to close down because its markets in another province have been cut off or reduced through discriminatory action by a government agency. At a time when both this government and the federal government are directing their efforts toward the expansion of markets for manufactured goods in other countries, it would be a retrograde step to have the Canadian market fractioned even more than it is already. I hope that any problems of this nature can be solved through friendly informal discussions and that the issue is not magnified unduly.

As I have stated, the economic problems of Ontario, and more particularly the activities in my department, are concentrated on our manufacturing industry. While Ontario accounts for almost one-third of mining activity in Canada, 25 per cent of the agricultural production, 30 per cent of the pulp and paper, and one-third of the hydro-electric power generation, its economy is, nevertheless, highly developed and dependent to a large extent on secondary manufacturing. In fact, less than ten per cent of the Ontario labour force is engaged in the fields of resource development, while 26 per cent is in manufacturing, with a sizeable proportion of the remainder in that part of the services which includes transportation and trade and finance sectors of the economy directly supporting or dependent on manufacturing activity.

The performance of the Ontario economy in 1963 gives some indication of how important manufacturing is to Ontario. We have experienced what can only be described as an excellent year, with an increase in gross provincial product of about six per cent, the lowest unemployment rate since 1957, and a rise in per capita income to over $2,000. However, while the economy as a whole was doing well, our resource industries, particularly mining, have not enjoyed what could be termed a banner year.

The success of our manufacturing industry in replacing imports, increasing exports and generally improving its competitive position was largely responsible for the economy's growth. The dominant position of manufacturing resulted in a good growth rate in spite of the performance of other sectors of the economy.

For the benefit of the new members of the Legislature I would like to explain some of the reasons behind the Ontario Trade Crusade and the role it has played and will continue to play in the interests of Canada and this province in particular.

When this administration first took office in November, 1961, a number of papers were prepared on economic problems facing Ontario. At that time we had an unemployment rate of 4.7 per cent in Ontario and our level of economic activity was too low. This province was faced with the imminent entry of large numbers of young people into the labour force during a period when prospects for employment appeared to be quite limited. Many people were pessimistic about the economic future of this province and Canada.

Traditionally, it had been felt in some quarters that the economic development of Canada was almost solely the concern of the federal government. However, as a result of the Ontario government's analysis, it was obvious we had to become more actively and directly involved in the economy of the province. I might emphasize at this time that this is still our view and we will continue to do all we can to promote the economic well-being of this province.

To assist the government to meet its economic goals, The Department of Economics was merged with The Department of Commerce and Development. This merger contributed materially to the success of the government's economic programme because, for the first time, it combined economic research and industrial development facilities.

Concern by economists within the department over balance of payments and employment problems led to an aggressive programme to export Ontario-made goods to the markets of the world. Conversely, the interest of others in the department in regional development, specific industries and federal government policies, led to the preparation of studies by the economics branches.

The size of Canada's continuing current account deficit was a subject of much concern in 1961. In the previous nine years the deficit had amounted to over $9 billion. Although much of this amount was spent on establishing new factories and mines, we were also spending too much on imported goods and foreign travel. Canadian business and consumers were, in effect, spending their money on imported goods and services while depending on imported capital to finance expansion of productive facilities. Tight money and high interest rates attracted foreign capital to finance the imports. At the same time the high exchange rate on the Canadian dollar provided important competitive advantages to imported goods and services and maintained too high a price for Canada's exports.

The Ontario government decided that its best contribution would be a programme to promote exports and encourage import replacement. This, to a very marked degree, was achieved by the Ontario Trade Crusade.

On the import replacement side, the government initiated several steps.

We took this problem directly to the people through a consumer advertising campaign. We asked the people of this province to buy Canadian-made products where the domestic products were comparable in price and quality to imports. As results indicated, the people of this province overwhelmingly supported this programme and thus contributed directly to their present economic well-being.

We undertook a programme to increase the Canadian content of manufactured articles through a series of trade exhibits which we call "manufacturing opportunities shows." At these shows Ontario manufacturers display components which they import and seek to replace through Canadian suppliers. These exhibits have been a great success for all concerned and since their inception have been closely studied by other jurisdictions. Since originating this programme, it is conservatively estimated that we have replaced imported components to the value of over $30 million. This has been done at a saving to the importer and means additional business, employment and longer production runs for Ontario economy. Most of the components replaced have been of U.S. origin.

The department further attempted to reduce imports by inducing manufacturers, who previously had exported to Canada, to establish a branch plant in Ontario. In the past year the department had a part in bringing in 173 branch plants, the highest number in any year since we started compiling statistics in 1945.

When the item imported does not have sufficient volume to warrant a branch plant, we attempt to interest the foreign company in having a Canadian company produce it under licence. In the past year we were instrumental in concluding 78 manufacturing agreements between Ontario-based companies and foreign firms. This figure of 78 is again a record.

The department also felt that immediate steps had to be taken to increase the exports of Ontario-manufactured goods, and developed a number of programmes to do just this.

The department arranged for sales missions to go abroad and sell Ontario-made goods. Since starting this programme we have sent 21 sales missions. More than 200 Ontario businessmen have been on these missions and we estimate they have sold over $45 million worth of Ontario-made merchandise.

Some people are under the impression these sales missions duplicate federal government export efforts. This is not so. The federal government does not have sales missions of a similar kind; they have in the main concentrated on single industry groups and associations. If the Ontario government had not undertaken its programme, most of the previously mentioned manufacturers would not have had the export success they enjoy and $45 million in sales would have been lost to the economy; profits would not have been made, and a measure of employment would not have been created. I might add that this programme has made a very substantial increase in revenues to both the provincial and federal Treasuries.

We co-operate very closely with the federal government on this programme, and I would like at this time to acknowledge the appreciation of the Ontario government to the federal authorities for the splendid co-operation and assistance they have extended to us.

The government, as a further aid to exports, increased the strength and number of its foreign offices. Through these every Ontario manufacturer has a sales office in New York; Chicago; London, England; Dusseldorf, Germany; and Milan, Italy. The federal government Department of Trade and Commerce has also offered to make space available in its foreign offices for any industrial development officers the Ontario government might wish to appoint. This possibility, I might add, is currently under study.

Ontario House, which is the province's show window in Europe, has been completely renovated to consolidate all Ontario government offices in the United Kingdom. This has meant complete reconstruction of all seven storeys of the building. The new Ontario House will be officially dedicated early in June. Finding new industry and investment for the province will continue to be the major activity for Ontario House. As part of this programme, showrooms will be opened for businessmen to display their wares and thus sell more Canadian-made products.

In conjunction with our foreign offices, we bring to Ontario successful manufacturers, agents, or buyers and arrange for them to visit groups of companies manufacturing allied but not competitive products, with a view to representing these companies abroad. Last year 26 group agents or buyers were established. One million dollars in sales have been secured to date from this programme.

The Ontario trade crusade has contributed materially to the well-being of this province and this country. More people are working in Ontario and earning more money today than ever before because of the trade crusade. We intend to continue with it and sincerely believe it will be even more successful this coming year.

The department has several other programmes to assist Ontario industry, which I will discuss later. However, I did want to acquaint the hon. members briefly with some of the background of the Ontario trade crusade.

There are, however, limitations to these approaches. There are limitations to import replacement. Some things have to be imported, and not every manufacturer or industry can export. No government can carry the whole load; every person, every industry, every jurisdiction has a role to play. We will have to develop new programmes and new ideas. Longer term measures will be needed, and I believe we will all have to recognize this fact. Careful study and highly sophisticated programmes are going to take time to develop, and in many cases the results of these plans will not be immediate but will become apparent in the future.

It is important that we begin today to develop programmes for tomorrow. We must be cognizant of this fact: Economic development requires hard and continuous work and we are fighting strong, keen competition at home and abroad. An accelerated trade crusade programme, with continuing emphasis on exploring new markets, is vital if our trade is to prosper and expand.

Before outlining some of our new programmes for the 1964-65 fiscal year, I should like to spend a few minutes on a subject which has received much attention at this session of the Legislature. I am referring to the nature and amount of unemployment in this province.

The Ontario unemployment situation has shown great improvement over the past year, and in the last quarter of 1963 there were approximately 85,000 more persons employed in the province than in the final quarter of 1962. And as I mentioned earlier there are 124,000 more since March of last year. Buoyant conditions have resulted in a smaller than usual seasonal decline in employment in the first few months of this year and unemployment levels have been the lowest since 1957.

Most of the increases in the labour force during the past year were women and young men. Of the total increment between February 1963 and February 1964 of about 56,000, only 11,000 were males and 45,000 were females. The increase in female employment just about balanced the increase in the labour force, leaving female unemployment virtually unchanged from last year. On the other hand, there was a greater increase in employment for men than the number of additional entrants, so that the male unemployment rates declined.

Although the employment situation has shown tremendous improvement over the past few years, there are still areas of high unemployment. In March most of the Ontario labour market areas were classified as in moderate labour surplus by The Department of Labour in Ottawa. Several areas—Galt, Guelph, Kitchener, Listowel, St. Thomas, Stratford and Woodstock-Tillsonburg—had balanced labour markets at the end of March.

Two of the Ontario areas which have suffered from the most persistently high levels of unemployment, Windsor and Cornwall, have experienced considerable improvement over the past year. In fact, they both moved into the balanced labour market category in the late summer or early fall of 1963 for two or three months. That was the first time Windsor had had a balanced labour market since 1956; and for Cornwall, it was the first time since 1957.

While unemployment among the unskilled is of serious concern to the Ontario government, shortages have developed this year in parts of Ontario for professional and skilled workers. Nurses, skilled workers in the metal trades and draughtsmen are in short supply. The immigration branch of the department has been handling a sharply increased number of requests from Ontario employers for skilled workmen. Through Ontario House it has been able to meet some of the immediate needs. A possible expansion of the immigration services of the department is now under review.

The Department of Education is continuing the expansion of its vocational training programme to ensure a more highly skilled and flexible work force to meet longer term requirements. However, as the evidence of the past year or two shows, the most important factor in offsetting the disemployment resulting from technical change is an adequate rate of growth in the economy. We are making every effort to ensure that our economy continues in a healthy state. We can then treat spot areas of unemployment on an ad hoc basis. We hope in this way to quickly design solutions to such problems when the decline of job opportunities in traditional industries occurs.

Following the conference on automation and social change, a steering committee was appointed to recommend the possible terms of reference of a body to carry out continuing work in the field of automation and employment. The committee sent in its report at the end of January. Following its receipt, the chairman of the Ontario Economic Council discussed the question with the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada and other provincial economic councils. It was agreed that further research in this field be co-ordinated on a federal-provincial basis with appropriate government departments assisting as required. Although no permanent body separate from the council will be established at this time, staff from the council are being assigned to the question. A decision on whether or not to set up a separate organization will be made later.

We believe this type of approach will help find a solution to the problems of technological unemployment.

Since taking office as Minister of Economics and Development, I have been engaged in a review of all of the department's programmes in conjunction with senior officials of the department. This review will continue; let me summarize by saying that the existing programmes of The Department of Economics and Development will be maintained but the emphasis of some will be altered to take account of changing circumstances. In addition, some new programmes will go into operation while others are being studied. As an example of a programme which has been modified to take account of changing circumstances, let me review briefly our consumer advertising campaign.

During the past two years imports of most consumer goods were sharply reduced. For example, of 308 tariff classifications covering what would normally be classified as consumer items, 208 items showed a decline in imports in the first ten months of 1963 as compared to 1962. The most significant declines occurred in clothing, electrical appliances and other household metal articles—the very type of commodities most likely to be affected by a promotional campaign aimed at housewives.

Normally Canadian imports of most commodities increase during a business expansion. In 1963 imports of producers' goods did increase but imports of consumer goods declined. The Ontario government trade crusade can claim a share in creating this welcome reversal of form. The other factors involved were the special import surcharges in effect between June 1962 and April 1963, and the delayed impact of the lower value of the Canadian dollar.

I think it should be stated at this time that Canada, to reduce its current accounts deficit, will have to increase its merchandise trade surplus. We have a net annual outflow of approximately $1 billion for services such as dividends and interest on foreign investments, transportation, insurance, and so on, and we have to sell more goods than we buy to get the money to offset some of these charges. This is a point which many, who complain about Canada's highly favourable trade balance with their countries, fail to mention. Our surplus on merchandise account with these individual countries is considerably reduced by our deficit on invisibles with some of these same countries. For example, the United Kingdom had a surplus of $98 million on invisibles with Canada in 1963, but at the same time had a deficit of $387 million on merchandising trade.

Some people believe that trade should be balanced with each country, or at least Canada should balance its trade with each country. This of course is ridiculous, if not impossible.

Most of the countries which complain about their trade balance with Canada have a surplus in their balance of payments with the world, so obviously they cover their deficit on trade with Canada by earnings from other countries.

Much is made of the fact that Japan buys two to three times as much from Canada as it sells, and its purchases are in the main raw materials and food stuffs. Our purchases from them are high-labour-content manufactured goods. But let us be realistic. Japan gets the money to pay for its Canadian purchases from its sales to other countries. For example, in 1962 Japan sold $65 million worth of goods to Nigeria and only imported $5.2 million.

In the first nine months of 1963, Japan imported $870 million worth of goods from southeast Asia and exported $1.1 billion. She therefore had a surplus with that area of $270 million to help cover her deficit with Canada and other smaller nations.

Canada for some time to come cannot expect to eliminate its current account deficit. We will have to continue to import capital and services. However, we must work out long-term solutions to our balance of payments problem. We cannot pin a large part of our prosperity on bumper grain crops and record wheat sales. We must strive to improve all sectors of our economy if we are to continue to prosper and meet the demands on our economy at home and abroad.

I would like to submit that Canada will in the future supply an increasing amount of raw materials and agricultural products to the highly industrialized nations which need them for their economic welfare. In return, Canada will be under continual pressure to buy more manufactured goods from them. This will present continuing challenges to Ontario, since this province is the centre of more than half of Canada's manufacturing.

In the coming year the department's advertising activities will be concentrated on those areas that offer the best potential for voluntary individual decision by the people of this province. Advertising will be concentrated in those retail markets where substantial amounts of imports are sold. The department will not have as extensive an advertising campaign as last year in Ontario, as we will be diverting some of our advertising dollars to push the sale of Ontario-made goods abroad. As the foreign distribution of Ontario products improves, we will devote a greater part of our promotion to foreign markets.

Let me assure the hon. members of this House that money will only be spent on advertising so long as it accomplishes the aims we set for it, or in other words only so long as it is worth it to the provincial economy as a whole. In the department's opinion it still is successful in certain areas and thus is being maintained.

At this point I want to pay tribute to the thousands of women throughout the province who, by their efforts, have made our trade crusade a success. Without their enthusiastic support our achievements would not have been possible.

In particular, I want to congratulate the Conference of Women of Ontario for the excellent work it has carried out during the past year. Since becoming Minister I have reviewed the programme and have made the Conference of Women a permanent part of the department. The advisory committee has been enlarged to include representatives from all parts of the province.

Of the many activities of the Conference of Women, I will mention only one at this time. During November, buyers from leading stores in the United States and representatives of the U.S. women's magazines were brought to Toronto for special viewings of Ontario fashions and products of our clothing industry. It is estimated that one story alone which was sent out from this promotion appeared in more than 200 American newspapers.

In the coming year the Conference of Women will hold a number of fashion shows featuring Canadian clothing and fabrics. In conjunction with the Retail Merchants' Association, retail promotions of Canadian-made goods will be held throughout the province. The first will be in Kitchener on May 25. Others will be held in Ottawa, at the Lakehead and in the Niagara area. I think they will make a very great contribution to the economy of this province this year.

Now I would like to say a word or two about regional development. One of the major problems facing the world today is regional development. Indeed, one would not be far wrong in saying that that is what the "cold war" is about. Every country, every state, every province and indeed many great cities could be said to face problems of regional development. Ontario is certainly no exception.

Conditions in a modern industrial society are such that there are compelling reasons why industry concentrates in certain areas. This is true even in a society such as the Soviet Union where the most absolute economic planning takes place.

In Canada we have regional development problems from coast to coast. The United States is about to embark on a regional development programme called the "war against poverty." Further abroad, the United Kingdom, France and Germany have all developed programmes to meet their acute regional development problems.

Meaningful regional development is more than a matter of taxation incentives, cheap power and transportation, and labour and resources, although all of these factors are important. This government as far as possible should seek to create development where it will be most efficient and where it will return the most to the province as a whole.

There is to our knowledge no perfect regional development programme anywhere in the world, and the problem is much more complex than many would have you believe. Tremendous amounts of money have been spent on regional development programmes that have generated very little, either socially or economically. From what I have said, hon. members might be excused if they felt that I believed the problem to be insurmountable. However, rest assured that I do not. I believe more can be done to develop the economy regionally, and I wish to assure you that it will be. But again, I want to emphasize that the problem is incredibly complex in a modern industrial society. This government could, as I have stated, provide cheap power and transportation, housing and taxation incentives to certain areas and we still could not develop industry.

This province's economy is not strong enough to stand the creation of regional economic sink holes. The demands are too many and too pressing. Nevertheless, as resources permit, we will develop programmes. Our economic branches are working on special economic reports of certain areas, resources, industries and skills to determine possible regional opportunities. We are attempting to improve our economic forecasting, recognizing that these at best are "guesstimates" and unforeseen circumstances are always possible. Other areas and provinces' regional development problems are not similar to ours, and each will undoubtedly require different approaches and solutions.

When we speak of this government's regional development programme we shouldn't just focus on one or two, and accept these as a final development plan. In my own department, for example, we have:

1. A regional development branch that assists the various regional associations to develop economic programmes.

2. We have three different economic branches that all deal in part with regional development problems. Special regional economic and industrial studies are conducted, and in some cases specific area and industry studies are undertaken.

3. Through the Ontario Economic Council, special economic reports on certain areas have been made. In addition, we have a committee of the council to deal with northern Ontario development.

4. Through the Ontario Research Foundation we commission special research projects that will benefit certain regions within this province.

There is much more we do that I have not outlined, because every department in this government, and the commissions, assist in regional development in some way. Our government's regional development programme is much greater than many would believe; we hope to co-ordinate it more closely and work to establish certain objectives.

In the coming year we are going to hold an international conference on regional development. This we believe will be the first in Canada. We will invite authorities from all over the world to discuss the types of regional development problems they face, the programmes they have developed to deal with them, and the results they have obtained. We intend to study them and see what additional measures might be practicable for Ontario. We hope that this conference will provide more knowledge on the subject. I hope the hon. members will attend—I will certainly see that they get invitations.

I would like to touch for a moment on international marketing. As a further assistance to Ontario manufacturers in entering world markets, the department, in co-operation with the federal government, will be entering a number of international trade fairs. Trade fairs are a very efficient means of promoting Ontario-manufactured products in European and U.S. markets, and we have high hopes for this type of sales approach. I believe that as conditions permit, our industry must be more outward-looking and aggressive. It must look for an increasing portion of its sales in all the markets of the world and we must assist it at every opportunity, while we concentrate heavily and exploit the foreign markets we are now in. I am confident that Ontario and Canadian industry will rise to the challenge and we in government stand ready to do our part in this effort.

As an example, the department, in conjunction with a major northern United States retail store chain, will be sponsoring a "Canadian Week" at which Canadian goods will be prominently featured throughout all departments of the chain. This type of operation is particularly suitable to the promotional plans of The Department of Economics and Development.

We have an extensive range of Ontario-made consumer goods with a proven sales potential in U.S. markets. We have long felt that the northern United States offers an excellent market for this province's manufactured products, as well as its natural resources. If this forthcoming promotion is the success we hope it will be, we will extend it to other areas. We have top quality high fidelity and stereo sets, electrical appliances, sporting goods, fashions and furs, all of which we hope to promote in the northern United States and throughout the world. This programme, if successfully promoted, could open up a vast new horizon for the sale of Ontario consumer goods.

The Ontario Research Foundation: The plans for relocating the foundation's laboratories, which were announced last year, have resulted in a rapid development of the research community at Sheridan Park. Already five major companies have purchased sites in the park in addition to the foundation's original purchase of the core property. Two laboratories are already under construction and it is anticipated that the others will be started this year.

By assisting the foundation in locating its special facilities, its technical information service, and its specialized technical and scientific library, where they are conveniently accessible to our rapidly growing industrial research teams, the government is making a significant contribution to the technological development of the province.

By employing the scientific and engineering staff of the foundation on research needed by the government, it is providing opportunity for researchers to stay at home and make their special skills available to Ontario industry.

By supporting the foundation in its efforts to have the most up-to-date research techniques and equipment available for industry's use, the government is seeking to assist our industries in maintaining and improving their competitive position. To an increasing extent research is a vital component of our economic and industrial progress.

We intend to make Ontario a major industrial research area and, in doing so, reap the future use of the skills and knowledge of the young people we are spending vast sums to educate today. To fail to provide this opportunity now we are, in effect, sir, simply subsidizing with our trained people other industrialized nations which are much further advanced than we are, particularly in industrial research.

Sheridan Park is already under way to becoming the largest research centre in Canada. We intend to promote this research city to the limit of our ability. Offering incentives for research expenditures is in effect now at both the federal and provincial levels. Sheridan Park research centre can make a valuable contribution, not only to Ontario, but to all of Canada, so it will have the full support of this government.

We are therefore bringing forward a bill during this session of the Legislature to establish a non-profit corporation to be known as Sheridan Park Corporation. This corporation will purchase the remaining land, amounting to 168-some-odd acres, so that it can be used exclusively to establish Canada's first research satellite community.

We believe this step is essential to ensure orderly development of the property and eliminate any land speculation. In this way we believe it will encourage a greater participation in this research community of both large and small industry. Our promotional efforts for this project will be also directed abroad and in the United States to solicit foreign companies to establish their research laboratories in Ontario.

Ontario Economic Council: As a result of the federal government establishing the Economic Council of Canada, the organization and scope of the Ontario Economic Council has been adjusted to permit closer co-operation between the respective economic bodies.

We have a new chairman, Mr. William H. Cranston of Midland, Ontario. Mr. Cranston served with distinction as head of the tourist industry committee. I would like to take this opportunity to extend not only my own appreciation but that of this House to Mr. Cranston and all the members of the economic council. These men, at great sacrifice, devote a great deal of time to the affairs of this province. They serve voluntarily, initiating research and making recommendations in respect to both economic problems and growth potentials.

In recent weeks, in co-operation with the productivity division of the Economic Council of Canada and with the endorsement of labour and management, the Ontario Economic Council fostered the establishment of a series of work study courses for foremen and foremen-in-training. They are to be held at the Lakehead, Ottawa, Barrie, Peterborough, and Kitchener. Local arrangements are being made by the regional development associations.

In co-operation with the Economic Council of Canada and with counterpart bodies in other provinces, the Ontario Economic Council is initiating a broad programme of research into the economic effects, long and short range, of automation and of other aspects of technological and social change. Announcement of this joint federal-provincial programme, to help us better understand and be better prepared to meet the challenge of future changes in the methods of production and distribution of goods and services, was made recently. This co-operative approach to the problems of technological change was taken with the full endorsement of the representatives of the economic council.

Linked with this area of study is another project, also being undertaken in association with the Economic Council of Canada, in which the Ontario council will explore ways and means of more effectively matching labour skills to the future needs of our provincial economy. Building on work already done by The Departments of Education, Labour, and Economics and Development, this research will, we trust, help us in our forward planning.

In co-operation with the Ontario Research Foundation and economists in my own department, the Ontario Economic Council is initiating growth studies in relation to the feasibility of Canadian manufacture of a larger percentage of equipment used in conjunction with our rapidly expanding winter recreation industry; of the future domestic market for Ontario corn; and of a number of secondary manufactured products of which the domestic requirements are largely met currently by imports. In this connection, for example, the council is working with the Ontario Hospital Association in initiating test surveys to determine whether a larger percentage of our hospital equipment can be made, or at least assembled, in Ontario.

Currently before the government are reports from the industrial development committee on ways and means of encouraging a greater made-in-Canada content in goods acquired by governmental departments and agencies. The report of the special committee of the Ontario Economic Council on the Windsor area has recently been released.

Five committees of council are now active, manned entirely by volunteer citizens desirous of serving the people of this province and providing expanded opportunities for growth and prosperity. Among the recent recommendations made, for example, by the tourist industry committee of the council, was a greater public investment in the development of our historic sites—a development which, it was felt, would be largely self-liquidating on the basis of increased tourist dollar revenue. The restoration of Fort Ste. Marie, sir, announced by the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts) last month is an outgrowth of this recommendation. This committee has been working with The Department of Tourism and Information on many matters and will continue to do so.

Ontario's economic council is in no sense attempting to mastermind the planning programme of the government. It is an advisory body only, but it is endeavouring to bring to bear, in formulating its decisions, the best experience of the citizenry at large to assist this government in planning for the future.

The Ontario Development Agency: As a result of the agency's activities since its establishment a little over a year ago, Ontario companies have obtained $12.2 million in additional financing, most of which would not have been available to them if the agency had not been in existence. This financing has been obtained in four ways and I would like to deal with each of these in turn.

To date, the financial advisory committee has recommended the granting of 37 guarantees to Ontario-based companies, amounting in total to $3.8 million. Twenty-four of these guarantees have been executed, ten are awaiting the completion of legal documents, while three have not been acted upon because of breach of contract.

Provincial guarantees have been made available to companies which for various reasons were unable to obtain loans from the conventional lending institutions. All are, therefore, in the "high risk" category. When this legislation was enacted, it was fully intended that risks greater than those normally undertaken by the financial institutions would be involved in order to create additional employment, stimulate exports and replace imports.

The onus of deciding whether or not a guarantee should be provided, and the terms and conditions which should apply, was placed upon the financial advisory committee. I would add that all of the recommendations of the financial advisory committee have been implemented in full without any change. This committee, which is composed of representatives of business, commerce, labour and government, has done an outstanding job, and I am very grateful to the members for the assistance which they have rendered.

Guarantees have been provided to firms located in many parts of the province. The hon. members might be interested to know that 12 of these guarantees have supported the establishment of entirely new types of manufactured products, such as certain sporting goods, modern jet-propulsion motors, commercial aircraft, electronic devices, as well as the introduction of novel machining techniques.

The agency also assisted in the establishment of a foreign company in a small town in Ontario to produce an entirely new product for Canada, formerly imported from the United States. This concern, which is now providing 15 jobs, will be doubling its staff within the next few months.

Of the companies which have been assisted, four have not been successful and are in the process of being wound up. In one instance, assets of the company appear to be sufficient to retire in full the province's guarantee. In the case of the three other unsuccessful companies, it would appear that the province will be called upon to honour its guarantees to the extent of approximately $300,000. I would point out that all financial institutions incur losses and this is part of the risk of doing business. In the case of the Ontario Development Agency the risks involved are much higher than those for the conventional institutions, because all applicants must have been unable to obtain their financing elsewhere and are therefore in the high-risk category. Most of the other firms which have received guarantees are performing satisfactorily while some have exceeded our expectations.

In 15 instances, agency guarantees have resulted in additional monies in the amount of $3.5 million being made available by the conventional lending institutions. For example, a firm in northern Ontario was able to obtain a line of credit from a chartered bank in the amount of $400,000 and $450,000 from another institution for the erection of a new plant and its equipment, contingent upon the Ontario Development Agency guaranteeing additional working capital of $200,000. In other words, by providing $200,000 through a guarantee, the agency forged the last link in a financial deal amounting to over $1 million. As I mentioned previously, in 14 other instances additional financing was obtained contingent upon the province's guarantee.

Another service rendered by the agency has been to actively assist Ontario-based companies in their financial negotiations with the conventional lending institutions. Twelve companies have been assisted in this manner and have been successful in obtaining $2.9 million in additional financing. In these cases, as distinct from the advisory cases, considerable work was done by the agency's consultants to help companies which could qualify, to set up a basis for financial negotiations with outside lending institutions.

About 40 companies were successful in obtaining a further $2 million financing from conventional lending institutions as a direct result of the advisory services with which they were provided. In these instances, only negligible participation in actual financial negotiations was required.

Many owners of small businesses are unaware, for example, of the institution they should approach for the type of financing they require. Others are unaware of the requirements that must be met before lenders will consider additional financing. Our experience has shown that a large number of smaller companies can, in fact, obtain the financing they need, provided they obtain competent guidance in presenting their cases.

All had previously attempted to secure financing but had been unsuccessful mainly because of the lack of technique in submitting their financial proposals in a manner satisfactory to potential lenders. In some instances a complete financial and managerial reconstruction was required. In others a revamping was necessary of the proposed security. In all these cases the financial and technical know-how of the agency's consultants proved to be a key factor in the successful conclusion of negotiations.

Although the provision of advisory services is not as spectacular as that of financing, I view this aspect of the agency's operations as the more important. If Ontario's industry is to thrive, it has to be efficient. Basic to efficient operations are good management and sound operating techniques.

There is a dearth of good management not only in Ontario and Canada, but also throughout the western world. This is particularly true for small businesses where resources are limited. This lack of good management and lack of knowledge often result in the utilization of inferior operating techniques.

Realizing that this situation exists, the agency recruited consultants, many of whom were actively engaged in private practice after retirement from high executive office in commerce and industry. Among them are professional engineers, professional accountants, and men with broad experience in general management, research and development, manufacturing techniques, domestic and foreign marketing, economics and finance. These consultants, whose talents might otherwise have been wasted, have brought a wealth of experience and judgment to bear on the problems of more than 700 Ontario companies, which have benefited from their advice. I might add that Business Week last week had an article saying the U.S. was going to do exactly the same thing—use retired business executives to help small businesses.

There is no doubt that as a result of the advice they received, a large number of these companies are now operating more profitably and efficiently. Many have achieved improvements in costing systems, marketing techniques, financial structure and general and administrative methods. From the numerous letters of appreciation we have received, it is abundantly clear that these advisory services are filling a real need, particularly in the area of small business. There is no other jurisdiction in Canada which provides a service of this breadth and quality.

One of the first steps taken by the agency upon its formation was to come to a working arrangement with the Ontario research foundation for the scientific evaluation of new products and new techniques. The successful marketing of improved industrial products and the development of more economical processes are major means by which Ontario's economy can continue to expand. On the other hand, these are areas in which small companies, and particularly individual inventors, encounter the greatest difficulty in obtaining competent advice and financial accommodation. The agency ensures that inventions which come to its attention are rapidly evaluated with the help of the Ontario research foundation.

To date, 40 products have been referred for scientific evaluation to the Ontario Research Foundation. Not all of these new ideas have proved to be feasible, and the inventors were advised accordingly. Other inventions—technically sound—required managerial, advisory and financial aid before they could be put into production.

Twelve of the 70 new products and processes which have been dealt with by the agency have gone into production with the support of provincial guarantees, while 12 more are either in the process of going into production or appear likely to do so within the near future without provincial financing. Several other of these applications are under consideration.

In summary, as a result of its activities to date, the Ontario Development Agency has arranged financing of $12.2 million for Ontario industry. Employment in the plants which have received guarantees now totals over 1,300 persons, with another 1,300 new jobs in process of creation, for a total exceeding 2,600 employment opportunities. The $2.9 million of financing without government participation, which has been confirmed through conventional lending institutions, is providing employment for not less than 600 persons. At least 400 more persons are now receiving pay cheques because of the financing obtained by the 40 companies that we estimate received loans as a direct result of our advisory services. Thus, in total, over 3,600 job opportunities have been established, or are in the course of creation, through efforts of the Ontario Development Agency. In addition, Canada's balance-of-trade position will be improved by $12.5 million because of additional exports amounting to $9 million and the replacement of imports costing $3.5 million.

I consider that the programme carried out by the Ontario Development Agency has been, on balance, both successful and practical. By its very nature it involves elements of risk and this should always be borne in mind when assessing its results.

It is quite true that the programme has had its setbacks. Some of these were due to the risk elements to which I have referred, combined with the newness of the venture and the unforeseen problems which all new programmes encounter.

This programme, however, has demonstrated beyond any shadow of doubt the need for the services provided by the Ontario Development Agency. As a result of one year of activity, there are plants operating successfully in many places in Ontario, including Windsor, Woodstock, Toronto, Carleton Place, northern Ontario, and many other centres, which would not have been operating and giving employment if this agency had not been in existence. The municipalities are deriving additional assessment and taxation from these companies—revenues which they would otherwise not receive. I believe it has fulfilled a real need.

I touch now on a subject which I understand in the past has brought about some levity in this House, but I am sure it is not a matter of fun for those affected. I would like to talk about the termite problem.

I would like to refer to a matter of specific interest to the hon. member for Woodbine (Mr. Bryden). A few weeks ago he brought to my attention a most distressing problem affecting property owners in Metropolitan Toronto, particularly in the southeastern part of the city, and subsequently spoke on the matter in this House. Termite infestation, which started with a minor outbreak in the docks area some years ago, has assumed alarming proportions in recent years.

As you know, I am quite new to the housing field and was not conversant with the matter which he raised. However, we have since investigated the problem, which is of great concern to this government in that it constitutes a severe threat to the housing stock and to the homeowner's investment in his property.

The government has arranged to carry out a study in collaboration with the city of Toronto to determine the effect of chemical disinfestation when applied to all structures within a given area. For the purpose of this study, grants of up to 50 per cent of the city's contribution toward the cost of disinfestation will be made up to a maximum of $125 per dwelling or structure. Concurrently, all dwellings and other structures will be thoroughly examined to determine the extent of termite damage and the estimated cost of repairs.

The study will be carried out in certain designated areas of the city which will be selected in consultation with city officials. Participation by the Ontario government in this project will be contingent upon the city enacting by-laws as contemplated in The Planning Act. And we are hopeful this can be undertaken with a minimum of delay.

I will look forward to receiving constructive recommendations on a matter of this kind from the hon. members and can assure you I will do my best to expedite a solution. I might add that we are allotting $150,000 for the next three years to this programme. I am sure it will be matched by the city of Toronto and I hope we can involve our federal friends at a later date.

One of the programmes of major interest, I am sure, to all hon. members of this House, is the matter of housing. I would like to cover that now and I think you will find what we have to say of great interest.

The federal-provincial housing programme has now been underway for about 14 years. During that time, successive provincial Ministers have brought their housing estimates before this House in the sure knowledge of being criticized for not spending the previous fiscal year's allocation of funds. Never have our expenditures on housing exceeded the capital budget. In most years, expenditures have fallen far short, sometimes by as much as 50 per cent.

Understandably, we measure the success or failure of the housing programme not by the amount of work carried out during the year but by the dollars spent and the number of houses completed.

I am confident we would not judge the housing programme on this basis if we were fully aware of all the factors involved in producing housing when several levels of government are concerned.

For instance, surveys to determine the precise need and demand for rental housing were completed by the housing branch in 16 municipalities in 1963. Of these, 13 showed a definite need for housing projects and the municipalities concerned were advised of this need. However, after giving the municipalities the completed survey reports, only six requested that we proceed with projects.

It must be remembered that when a municipality requests a survey, after the provincial government has completed the study involving considerable work and expense, it is still the prerogative of the municipality to decide if it wants a housing project or not.

Often there are instances where a municipality has bowed to local pressures and cancelled a project when planning was virtually completed and tenders about to be called. Under these circumstances we have no other alternative than to renegotiate a new arrangement with the municipality, if possible, to overcome local objection, or to withdraw completely.

In view of the criticisms of the housing programme in general, some I assure you unwarranted, but nonetheless sufficiently factual to make one approach a new housing concept with caution, sir, it is my firm belief that, with the full co-operation of our federal partner, the plans contemplated for the new year will enable this department to put into operation a programme to meet Ontario's housing requirements which will not only be workable with the least amount of aggravation and delay, but will be mutually acceptable to the various levels of governments concerned.

This government has always been prepared to provide the funds needed to develop a sound housing programme. Unfortunately, the ability to spend the money allotted for this purpose has all too often encountered difficulties beyond the control of the government. We recognize that the root of the problem is not lack of funds provided for this purpose but more a lack of co-ordination on the part of all involved in housing projects generally. Following numerous discussions with the federal authorities who have been most co-operative, we now feel that a more comprehensive programme can be initiated immediately certain contemplated changes in The National Housing Act come into effect.

In order that all of us may more fully understand the housing programme I am proposing for the future, I believe it is of prime importance to review the housing programme under which we have been operating up to the present time.

Some hon. members will recall that the public housing programme came to a virtual standstill in 1959. Rising costs and high interest rates had placed a premium on the production of housing. Economic rentals were beyond the means of low-income families and our housing was no longer meeting the needs of those families we were supposed to be helping. Municipalities which had helped to subsidize rentals were no longer interested in sharing this burden.

The government of Ontario carried out a searching economic study of the housing programme during 1959-60 and, after conferring with the other levels of government involved, introduced in October, 1960 the financial arrangements and rent-to-income formula for rental projects which is in effect today.

Despite the difficulties to which I have referred, a great deal has been accomplished by the housing branch over the last three years. In order that hon. members may more fully appreciate the extent of this work I would like to outline very briefly the preparatory work which precedes every development.

As hon. members all know, it is the municipality which initiates a project by submitting a request to the province. To ensure that municipalities are aware of the housing programme, representatives of the housing branch have appeared before over 70 municipal councils during the last three years to explain the terms and conditions under which projects are developed and to show photographs of existing projects.

When a municipality requests the housing branch to establish whether there is a need in the community for low rental housing, research staff of the branch carry out a survey during which they try to contact all families who may be in need of better housing or who cannot afford to rent privately owned accommodation. In addition, they interview local employers, the clergy, and other leading members of the community in order to obtain a broad picture of its housing needs, wage structure and general economy.

For a medium size town, the field work usually takes about two weeks, following which all of the material obtained is compiled in a report which indicates, among other things, the number and size of houses required and the approximate rentals which the applicants will be able to pay. This report is then sent to the municipality which may or may not reject a project.

In 1961, for example, the housing branch completed nine surveys at the request of municipalities. Although eight of these surveys established a definite need for rental housing, only four municipalities asked for projects. Again in 1962, 43 surveys were completed and although 25 of these proved beyond any doubt that housing projects were urgently needed, only eight municipalities acted on the survey report by requesting projects. There was a marked improvement in 1963 in that 16 surveys were completed, of which 13 justified development of projects. However, 18 rental projects were requested by municipalities, some based on surveys completed over the past two years.

So, over the three-year period, the housing branch has completed a total of 68 surveys, 46 of which justified going ahead with projects; but only 30 municipalities have shown a willingness to participate by requesting one.

I have outlined the preparatory work done over the past three years to expedite the housing programme in this province and I am sure you will have by now recognized the magnitude of the job that has to be carried out before a project gets underway, and how frequently all of this work proves to be fruitless. Nevertheless, during the three years, nine rental housing projects and ten land assembly projects were completed, and at the end of 1963 there were a greater number of projects either under construction, with tenders about to be called, or in the planning stage, than in any previous year.

I am sure you would be interested in knowing the municipalities where rental housing projects are under development or planning for 1964. Projects should be under construction during the year in Belleville, Chatham, Cochrane, Collingwood, Delhi, Dunnville, Fort Frances, Galt, Hamilton, Kapuskasing, Kingston, Lindsay, London, Metro Toronto (five), Midland, Oakville, Oshawa, Ottawa (four), Palmerston, Parry Sound, Port Arthur, Sudbury, Timmins, Toronto township and Woodstock.

Apart from the rental housing programme under which we buy land, subdivide and service it, then build houses for rental, there is also a land assembly programme. For this, raw land is purchased, subdivided and serviced with roads, sewers, water, and so on, then the lots are sold to families who wish to build a house for their own occupancy. Parcels of land are also set aside for schools, churches, parks and other forms of development in order to provide a balanced community.

Land assembly projects of this kind will be under development in 1964 in Brantford, Brockville, Cornwall, Dunnville, Galt, Guelph, Hamilton, Kingston, Metro Toronto (two), Michipicoten, Napanee, Nepean township, Penetang, Peterborough (two), St. Thomas, Sandwich East, Tillsonburg and Trenton.

May I point out that over the years the federal authorities have shown a marked reluctance to participate with us in projects, either rental housing or land assembly, in municipalities of under 5,000 population, or in one-industry towns. This excluded many of the northern communities and smaller centres which are included in the municipalities I have just drawn to your attention. Last year we prevailed upon the federal government to remove these restrictions and now any community, no matter its size or location, can request and qualify for a rental housing project provided housing is needed. For example, a 20-unit project will be starting within a few weeks in the town of Palmerston, population 1,500.

While on the subject of our current programme I would like to say a few words about the "12-point plan" which was introduced in 1962. I believe it was a good programme and showed initiative and courage, but unfortunately it depended in many respects on the willingness of other levels of government to participate. Before we dismiss the 12-point plan, however, let me review a few of the things it has accomplished.

It promised greater federal-provincial co-operation. This has been achieved and is reflected in the great number of projects now under development, many of which are in communities where, up until a year ago, the federal government would never have agreed to develop housing.

It included the rent certificate plan. This was put into operation in Metro where 245 units have been leased to date and are costing this government $120,000 per year in rental subsidies, of which it bears the entire cost. It has not been expanded for the simple reason that the federal government shows no interest in sharing this cost.

The programme included grants to limited dividend companies. We have already made a grant of $903,000 to the Moss Park rental project in the city of Toronto. This will provide the housing authority with a rent reduction fund of approximately $48,000 per annum during the life of the federal mortgage. It will be used to reduce the rents of those families who most need some financial assistance.

Just a week or two ago I was pleased to announce a grant of $520,000 toward the cost of a senior citizens development at Thistle-town in Etobicoke. This project, which is to be built by the Metropolitan Housing Company, is the first of its kind in Ontario and will comprise 418 self-contained apartment units, each with full cooking facilities: 102 hotel-type units with communal dining services; a lounge, auditorium, and craft rooms. The Ontario government grant will provide a rent reduction fund of some $30,400 per annum to reduce rentals where most needed. In addition to the $520,000 grant, the province is guaranteeing that part of the mortgage applicable to the hotel-type accommodation, dining and other facilities. This portion of the mortgage amounts to about $800,000 and the federal government would not have made the loan without a provincial guarantee.

This project, which is also receiving financial assistance from the Atkinson Foundation, will be an outstanding example of what can be done to provide good accommodation, excellent meals at nominal cost, and the facilities and environment to ensure that life is made full and interesting for the elderly people who will reside there.

The programme promised that the needs of small municipalities and special groups would be looked into, and I have already told you that the housing programme is now available to any community where there is a need for housing. Last year we completed a small pilot project for Indian families living under extremely poor conditions in the town of Red Lake, and I am sure you have read the article on this experiment which appeared in the February issue of Ontario Housing. The housing branch is now working with another Indian community which will, I hope, result in the development later this year of a larger project near the town of McIntosh.

Studies to determine the feasibility of buying existing houses to supplement the supply of government-constructed rental housing were to be carried out. In point of fact, The Housing Development Act has provided for this form of activity since 1962, but The National Housing Act does not. This matter has been diligently pursued with the federal authorities and we are confident that the proposed amendments to The National Housing Act will permit the purchase of such houses.

We have already made a start by optioning houses in the north end redevelopment area of the city of Hamilton. These houses will be rehabilitated and rented to families eligible for public housing.

Research grants in the amount of $15,000 have been made over the past year. Studies which have been carried out are:

The social implications of public housing in Metropolitan Toronto—being carried out by the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority; methods of obtaining data on the need and demand for low rental housing on a continuing basis—by Dr. John Dakin, University of Toronto; a national study of public housing—under the direction of Professor James A. Murray.

A very important aspect of the housing programme was the appointment of an Ontario housing advisory committee to advise the government on all matters pertaining to housing in Ontario. This committee functions under the able chairmanship of Mr. K. D. Soble, of Hamilton.

As a result of its investigations into the Ontario housing scene the committee concluded that any proposals for a diversified housing programme could not adequately be carried out by a branch of government, and a special committee was appointed under the chairmanship of Mr. A. E. Diamond to go into the matter in some depth. Mr. Soble and Mr. Diamond have recently reported to me on the findings of the subcommittee and I will refer to these as I deal with our proposals for a future housing programme.

I would now like to outline this government's plans for a broader housing programme in Ontario, which we are confident will eliminate many of the inherent weaknesses of the present programme, such as: too many levels of government involved, each able to retard or stop a project; time-consuming procedures involving a multitude of approvals before a project gets under way; the limited scope of government-designed and constructed projects resulting in houses too easily identifiable as public housing units; no incentive for the tenant to improve his financial circumstances, in that increased earnings result in higher rent and ultimately in "notice to vacate" or a 30-per-cent surcharge on all earnings over a given amount.

While these are perhaps some of the major difficulties experienced, there are, of course, many minor frustrations which I am sure can be eliminated.

We have based our future housing programme on the changes contemplated in The National Housing Act, two of which are of great significance to this province. The resolution introduced last year by the then federal Minister responsible for housing indicated that provinces which wished to run their own public housing programmes with the assistance of long-term federal loans and sharing of operating losses will be able to do so, and that existing houses in any part of the community may be purchased for this purpose.

Under the programme contemplated, the province could assume full jurisdiction for planning, directing and administering the housing programme with costs being shared. The governments need no longer design and construct houses, but instead would be able to take full advantage of the building industry's design know-how and cost-saving techniques.

For example, having decided on the need, location and size of project required, the province could invite builders to submit proposals on a competitive basis for houses of a certain size and standard but using their own designs. In terms of time and economy, I believe substantial savings could be made. I think we read a few weeks ago where one Ontario company got a $15 million project in Buffalo.

Another method could be the purchase of houses in existing subdivisions wherever economically feasible. This method presents a sure way of integrating public housing tenants into the mainstream of the community and of providing accommodation in a minimum of time.

This same method can be applied in suitable older areas of our municipalities. Certain of these houses may well need some degree of rehabilitation, but if this is economically feasible we will have accomplished the double service of providing family housing and also helping to improve a neighbourhood. In certain instances we may well buy larger houses and duplex them for small families.

As you may already know, tenancy of public housing is at present restricted to families within a certain income range and to elderly persons. The family income limit for eligibility varies according to the wage structure of the municipality involved. At the moment this ranges from $4,561 per annum in most municipalities to $5,111 in Hamilton. Again, let me emphasize that this is a family income figure.

The point I am making is that public housing is not tenanted exclusively by welfare cases; in fact it is not usual for more than ten per cent of the tenants of a project to be in receipt of welfare.

The large majority of tenants are very ordinary, hard-working people who do not have the financial resources at the time to purchase a home or rent accommodation on the private market. We have to offer these families an incentive to improve their financial position in life, not discourage them with penalty rents or notice to quit when they substantially increase their income.

Here is an indication of what we would like to do if the federal government is prepared to co-operate with us. Our discussions with the late John R. Garland gave us every reason to believe that we may expect to receive the complete support of the federal government in our endeavours to initiate major administrative changes in Ontario's housing programme.

In future projects a public-housing tenant could be permitted to purchase the house in which he has lived for a number of years when his income reaches a certain point. Each tenant would be told when he rented the house that if his income improved to a point where a penalty rent became payable, he would be given an opportunity to purchase the house at normal NHA interest rates. If his income increased to the penalty level immediately after occupancy and before a reasonable "proving" period as a tenant had elapsed, the penalty rent would be held in trust against the time when he subsequently assumed the mortgage. In other words, any rental payments over and above the economic rent of the house would not be a loss to the tenant but would be "banked" on his behalf.

It would not be possible for tenants of apartment projects, such as Regent Park South, to purchase the units which they occupied, but arrangements could be made whereby interested families could in time transfer to a house which they would then have the opportunity of purchasing. This kind of scheme could also be made available to childless couples who are not eligible for public housing at the present time.

The homeowner instinct is surprisingly strong in most families, and many prefer to live in what may be totally inadequate accommodation but which they hope one day to own. I have said that the income range for public housing is as high as $5,000 in certain parts of Ontario. Over 13,000 families within this range purchased homes under NHA financing in 1963, and approximately the same number in the preceding three years.

We appreciate that there are a significant number of families who will always need assistance if they are to occupy decent accommodation, and these families will receive our help. However, we should not forget the other end of the scale—the families who, with just a little help could become wholly self-sufficient and proud homeowners in their community.

After many months of investigation into the housing needs of Ontario, the housing advisory committee, under the chairmanship of Mr. K. D. Soble, has recommended that a provincial housing corporation be constituted, responsible to a Cabinet Minister but operating under a board of directors. The committee believes that such a corporation could achieve far greater diversification in its operations than does a department or branch of government. The corporation, being a provincial body, would be able to deal with Ontario's housing problems as separate and distinct from the federal agency, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which must of necessity deal with housing problems on a national basis.

Such a corporation could assume responsibility for the planning, direction and administration of all aspects of the housing programme, including any or all of the activities which I have suggested. The board of directors would replace the present housing advisory committee but would act in a similar capacity in all matters affecting housing in Ontario.

The advisory committee has already made certain recommendations as to the activities of the proposed corporation, including the provision of home improvement loans, mortgages on older dwellings, loan guarantees, assistance to co-operative housing groups, and financial and other assistance in connection with the conservation of the existing housing stock. All of these proposals will be studied, and if feasible will be implemented.

We are confident that changes in The National Housing Act will be forthcoming shortly which will give the province greater freedom to assist municipalities in meeting their housing needs. Accordingly, I will be bringing a bill before this House to provide for the setting up of an Ontario housing corporation so that we may take full advantage of the anticipated changes in The National Housing Act when they come into effect.

In conclusion, may I say that while I have yet to learn a lot more about housing, this in itself presents a challenge, and furthermore, I consider housing to be one of the most worthwhile programmes under my jurisdiction. I have outlined to you the problems inherent in the programme as it is today and what we propose to do in the future. These proposals have been given considerable thought and are not made idly or without due consideration to the fact that the betterment of living conditions for all segments of our population can have a far-reaching effect on Ontario's economic and social structure.

On vote 401:

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, it has been interesting to listen to the hon. Minister of Economics and Development for the better part of two hours. It has been interesting to follow his comments and compare them with the comments which came forward a year ago.

I may be wrong in my conclusion, but it appears to me, as I have gone through the speeches of the hon. Minister's predecessor (Mr. Macaulay), that an effort was made, whether conscious or unconscious, to create a brand-new image.

There is a very different approach in what this hon. Minister says to what his predecessor said. His predecessor was a man who believed in strong and positive statements. He had a 12-point programme for this and a nine-point programme for that and a 7.5-point programme for something else. None of his programmes filled that hon. gentleman with extreme modesty, because they were all achievable and attainable within the next 12-month period.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): No, yesterday!

Mr. Singer: Well, as my hon. colleague from Sudbury says, probably yesterday, because the Minister of that time suddenly had discovered that these things were needed. And if he discovered they were needed then they had to be done yesterday.

It is very interesting to compare, as I say, Mr. Chairman, the approach of the two Ministers, because this hon. Minister has paid little more than passing reference to the old image. He has ignored—if he studied and I suppose he did—all these many point programmes. He has ignored many of the goals his predecessor set for achievement, and nowhere more pointedly has he ignored these things than in the question of housing.

I propose to deal with housing later on in my remarks but it is a pity that the programme which was hailed and applauded in government publications as probably the greatest thing North America ever saw, in the usual modesty which accompanied such performances in those days, has now been discarded. I have here a publication, Ontario Housing, of October, 1963, which says:

Mr. Macaulay has greatly advanced the cause of public housing in Canada. With his 12-point housing programme announced in 1962 he has been described by the United States housing commissioner as being ten years in advance of anything on the North American continent. His tremendous enthusiasm, his knack of becoming truly involved in his task, his ability to accomplish that which at first seems just a little impossible, have all been an inspiration to the housing branch.

This hon. Minister took some 20-odd pages of his speech to quietly inter the great 12-point programme which was ten years in advance of anything anyone had seen in North America. He says he did not do it really because there was a lot of merit in it, and maybe if there was some fault it existed up in Ottawa; but, as I say, I propose a little later on in my remarks to make some substantial references to the housing programme.

The hon. Minister starts out, as properly he should, in commenting on the economic situation in the province today. He paid fair tribute, I would say, to the role of the federal government. He did not take on to himself or his government all of the credit for what has happened in this country in the past 12-month fiscal period. I think that he has noted in passing, although he did not happen to mention it, that not too long ago there was a change in government in Ottawa. Coincidental with that change, there was a real upsurge in the economy and I would suggest that—perhaps it might not lie too well in this hon. Minister's mouth to say it but I will say it—some very substantial credit can, should, and must be given to those who are in charge of our affairs in this field in the federal government.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): One might say they get along better with their enemies than they do with their friends.

Mr. Singer: Yes, as my hon. leader suggests, it is not only true but I think it must be emphasized: This government appears to get along much better with their apparent enemies than they did with their friends, because in the five years preceding 1962 there seemed to be great complaints emanating from here, great grasping on to these branches of authority which normally belong in Ottawa. Now that Ottawa is running well and the government there is accepting its responsibility as it should, this government is happy to withdraw and let Ottawa carry on and promote generally the well-being of the country. This is as it should be. It was unfortunate we had this five-year pause.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): They had the same difficulty with their friends as Hepburn did.

Mr. Singer: On the way by I did spend some considerable time making notes on the remarks of the hon. Minister's predecessor. I was hoping he would deal, point by point, with the various projects his predecessor had outlined as goals for the day, or goals for the week, or the year. He mentioned for instance a three-part survey of the ONR, its uses and purposes; he took that upon himself in his capacity as Minister of Economics. The present hon. Minister of Economics did not join in the debate yesterday and I wonder what happened to the three-point economic survey into the use of the ONR. I think that would have been very valuable, and could have been a very substantial contribution to the debate yesterday which dealt with the Ontario Northland Railway.

An hon. member: Where is the former Minister now?

Mr. Singer: There was a programme suggested of extension to northern communications in the amount of $7.2 million. We heard very little about that again. The hon. Minister's predecessor talked at some great length about development in northern Ontario, about moving industry around, about decentralization and so on. I hardly heard a word in his address this afternoon about northern Ontario. Yes, there were passing references to regional development; and regional development the hon. Minister compared to the cold war. These are high-sounding phrases indeed, but where is the regional development in northern Ontario?

At least the hon. Minister's predecessor recognized there was a problem. I suppose, in preparing for his remarks this afternoon, the hon. Minister must have admitted to himself there was a problem, but it did not lie well to just repeat what had been said last year because really there is nothing to report. My hon. colleague who comes from northern Ontario undoubtedly will deal with these facts at some greater length before these estimates are through, but I think it is a matter that should be carefully noted. Notwithstanding the high-sounding phrases and promises put forward by the hon. Minister's predecessor just a year ago, we heard very little today about this government's plans for the well-being of northern Ontario.

The hon. Minister's predecessor talked at some very substantial length about a point which I think is most important to our future development; this is to do with the retention in this country, in this province, of professionally trained people. He advised us that we were short some 23,000 professionally trained scientists, and he did set forward a programme where he thought that this lack could be diminished and we would have more scientific people available to us.

This has been referred to as a "brain drain" in England. It is a very serious problem and I think we should have heard something today about what this hon. Minister proposes to do in connection with keeping in this province, and in this country, those people who are trained here. We need scientific minds; we need people with good scientific background, training and understanding; but we do not seem to have any programme or any idea of how to keep them here. Although, again, the hon. Minister's predecessor recognized this as a problem we heard very little elaboration on it this afternoon.

In the field of agriculture, the hon. Minister's predecessor had a habit that was perhaps annoying to some of his colleagues—he strayed into almost every department of government—but he thought that in the field of agriculture the economic council could make substantial achievements. There were going to be studies about marketing and sale of products. I think the fiasco we had earlier this year, insofar as tobacco marketing is concerned, would cause us to wonder on this side of the House just how far the hon. Minister has progressed with the agriculture committee of the economic council, what sort of suggestions the gentlemen have been able to bring forward, what sort of communication has come from the hon. Minister of Economics and Development through his colleague, the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart), so that we could have a better agricultural climate in the province of Ontario. This was another one of the goals the hon. member for Riverdale (Mr. Macaulay) set, and this goal seems to have vanished with his departure.

In so far as housing is concerned, let me leave that for a moment. I have it at this point in my notes because that was the point at which the hon. member for Riverdale dealt with it in his speech, but I will come back to that shortly.

The hon. member for Riverdale talked about the retraining of the labour force, and even a year ago there was great vagueness as to how this was going to be achieved. I was disappointed, again, in hearing very little reference to methods of retraining, the co-ordination of various efforts of this hon. Minister, when he strays into the labour field, and the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree).

We have before us a bill that is of great concern to many people in Ontario, the bill relating to stationary engineers. I am sure that the hon. Minister of Economics and Development is as aware as anyone that the real problem in dealing with the trade of stationary engineers is that with the advances in technical science many thousands of men who are making their living as stationary engineers are no longer going to be able to make a living in this way.

So really it is an economic problem; it is a problem of automation. It is a problem of the advance of science catching up with the whole trade of stationary engineers. This is one of the reasons why we had this large delegation here in the House when the hon. Minister of Labour brought in his new bill. I would have hoped that with this current example, because that bill has not even worked its way through the House, the hon. Minister of Economics and Development could not have found a better place in which to say: "Here is a trade that has a serious problem. Here is a trade that modern technology is making less and less important. Here are thousands of citizens of Ontario who are going to find themselves with less ability to make a living with a lesser number of jobs."

I would have hoped that with this trade, or any other, the hon. Minister would have come to us today and said: "This is what we propose and this is how we are going to embark upon a retraining programme so that these citizens of ours, these people in Ontario who are facing this very serious problem, will be able to continue to have a responsible place in our society. We are going to train them in new jobs, and this is the way we are doing it."

But we heard not a word of this, this afternoon, Mr. Chairman—not a word. I suppose the hon. Minister's predecessor built us up to too great heights because he was prepared to take on the whole world. There was not a Cabinet position about which he did not have some suggestions to make. Now it may be that this hon. Minister is much more modest. He says, "There is a labour problem; I will leave it to the Minister of Labour." Or, "There is an agricultural problem; I will leave it to the Minister of Agriculture." Or, "There is a tourist problem—" This hon. Minister did mention this afternoon a little bit about The Department of Tourism and Information, but his predecessor had almost moved in and taken over.

Joint letters came out. Joint letters came out. It may be, as I say, Mr. Chairman, that there is a little more modesty here. But I say that the type of problem that the hon. member for Riverdale recognized and at least promised that he was going to do something about, seems to have vanished from the thinking of this hon. Minister and his department.

It may be that this is the way that this hon. Minister envisages the functioning of his department. If this is so, then Mr. Chairman, I think we must take another approach because the sort of speech that he made, except for the housing part, is really part of a Budget speech. It was a long speech and it is the sort of report that is made year after year by the Treasurers of various governments, by the Ministers of Finance.

Mr. MacDonald: Well written!

Mr. Singer: Well written. Many economists must have sat and spent many hours preparing it. It is the sort of thing that one expects from a Minister of Finance and it would belong more properly, to my mind, with the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) because he is the Minister of Finance for the province of Ontario. The only real excuse for this new department, as I understood it in any event from the approach taken by the hon. member for Riverdale, is that the economic condition of Ontario is the lifeline of the province. He recognized his responsibility to delve into each separate little compartment of government in order to improve those things.

This hon. Minister has withdrawn from all those fields. It may be only his modesty that allows him to do it. But I say that in his economic studies and so on, these could more properly belong in the department assigned to the hon. Provincial Treasurer. It may be that this presages the Cabinet shuffle that we heard talked about over the past few weeks. It probably will not take place until the House rises, but it may be we have heard the new Provincial Treasurer make his maiden address in that portfolio. If so, then we should get The Department of Economics and Development into its proper aspect and recognize that today it should be more than an adjunct to The Provincial Treasurer's Department.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): That is a very old-fashioned approach.

Mr. Singer: The hon. member for Woodbine talks about an old-fashioned approach. The voters in the province he used to work in took an old-fashioned approach yesterday, they decided they were fed up with some of the ideas that they had had—

An hon. member: Who won? Who won?

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I would think that one of the things that is important in an election is the day they count up the ballots and they find out who forms the government.

The hon. member for Woodbine's party did not form the government as a result of what happened yesterday and that speaks for itself—old-fashioned approach or not.

If the hon. member for Woodbine had been listening to my remarks a little later on, I was comparing the approach of the hon. member for Riverdale with the approach of the present hon. Minister.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, it is a pity that I have to try to explain things to a person who has closed his mind. We will just let him read it in Hansard. I am sure that if he will pay enough attention to the remarks as they are reported in Hansard, even he might understand.

One of the points that the hon. member for Riverdale mentioned was the talk of industrial incentives. This is something that we spoke about at some length on this side of the House a year, two years and three years ago. The hon. member for Riverdale apparently thought it was a good idea. Well, I listened carefully to the speech of the hon. Minister this afternoon, and could not find any mention of the idea of industrial incentives.

We talked about the use of hydro with reduced rates to encourage industries to locate in certain areas, and the use of the ONR. These are things I touch on very briefly. I deplore the lack of initiative on the hon. Minister's part in not following up suggestions that were made by his predecessor a year ago in these particular phases.

We have heard substantial reference to the Ontario Development Agency this afternoon. I am inclined to agree with the hon. Minister when he says that somewhere along the line there must be some failures, but I would suspect that more than a few of the efforts in any event were less than satisfactory. I suspect that before the estimates are over he is going to hear a little more about at least one of them.

The hon. member for Riverdale talked about taking a new look at the immigration policy. There was no end of things he was going to examine. I wonder if his successor has taken that look at the immigration policy, and I wonder what he is going to suggest to the federal government.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): He gave you all the ideas you are expressing today.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman who formed part of the government—

Mr. Sopha: That hippo was not modelled on the hon. Minister of Mines.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: No, mine was the moose.

Mr. Singer: The trade crusade, and my hon. friend makes mention of the moose, started with the hippo—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: Meanwhile, back at the estimates—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Well, back at the review of the hon. member for Riverdale's speech of last year.

Mr. Singer: Yes, I think it is most important. I am very glad the hon. Prime Minister mentioned "back at the review of the hon. member for Riverdale's speech of last year." It is an amazing thing. One of the remarks that this hon. Minister made was that this government first came into being in November, 1961. Now we have heard the hon. Prime Minister say this on many occasions, in fact he knows, as everybody else does, this is a 21-year-old government. The faces change a little bit but it is still the same government. Even if there is some purpose in repeating this remark, I am surprised to hear the hon. Prime Minister deplore the fact that I am commenting on the speech made by his senior Minister of only a year ago. Just because he left, has the hon. Prime Minister discarded his ideas? Does he repudiate him this afternoon? Is that all gone by the board, everything that the former Minister said? Is that finished; is that the end?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I did not deplore—I just commented.

Mr. Singer: Well, the hon. Prime Minister's comment spoke for itself. I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that when the hon. member for Riverdale left, the government in fact died. The hon. Prime Minister lacks, in his present Cabinet, a man of the intelligence and ability to come forward with new ideas. This is why we have this deplorable show that this government has put forward in the present session.

An hon. member: His ideas were not carried out.

Mr. Singer: That is right.

Interjections by hon. members.

An hon. member: It is funny. The hon. member did not say that about him when he was here.

Mr. Singer: His absence has made us appreciate some of the good ideas he had and it is a pity, Mr. Chairman, that all of these things have been abandoned so quickly, the same way as they gave away the record of the old government — that old government which went in in 1943—and they talked about themselves only being a year and a half old. We are moving up to date; anything a previous Minister says in any department apparently is not part of policy if he is gone.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, the trade crusade and the mention of the hippo which gave way to the moose and now to the unfashionably dressed girl—I do not know which advertising agency produced that last image on the poster—I was very pleased, however, to see the carefully couched references in the hon. Minister's remarks to the reduction of advertising in Ontario and the concentration of advertising in other spheres. This at least will remove from our eyes some of the obnoxious features of the government's advertising—and some of it has been awfully poor—and will perhaps subject other jurisdictions to them. I would hope they will have more success in some of these other jurisdictions than apparently they have had here.

The former Minister spoke with great pride about the messages he delivered in New York and Chicago and Los Angeles and other international points. I wonder if this hon. Minister has felt it important to go on international jaunts delivering the Ontario message. If so, again he is a little more modest about them, because we have not heard about his recent trips.

He talked about the women's division of his department—and at that point the hon. Minister of Mines saw fit to applaud because the hon. Minister said the women are doing a fine job—and the hon. Minister of Mines said, "This is great, this is great." But I did notice that several months ago an advertisement was put forward by his department asking for applications for a director of that branch.

An hon. member: Why does the hon. Minister of Mines not apply for it?

Mr. Singer: Several weeks ago, in answer to a question asked from this side of the House, which I think the hon. Minister of Economics misinterpreted, he did say that that appointment had not yet been made. But if this division is working so well and is so efficient and so important, one would have thought that the appointment which was advertised—oh, I guess four months ago or more—would have been filled by now.

I would like the hon. Minister to tell us what is happening in that department because my mind goes back to the remarks made by my colleague, the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Trotter), about the description of one of the affairs the hon. member for Riverdale ran in one of the hotels.

Mr. MacDonald: Those were pretty cheap remarks.

Mr. Singer: About the functions of the women's division. It is all very fine to pay tribute to the women's division and say that the women are most important in the programme of the economic development of the province. But rather than pay lip service of the kind the hon. Minister has done, if there is a positive programme to which he is moving forward, if he has a civil service which he has appointed and which is prepared to deal with it, I would have hoped that he would have been able to spell out in some detail what that programme is, and at least tell the House how that programme is going to be carried on and by whom. We have not heard anything about that at all.

The hon. member for Riverdale talked about the decentralization of industry, and again the mention of the importance of northern Ontario in this sort of programme is most important. We have heard nothing at all about how the hon. Minister proposes to decentralize industry; nor has there been any real indication that those areas which are crying out for industrial assistance in job employment and so on, other than in the general broad picture, are being looked after.

What, for instance, has been done for Cornwall? What, for instance, has been done for Windsor? What, for instance, is being done in northern Ontario? Those are the things we should have heard about.

The Minister, a year ago, talked about runaway industries and there have been several examples of runaway industries being moved from one location to another. One of them came to some quite prominent notice in the daily press a few months ago. The Minister did not seem to have anything to say then, nor does he have anything to say now about that particular phase of it.

Sir, the former Minister proposed some nine expansion aids. Amongst those he mentioned was the conduct of many seminars. I have not heard, this afternoon, any mention of seminars.

Transportation studies were going to be undertaken. This was in line with some of his previous suggestions, but there were no transportation studies referred to at all.

He was going to initiate a new system of Ontario achievement awards. This is a type of encouragement, I suspect, the hon. Minister hoped would produce greater incentive to those people who were going to make certain achievements in the field of manufacturing and other fields. But that seems to have gone by the board.

He talked about his goals for the following year. He was going to have 160 new manufacturing firms make things which were previously imported. Now the hon. Minister did mention this afternoon some 170 branches of American companies which had set up branches in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I said 173 new companies; 78 new license agreements.

Mr. Singer: That 173 new companies had opened branches? Well, that is fine. But about the 160 new manufacturing firms to make things which were previously imported, that his predecessor promised a year ago, we have not heard whether the 160 has come, whether any portion of them has come, or whether there are any statistics in relation to their having come. There were going to be 75 new arrangements made to license Ontario manufacturers to make things which were formerly imported. If there are new arrangements to license Ontario manufacturers, again we have not heard about them this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I mentioned 78 of those.

Mr. Singer: Seventy-eight of those? I apologize on that one; I missed that on the way by.

He was going to embark on a programme which would reduce the cost of tooling, manufacturing machinery tools, and so on. If the hon. Minister mentioned that this afternoon, again I missed it, but I do not think he did.

He was going to embark on a programme to urge federal authorities and the other provinces to have a consistent "made in Canada" label. We have heard no reference at all to the labelling of goods and the importance of the "made in Canada" label.

The design awards committee was going to be set up. That again was not referred to this afternoon.

He had all sorts of wonderful ideas. He was going to have an around-the-world, Canadian-built trade ship. Where is the ship? Is it being built? What is the programme? Is it off around the world?

He was going to expand the speakers' bureau. I guess that has really been done, because the speeches which were made all across the country have been very expansive and indicate all sorts of fancy promises.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, on this aspect of the hon. Minister's estimates and his remarks this afternoon, it seems to me that the programme and the goals and the dreams which were presented by the hon. member for Riverdale have been abandoned, and the government would hope that his memory will silently pass away, as he has done, and that we will not hear anything more about these expansive ideas because really we are not in a position to carry them out.

Let me deal with housing for a bit. A year ago there was an important new beginning—and those were the hon. member for Riverdale's exact words—into housing. There was the 12-point programme, which really was to be the greatest thing the world had ever seen. And, as I say, the Minister of that day, in his modest way, in his publication with his picture above it, had somebody admit for him that he had greatly advanced the cause of public housing in Canada. His 12-point housing programme, announced in 1962, had been described as being ten years in advance of anything on the North American continent.

I suggest, having listened this afternoon to the extensive remarks of this hon. Minister, that he does not even recognize that a problem exists. He spent considerable time in talking about housing. He said "Let us not dismiss" or "Before we dismiss the 12-point programme, let us say that it is all Ottawa's fault that we could not carry it out, but let us not dismiss it and we have a new programme." Well, then, his new programme—and it starts about two-thirds of the way through his speech—I am suggesting, Mr. Chairman, does not exist at all. It is a bunch of ifs, ands and maybes. We could be doing something or we may be doing something else. There is no programme. There is no plan. There is going to be another series of long studies that might result in all sorts of things. It might result in some houses.

He starts the recommendation part of his programme toward the end of his remarks. He deals at some length with the Ontario housing advisory committee. I wonder if he could tell us the last time that committee met—the committee as a whole; not the sub-committee, not Mr. Soble and not Mr. Diamond, but the whole committee? I was informed, I hope incorrectly, that that Ontario housing committee, as a group as originally appointed, has not met since this hon. Minister took office. This was one of his predecessor's ideas, as a method of coping with the housing shortage. But whether my information is correct or whether it is not correct—I hope the hon. Minister will correct me—I think it is a shocking thing that the Ontario housing advisory committee has not met since this hon. Minister assumed his present portfolio.

Here is what he says in his programme. He says under the programme the province "could assume" full jurisdiction. Governments need no longer design. The province "could invite" builders. Another method "could be" the purchase of houses. Certain of these houses "may well" be needed. "If this is economically feasible" we might do. In certain instances "we may well" buy larger houses. Here is an indication of what "we would like to do." If a future projects results in public housing a tenant "could be permitted." But arrangements "could be made" whereby interested families. This kind of scheme could also be made available.

I ask you, Mr. Chairman, where in all these remarks relating to public housing, is there any programme at all in the mind of the government? How is it going to cope with this very, very serious problem? I am suggesting to you that this hon. Minister—who admits he knows very little about housing; says it is brand new to him—has very little belief or understanding in this field and it is not because there is a lack of material in relation to housing. There has hardly been a newspaper in Ontario that has not commented at great length about the housing shortage. I have a pile of clippings dealing with these matters. Here is the Star, and one editorial says "Let Queen's Park step in." This is an editorial dealing with the difficulties in Etobicoke.

An hon. member: The Sudbury Star?

Mr. Singer: No, the Toronto Daily Star for Friday, November 23, on a page seven article. It says:

Home sweet home. More than 30,000 in Metro lack a decent place to live.

Another article by Professor Anthony Adamson, whom the hon. Minister must know full well, says:

We have taken to public housing like a duck takes to asphalt.

That is the sort of thing that this hon. Minister was talking about this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: How many houses did the government build?

Mr. Singer: That is a very interesting question and I would suggest you ask your hon. colleague. He did not produce that figure this afternoon. What is the number of public houses that the government produced?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: This government has done the greatest housing job—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: Another editorial: "Public housing a sorry record," and I think I will read just parts of this "housing by headline":

The joint announcement by Ottawa and Queen's Park that work will start this spring on the $22 million, 12,000-unit low-income housing project in Thistletown is welcome news.

Well, we all know what is happening. Oh, I forgot one. The hon. Minister's predecessor, during the election campaign, suddenly evolved a great picture of a new complex for the old people. He was going to build a great apartment hotel development, somewhere right in his own riding. Well, with that Minister I guess those plans vanished. I think it was good enough for a day or two, with pictures on the front page of most Ontario papers and another "done" for the election campaign. But it did not happen.

Here is a list of some of the housing projects that were announced in the paper but never did appear on the ground. In September, 1953, an 8,000-unit project near Malvern in Scarborough was going to be built. In March, 1954, there was a Metro promise to spend $1 million a year for ten years for public housing. That was never done. In March, 1955, Metro approved a $12 million, 1,100-suite project at Lawrence Heights. Well, that was done. Yes, that was done. In March, 1958, there were going to be 1,000 low-cost units in the suburbs. It was a partial redevelopment of Alexandra Park and Moss Park, and if you know anything about Moss Park, which is finally being built, it is not the sort of housing that does any service to the people who are in need of housing developments and the hon. Minister should know that. In October, 1958, there were going to be some 380 units in Scarborough. In March, 1959, Metro housing committee approved a public housing programme with an objective of 9,000 units by 1965.

Those are the figures the hon. Minister was asking for. I have not heard them this afternoon and I would have hoped I would have heard some, but there are not any figures available. That is why neither he nor I have heard them.

In April, 1959, the Metro council was going to have 1,500 units in Thistletown. In January, 1960, there was a 21-acre site at O'Connor Drive and Victoria Parkway for possible use in low rental housing. And on and on and on. Another editorial is headed: "Thistletown can't wait." This Thistletown one has been going on for a long, long time. Then finally the hon. Minister gets into his portfolio. On January 29, he made a speech in which he forecast a new deal for housing. I do not know if this report is a correct interpretation of his remarks. I hoped at the time I saw the report on his speech that it was a correct interpretation, but there was no announcement of what the new deal would be at that time. Certainly, Mr. Chairman, as I have reviewed the hon. Minister's remarks this afternoon, this government has no housing programme at all—

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Of course it has. Most of it is done.

Mr. Singer: Most of it is done.

An hon. member: You are pretty well done, too.

Mr. Singer: Another story: "The neediest wait the longest for low rental housing."

The Globe and Mail has done a long series of articles: "Slums with high rents—public housing record." There is no point in reading all of these things into the record. Anyone with any real understanding or appreciation of this subject could find copious material to read, to understand and to evolve a positive programme.

The Telegram editorial on November 5 is headed: "Remove the obstacles to the Thistletown project." "Need but dented by Metro's new public housing," said the Star on July 25, 1963. "How red tape snarls public housing" was the heading on another article by a special writer in one of the Toronto newspapers.

The Ontario Federation of Labour has done an outstanding job of gathering together material and I am sure the hon. Minister was in receipt of it the same as I was. It is called "Statement on housing." These criticisms do not spare the federal government either. I do not commend the federal government for its lack of action in the housing field, but Mr. Chairman, the main responsibility lies here.

It is not sufficient to say that there are conflicting authorities. There are municipal authorities, federal authorities and so on. The main responsibility lies here, and the main red tape can be cut here, if there was a real belief in the minds of government insofar as public housing was concerned. There is none at all.

I do not think there is any real point in reading the 12-point programme put forward by the hon. member for Riverdale but there are a couple of articles here to which I do want to refer.

One was the very complete study made by P. E. H. Brady, the executive director of the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority. It came out in several volumes, the research programmes done as a result of his trips to other jurisdictions, and examinations of what could be done. But in this third volume which contains his recommendations, he goes through many pages of recommendations and criticisms, setting out what is wrong and what could and should, in his opinion, be done.

His major complaint is that there is no clear-cut policy in Canada on public housing and accordingly there are no long-term capital funds available. Although the province of Ontario was the first to come out with a specific housing programme, outlined in this statement a few years ago in 1962, that programme was, I think, sent out the window this afternoon.

There is no point, really, in my reading all of these pages of recommendations from Mr. Brady. This is a very important contribution to the field and I am certain that the hon. Minister would learn a great deal about public housing were he to study these three volumes prepared by this very competent man. The recommendations are outstanding.

I do, however, want to refer to the remarks made by Mr. W. Harold Clark in a speech he delivered on January 28. Mr. Clark was speaking to the social planning council; he is the chairman of the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority. These are some of the things he said:

There is an urgent need for housing large families requiring three-, four- and five-bedroom units. Far too many families are living in substandard accommodation. More low rental housing dwellings are needed if we are to keep abreast of urban renewal and development programmes. If we are behind schedule today, and we unquestionably are, where will we be in 1967, our centennial year, or in 1970, when Metro's population will likely reach two million?

He says:

—that the federal-provincial Metropolitan programme has failed to produce family housing in adequate numbers for several reasons—and these are four of the important ones: There are four governments involved—federal, provincial, metropolitan and the area municipalities—

he is talking about this immediate area:

—and the authority is completely diffused. No one government is charged with and has the responsibility for action, nor the power to act on its own initiative.

Of those four governments three are controlled by this Legislature, i.e. the provincial government, the metropolitan government and the area government.

Surely, sir, the hon. Minister could and should, at least, co-ordinate the efforts of those three governments if he has any interest at all in the programme of public housing. And if he had any programme of public housing which would whip away all of this red tape, he could and should be in a position to go up to his counterpart in Ottawa and, together with him, work out a programme which will build houses—not just a few pages of speeches about what may be done and what could be done, which actually are not going to solve this need at all.

He says the second reason, in essence, is part of the first:

The provincially-controlled housing authority, such as the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority, operates in a vacuum. It has absolutely no authority to advise the municipality to plan or construct. It is simply a management agency.

This programme costs the federal and provincial governments more money on a continuing basis; and, finally, area municipalities are not very keen about this programme because of the hidden costs, such as education, recreation and welfare.

The hon. Minister made a great deal of fuss about the interest of the local governments in public housing. Somewhere along the line the hon. Minister must know that many local councils are not keen to have public housing because they are not at all sure of the financial burdens they are going to incur.

But, in large metropolitan areas, such as this one, or any other metropolitan area in the province of Ontario, the responsibility must be taken by the provincial government and not palmed off onto the area government. If this government was serious at all about doing something about public housing, it would have made its peace long before now with the local municipalities.

There is the thought, that Mr. Clark put forth, that we should perhaps concentrate on having smaller projects with a view to integrating them with private development. This may well be so. At least some of the smaller projects we could have on the ground by now and not merely be part of this record of "housing by headline".

I would ask the hon. Minister the same questions Mr. Clark asked him. Why do the federal and provincial governments not make contributions to the rent reduction funds for housing for older people? Is the hon. Minister against this kind of subsidization? Does he not think this is a worthwhile project? And if he does, why does he not say that we will do this?

Why did the hon. Minister not make, this afternoon, any one positive statement about what the provincial government housing programme is? In fact, the Macaulay plan is gone and we have no plan to replace it. We have nothing; we have no housing programme at all.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I return again to a direct quote from the hon. member for Riverdale. He said: "I believe that as a result of our leadership in this venture"—and that is the housing programme—"we will be able to solve in the coming year the problem of housing in the Metropolitan area." I suggest that these words have an awfully hollow ring when, less than a year later, not only has the problem not been solved, it has been made worse.

The programme which that Minister put forward is cast aside, and to replace it we get a series of ifs, ands and buts, we could, we might and we will have to see if it is economically feasible; it is a disgraceful record. And the hon. Minister, this afternoon, has given us little reason to hope for any improvement in the situation.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would like first of all to congratulate the hon. Minister on his first presentation of the estimates of The Department of Economics and Development. The hon. Minister inherited, I think, quite a difficult task when he took over that portfolio, not only because of the inherent difficulties in the portfolio itself, but also because he succeeded a Minister who was certainly one of the most energetic and dynamic Ministers in the previous administration—indeed I would say the only energetic and dynamic Minister in that administration.

I think he is a hard man to follow. In fact, in reviewing in my mind the events of the last couple of years, I have been impressed by the fact that in the period preceding the election the government conducted what I would describe as a brilliant public relations campaign. It was substantially more effective from a public relations point of view than from a legislative point of view, but as a public relations campaign it is one of the best I have ever seen; and it showed itself in the results of the last election.

Since the last election the public relations of the government have been terrible. In fact, it is hard to believe that any government could stumble and fumble the way this one has during the current session of the Legislature. They have been on the wrong foot at every turn; they have been off balance on almost every issue which has come up. They have had to eat their words with a regularity that must be positively sickening for them because they could hardly have been appetizing words to eat. The only difference in the situation I could see was the departure of the former Minister of Economics and Development.

The former Minister, at the time he resigned, gave ill health as his reasons. Since his resignation, Mr. Chairman, he has carried on a schedule of activities which must undoubtedly be the heaviest in the history of the world for any man in ill health. I am happy to note that the reports of his ill health were apparently very much exaggerated; I cannot believe he could be carrying on in his accustomed way, perhaps even a heavier schedule than before, if his health were genuinely poor. From this, Mr. Chairman, I can only conclude that his departure was not so much due to ill health as to a healthy push he must have got, possibly from the hon. Prime Minister. He in turn no doubt was being pushed and jostled by many people in the immediate circles of his party and in the business community on which this government is so heavily dependent. There is no doubt that the former Minister, with his forthright ways, offended a lot of feelings and stepped on a lot of toes.

However, Mr. Chairman, when I started out I was speaking about the present hon. Minister and not the previous one. I tell you right now that I am not going to make any further references to the previous Minister. I started out by congratulating the present hon. Minister on his presentation today and I would like to repeat that. As a matter of fact, while he was talking—I can see now I am going to violate just for one minute, the pledge I gave you; I am going to make one more reference to the previous Minister.

As the present hon. Minister was talking I remarked to one of my hon. colleagues that his presentation in my opinion was more intelligent, more thought-provoking, and more substantial than the presentations of the previous Minister, which were very flashy but in my opinion not of the same quality as the one we heard today. My hon. colleague commented that perhaps the explanation is that the previous Minister used to write his own speeches. I do not know if that statement is entirely fair as far as its implications for the present hon. Minister are concerned, but at the same time I have no doubt that the hon. Minister's officials in the department had a great deal to do with the preparation of the speech that he made today. If that is true, that reflects to the credit of the officials in the department. I think also it reflects to the credit of the hon. Minister that he would rely quite heavily on officials within his own department. I think a sound working relationship between a Minister and his department produces sound policy statements, and I think we received quite a thought-provoking policy statement today.

I would like to express a word of personal appreciation, if I could put it in that form, to the hon. Minister, and I think in doing this I may perhaps make so bold as to include the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Harris) as well, for the announcement that he has made with regard to the termite problem in the city of Toronto. This is a problem that affects the constituency of the hon. member for Beaches and also my constituency very severely. I may say it affects the constituencies of a good many other hon. members, for example, Riverdale, York East, and St. David, all of which have a serious termite problem. There is not really a single constituency in the entire Metropolitan Toronto area that is not at least threatened by the termite problem.

I think the announcement the hon. Minister has made is going to start something. I think he has made an offer to the city of Toronto that the city of Toronto will be in a position to accept. I think it ought to accept it, and I think if the offer is taken up it will mean that we are starting a constructive problem on the matter of termites. I admire the hon. Minister as a man who, when he decides something has to be done, goes ahead and does it.

A few months ago I went to see him at his office with regard to this problem and we had an informal and friendly discussion. I provided him with such information as I could, and he said he was going to look into the matter and he was going to have his officials look into it. I would say, Mr. Chairman, that I have received answers like that on many occasions. Many times I have had a Minister say that he was going to look into a matter and that was the last I ever heard of it. But I will say for the hon. Minister of Economics and Development, he did what he said. Having looked into it he saw that there was merit in the case. He has, in my opinion, made an important contribution and has really initiated something that I think may in time lead to a solution of this problem.

Mr. Sopha: Has there been public warning to the termites?

Mr. Bryden: The termite problem, of course, Mr. Chairman, is just part of a much larger problem, and that is the general problem of housing. I am not going to make any extended comments about the housing situation at this time. There will be opportunities to talk about housing and question the hon. Minister about it under the vote specifically relating to that topic. I know that there are other hon. members in my group who wish to participate in the discussion at that time, and no doubt other hon. members in other parts of the House.

I will only make one general comment at this time, and that is, that in my opinion the section of the hon. Minister's speech that related to the housing problem was the weakest part of his speech. I might be unfair, I do not know. I am just going on an impression from listening to him, I have not seen the text of his remarks. But that was the impression I got. No doubt he will understand that we on this side of the House have developed a very jaundiced view with regard to government policy announcements in the housing field. Time after time we have heard announcements that caught headlines, but when one came to find out about them a year later, it turned out that they were nothing at all, they led to nothing.

Indeed, many of the announcements we have heard over the years were repeats of previous years' announcements about which nothing had been done. We have that sort of background behind us. The hon. Minister has a difficult legacy in this field. It will be difficult for him, I can assure him, to convince us that he really has a programme. We will certainly want to see it in action before we will concede that it is anything more than the old window dressing in which this administration and its predecessor engaged for so many years.

The only specific suggestion I would like to make at this time on housing is to repeat a proposal I have made on occasions in the past.

That is, sir, that the housing problem is important enough in terms of both its economic and social implications that there should be a separate department of housing with a full-time Minister in charge. That is not intended as any reflection on the present hon. Minister of Economics and Development. It rises purely out of the fact that the hon. Minister, as we can see from his general presentation today, has a full-time job on his hands just looking after the economics and development aspects of his department, and without having to worry about housing.

I do not think that housing can be adequately dealt with as a subsidiary of any department and particularly of one where there is such a load on the hon. Minister to begin with.

The hon. Prime Minister, Mr. Chairman, will no doubt be considering certain Cabinet shuffles in the next six months. I think that he should consider setting up a separate ministry of housing, and perhaps bring in one of these new hon. members of the House—some of whom have shown that they are at least full of beans and vinegar—and give them an opportunity to show if they have anything behind some of the statements they make; give them a chance to prove their mettle in one of the most important fields of policy in this province. I am sure I must be popular with all new members now, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MacDonald: Too bad the hon. Prime Minister is not here to see that outburst of enthusiasm.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): He is listening to it.

Mr. MacDonald: But he cannot see who is applauding then.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would now like to deal with the economic policy enunciated by the hon. Minister. I am in disagreement with the hon. member for Downsview that the hon. Minister's comments more appropriately belonged in the Budget, sir. I think that government in this province has now reached the stage where we cannot regard the Budget as the sole instrument of economic policy. I think it is an important instrument and I think there has to be the closest possible co-ordination between the Treasury and The Department of Economics and Development.

I think there may be, to a certain degree, inadequate co-ordination, but I certainly believe that a basic statement of economic policy, over and above what is contained in the Budget speech, is in order.

My impression of the hon. Minister when he spoke previously in this House, and to a certain degree as I listened to him this afternoon, is that he is first and foremost a salesman. I believe, from what I have heard of his record both in the business world and in his shorter term in the field of government, that he is a first-class salesman. He is probably one of the best in the country. He has the typical approach of the salesman. He is also full of all the little aphorisms which suit the salesman so well, such as one that I quote from his speech in the Throne Speech debate on February 10, from page 521 of Hansard, where he said that:

Selling is like shaving—if you do not do a little every day you soon become a bum.

No doubt the hon. Minister is aware that there are also other ways of becoming a bum; and lest his preoccupation with selling and shaving may make him unaware of some of the other pitfalls, I am going to do whatever is possible for me to do to assist him to avoid any of those other routes to “bumdom”.

I am going to suggest to him first, Mr. Chairman—and my suggestion may be presumptuous, but I will make it anyway—that selling is not sufficient in The Department of Economics and Development or, what is more important, in economic policy of a government. And this hon. Minister is responsible in the main for enunciating economic policy! Nor do I think that the emphasis on selling which came out, even in today's very excellent presentation by the hon. Minister, is exactly the right emphasis in a department of this kind.

I would like, in support of my suggestion, to quote from a man from whom I have frequently quoted in this House, a man who also is quite proficient in the field of selling and who, in my opinion, is one of the most responsible businessmen in this country—Mr. R. M. Fowler of the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association. This is from a speech that he made in Vancouver, I think, about a year ago. He said:

I doubt if the task of making the Canadian economy efficient and viable can be done by “Buy Canadian” campaigns, or exhortations to our exporters to go out and sell. No doubt we can progressively make more of the things that we now import, and we should do so, but curtailment of imports is a dangerous game to play. It can very easily provoke retaliation by other countries to the damage done to their trade.

Nor can our traditional exports be expanded enough and rapidly enough to fill the gap in our international accounts, although again we should do all we can to increase traditional exports. We need a much more basic reconstitution of Canadian industry.

If the balance of my remarks have a theme, the statement I have just quoted from Mr. Fowler could be stated to be the theme.

I was very interested, in listening to the hon. Minister this afternoon, to hear the frequent references he made to the need in various specific fields to plan and co-ordinate our activities. In fact, I felt sure that at some stage or other in his speech he was going to come right through with a fully-fledged statement on the need for economic planning; but every time, as he approached that point he drew back for some reason or other, and I suppose this is typical of the situation as it exists in Canada today.

To talk about planning has become fashionable. It is only a few years since planning was considered a dirty word, and fellows like myself and others in my party and elsewhere, who talked about planning, were accused of all sorts of things—of being dictators; of wanting to put everybody in jail, to regiment them, and so on. But now it is fashionable to talk about planning; unfortunately, so much of the talk still consists only of lip service.

We have for example, the Economic Council of Canada. We have the Ontario Economic Council. Professor H. A. Innis of the University of Toronto, many years ago, said that a business man today does not consider himself up to date and progressive unless he has at his disposal an economist and a dog. And it is getting to the point now where a government in Canada today does not consider itself up to date and progressive unless it has an economic council. This is fashionable, and I am not saying anything against economic councils; what I want to consider is what the economic councils are doing.

If one analyzes the Economic Council of Canada, one finds that it is not all that much different from the old productivity council. It is very much the same as the Ontario Economic Council. The basic characteristic of all of them is that they are a sort of discussion group. Various distinguished and able people are brought together to talk about economic problems, not to any noticeable degree for the public benefit, but apparently for their own benefit and perhaps the benefit of the government. They initiate a certain amount of research; they promise that they are going to publish various documents; and that is about as far as it goes. They are study groups—

An hon. member: What is wrong with study groups?

Mr. Bryden: There is nothing wrong with study groups. I do not know who asked that but there is nothing wrong with study groups. But a study group in itself is something less than we need.

I believe we need the study. I believe that some of the study being initiated is important, although I think a great deal of it could be carried on in a more efficient and less pretentious way than through economic councils.

I am certainly not suggesting that study is not required at all stages but rather that study is not enough. It has become popular in this country nowadays to say that we believe in indicative planning—I think that is the term that is used—indicative planning.

You know, we are not socialists, therefore we do not believe in real, honest-to-goodness red-blooded planning, we just believe in indicative planning. I am not quite sure what that means but I think it is supposed to mean that we have agencies that indicate something or other.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): What is red-blooded planning?

Mr. Bryden: I will get around to that.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. MacDonald: What do you mean? Mean what you say.

Mr. Bryden: It is planning that is planning; that produces results; that goes beyond contemplating one's navel, let us put it that way.

We frequently hear references to so-called indicative planning in France. As a matter of fact I can remember the present Prime Minister of Canada when he was still the leader of the Opposition appearing on television once and making quite a speech about France. He said we should look at France and see what they are doing in France in the way of planning. He was not too specific about what it was he thought we should look at, but he did say we should look at France. Some of us have taken a look at France, and in France we are told that there is this so-called indicative planning. The government does not really do too much but it indicates goals and it discusses them with business. It does quite a bit more than we do here but it studies the problem and gives certain indications to business.

Of course, those people have not suggested that we look at the fundamentally different economic structure in France as compared to this country or this province. They do not tell us to look at the large degree of state enterprise in France. Through that state enterprise, and because of other situations that exist in France, I would say that in France the government probably has more control over investments—and I mean government control; not indicative control but real control—than perhaps in any other country in the western world.

Mr. White: It certainly does.

Mr. Bryden: It does quite a bit more than we do here.

Mr. White: That is right, so what does that prove?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: I cannot hear these comments from across the way. No doubt if these hon. gentlemen want to get in on the debate, they will do so when they get a chance.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. MacDonald: The sudden burst into life from over there by the hon. member for London South—

Mr. Bryden: I believe the hon. member for London South has been lapping up learning at more than an average rate in the past little while. Perhaps he might, at the appropriate time, give the House the benefit of some of his more mature deliberations on this subject. I would suggest to him that he does not do himself justice trying to wedge in comments in the middle of someone else's speech. I have no objection, but most of his comments have been lost on me. I cannot hear them.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence (St. George): It perks things up.

Mr. W. E. Johnston (Carleton): Just trying to help you out.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, to return to the subject of planning, I was trying to suggest that the so-called indicative planning of France is a very different story from the "study group" approach that we have in this country. I am suggesting that the example of all western European countries is an example to which we should pay much greater heed than we have done to date in either Ontario or Canada. The study is fine, it is necessary, but we must go beyond study. It is essential, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): Like Saskatchewan!

Mr. Bryden: —that there should be positive leadership from the state in the whole area of economic development. We are past the stage, if we were ever at it, where we can expect desirable economical consequences from mere indications on the part of the government as to the sort of things it has in mind, and mere trust that private enterprise in its totally unco-ordinated way, is going to produce the results we want. The government has to set goals and I would agree that the basic responsibility here is with the federal government. But I also agree with the hon. Minister of Economics and Development that in this province there is an important responsibility on the government, too. I am going to deal with the problem of co-operation a little later but I would agree with the hon. Minister of Economics and Development that co-ordination of the efforts of the two governments is also important.

There is no question that positive leadership from the state is required, yet I suspect, Mr. Chairman, that because we are now again at the high point in the economic cycle we are not going to get that sort of leadership in terms of setting goals, of working with industry, labour, agriculture and all segments in the community in achieving those goals, in working out priorities and in adopting policies that will achieve those priorities.

Listening to the hon. Minister this afternoon confirmed my suspicions that now that we are up at the top of the cycle again, we are going to assume that things will pretty well work themselves out as long as the government takes a moderately active role in the field.

To be fair, however, Mr. Chairman, I should concede that the hon. Minister did put considerable emphasis on the long-term problem as well as the immediate problem. The fact is that we certainly are at the high point of the economic cycle again. In this province at any rate, we are approaching full employment—I have a somewhat different definition of full employment than the hon. Minister has—but we are certainly approaching it. We are at a high level of investment and output.

All this is well-known fact. Of course we had a situation like that a little less than ten years ago around 1955-56 and carrying on into 1957. We were at the peak of a cycle then too. It lasted about two years and then we went down into a recession, into a period of low growth, or a period of almost stagnation.

The hon. gentlemen who sit immediately to my right in this House would tell you that the change arose in 1957 because there was a change in government at that time.

Mr. Singer: Well, it is at least a coincidence that it happens every time those governments change.

Mr. Bryden: It is, of course, also a fact that the downturn had started before the government changed. However, I will say that the government that succeeded that Liberal government in Ottawa did not do very much, for a long time at any rate, to offset the recession that set in—

Mr. R. J. Boyer (Muskoka): The present boom began in the time of the Diefenbaker government.

Mr. Bryden: However, I think we should just bear that in mind so as not to get carried away by the fact that we are now again at the top of the cycle, or close to it.

I would also like to call attention to another fact, just so that we can keep all these matters in perspective. I would like to refer to an item by J. V. Poapst of the School of Business of the University of Toronto, and the item is in regard to unemployment. Our unemployment situation is more favourable now than it has been for some time, but Mr. Poapst had this to say:

Unemployment, seasonally adjusted, declined both absolutely and relatively in the latter half of 1963, was 5.1 per cent of the civilian labour force in November and 4.9 per cent in the following month. The figure for December was the lowest since July, 1957. As encouraging as the current statistics are, they lose some of their lustre when employment conditions and trends in Canada are compared with those in other countries. The table below—

He reproduces a table here but I think the substance of what he says can be gathered without actually seeing the table.

The table below shows average unemployment as a percentage of the civilian labour force in Canada, the United States, and six other countries in 1962. In making comparisons between countries, it is necessary to allow for differences in the yardsticks which are used in statistical measurement.

Much progress has been made in international standardization of the concepts and definitions upon which manpower statistics are based, but differences remain. The data (approximate) in the last column of the table have been adjusted to a common (U.S.) base. They indicate that, at 5.9 per cent, the proportion of the civilian labour force unemployed in Canada in 1962 was higher than in all the other countries shown. It was more than three times the proportion for France, West Germany, Sweden and Japan, more than double that of Britain, and almost double that of Italy. Only the rate in the United States, 5.6 per cent, was close to that of Canada.

The relatively high rates of unemployment in North America thus cannot be dismissed as merely the results of differences in statistical yardsticks.

I would also like to refer to a speech the hon. Minister himself made not so long ago, on March 10, 1964.

I think some people may have missed the speech because the headline gave no clue as to what they might expect in the story. The headline was: "Could have kept out invaders by efficiency, garage men told." The hon. Minister's statement was tacked on to another story about a conference of garage operators in Toronto; and the hon. Minister's remarks are summarized, as follows, in this statement from the Toronto Globe and Mail:

Stanley J. Randall, Ontario Minister of Economics and Development, said in opening the equipment show that much of Ontario's recent prosperity has been due to rising sales of cars in the past three years.

And he made a similar sort of statement this afternoon:

He said that when automobile sales and production decline, the drop in economic activity is multiplied several times in other sectors.

Now this is attributed as a direct quote to the hon. Minister:

"We would be fools to expect the same amount of increase in motor vehicle production in 1964 as we have had in the past three years," the Minister said. "We put that growth at 60 per cent, 627,000, since 1961."

He added that Canadian governments should devote much of their efforts to encouraging greater exports of cars and parts to world markets. He estimated that one of each seven or eight manufacturing industry employees in Ontario is engaged in making motor vehicles or parts.

"The automotive industry is the consumer of almost 15 per cent of output from Ontario primary iron and steel mills," he said.

So even the hon. Minister himself was suggesting that there could be a rather vulnerable factor in our economic recovery as far as this province is concerned.

It is so dependent on the sale of automobiles that if the sale of automobiles should slump, and he is quoted as saying that we would be fools to expect it to increase as much as it has, then we will run into difficulties all through our economy.

I am not going to engage in an argument with the hon. Minister or anybody else as to how long we can expect the current boom to stay at its present high level. I do not know—I do not profess to know. But I can certainly say from any study of previous economic history that we can expect that, barring government policies to offset it, the economy will go down again. It always has before. The last boom collapsed about 1957 and we went into a pretty severe trough for this day and age. I think it has to be the job of government to not merely level out these recessions, but eliminate them, to maintain a continuous development.

The hon. Minister has talked a great deal about the improvement of our export-import position. That has been the basic factor, I would say, in the improvement of our overall economic situation.

The hon. Minister has claimed credit for the Ontario trade crusade in improving our trade picture. I would not wish to deny credit to this campaign, I have no doubt it has been a factor in improving sales. But it has been a very small factor. The hon. Minister is a good enough salesman to know that you just do not sell if you cannot compete in prices. Actually, as the hon. Minister to a certain degree himself recognized, the improvement of our trade position has been due really to two factors: First, the devaluation of the dollar and, second, the sale of agricultural products behind the Iron Curtain. Those have been the stimulants in our economy.

The trade crusade had nothing to do with it, or little to do with it. The trade crusade perhaps cashed in on the advantages which arose from the devaluation of the dollar in that our competitive position was improved; we were able to quote lower prices to purchasers overseas and in the United States. But these were the basic factors, and both of them are factors whose effects are bound to be temporary.

The sale of agricultural products behind the Iron Curtain will depend entirely on the crop situation in those countries. We certainly cannot count on them as a continued stimulus to our economy, or as a continued lifesaver as far as our trade balance is concerned. The devaluation of the dollar produced a tremendous stimulus—in fact I was surprised myself at the strength of the stimulus it provided to our exports—and it certainly discouraged our imports because it increased the prices of imports. But that sort of policy gradually wears itself out; its effects become less and less pronounced as time goes on.

So these two factors have been the important stimulus. They got us going again, but we cannot count on them to continue indefinitely. We are going to have to look to new policies and new co-ordination of policies if we are going to continue to maintain economic activity at a high level and unemployment at a low level. This again comes back to government policy. I would suggest that the logical conclusion of everything the hon. Minister said this afternoon—even though he did not draw it—is co-ordinated planning, an overall programme of planning, instead of merely expedients in individual fields.

I would say that the need for planning becomes all the greater when we again appreciate the problems we are faced with in what we in this group describe as the scientific revolution. I am talking about what is commonly referred to as automation, but I think the term "scientific revolution" is a better term because it is broader in its implications and extends beyond mere automation or even cybernation. It extends into all fields of our lives, and the implications of that revolution are almost impossible to comprehend.

My hon. colleague from Scarborough West (Mr. S. Lewis) presented, earlier in this Legislature, what I would regard as one of the best analyses I have ever heard or seen of the problem. Unfortunately it does not seem to have had as much effect as one might have hoped.

We ran into the same old chorus of voices saying there is no need to be alarmed or frightened by technological progress. Well, good heavens, there was nothing in the speech of the hon. member for Scarborough West that would suggest that he or we are alarmed by that prospect. We welcome the scientific revolution. What we are alarmed about is the refusal of many people in high places to accept the full implications of it in terms of policy, and to recognize that fundamental economic and social adjustments are going to have to be made, and that if we do not do something now to plan those adjustments we will not escape them—they will happen the hard way. We will suffer through them.

It is much better that we should try to take control of the situation, rather than suggest simply that in the long run it is bound to be good for us. Certainly it is bound to be good for us in the long run; and as we all know, J. M. Keynes said a great many years ago that in the long run we are all dead, too. The problem of adjustment is the difficult problem, and it will create economic problems which I think will be far beyond anything we have ever contemplated in the past.

One of the economic problems that I think we should concern ourselves with in this country was, I think, underlined by the hon. Minister himself in the speech he made in the Throne Speech debate.

I am going to quote a couple of extracts from that speech.

I will, I am afraid, draw a somewhat different moral from what the hon. Minister said than he drew from it, but I think what he said is beyond dispute. I am going to read two paragraphs, both of which appear, not consecutively, on page 518 of Hansard. He was talking about the problem of adjustment to automation:

We are, in many ways, in a better position from this point of view than is United States industry because of the smaller size of most of our manufacturing industries. We are not becoming automated so rapidly, and growing demand, along with normal retirements and job shifts, is taking care of a great deal of this technological disemployment.

I think the word would have been sufficient if it had just been displacement, but it is printed here in Hansard as displacement. The other paragraph I want to quote is:

"The size of American industry invites rapid introduction of automatic techniques. In Canada, most of our industries have not reached a size which makes total automation economical. It is, for the most part, being introduced in limited areas of our total production."

And then the hon. Minister goes on to say quite rightly, that as a result we have not met the same sort of acute problems as they have in the States, and we do not have the same problem of areas where the economy has practically collapsed, as they have in the States, because of the effects of automation. This is true and it is very comforting at the moment. But I think we should be considering the long-term implications of this.

As I see it, we, in Canada, in the long-term, have a much more serious problem than the United States. We not only have to consider the total effects that the scientific revolution is going to have in the world economy, we also have to be concerned that in our little neck of the woods we might be left behind by automation altogether. It is quite true that our industries in many cases, as the hon. Minister said, are not large enough to make the introduction of automatic techniques economical at this stage at any rate. It may be that they will never be economical, so those industries are just going to be brushed aside as the scientific revolution progresses through the world.

How are they going to compete in the long pull? They may be doing all right now as the result of devaluation, but how are they going to compete in the long pull against the huge automated enterprises of the United States and Japan and the European Common Market which are coming into being now? They are certainly coming.

Mr. Chairman, we have got to get in on this thing. If we do, it is going to create the same dislocations for us as for other countries. But if we do not get in on it, we will become an economic backwater, a pool of stagnation, which will sell raw materials to the industrial machines of Japan and the United States, no doubt, and, will have declining manufacturing industry of its own.

This, I think, is a problem that we should be concerned about now. It leads me to a conclusion which in past years I tried to present a number of times in this House, that a basic objective of our economic planning in this country—if we had any, and I suggest that we should have some economic planning—should be the specialization of industry and creation of the adjustments and the incentive that will bring that about. Whenever I raised that matter in the House before, the previous Minister used to scoff at what I said. In fact, on one occasion he said, "What will we specialize in—Eskimo carvings?" As a matter of fact, I was quite surprised that I could never get that point across at all to the previous Minister.

I think that the present hon. Minister is to some degree, at any rate, thinking in these terms. He did talk about the importance of policies that will facilitate adjustments from declining industries to growing industries. He did stress the importance of identifying the industries in which we have a potential for growth.

He stated, I fully agree with him—in fact, I think he is in danger of becoming a socialist if he does not watch out—that he would go along with tariff reductions, but that if they take place there has to be government policy to facilitate the transfer of men and resources from the industries that lose their tariff production, into other forms of production. All that makes sense. All that is in the direction of economic planning.

If we could just give the hon. Minister one more little push, I think he would probably qualify to be a Swedish socialist. I do not know how he will get along with some of his backbenchers and some of the people who contribute to the party, if he gets into that category, but this is obviously the direction in which his thinking is tending. I welcome the development because I think this will be good for the province and good for the country. After all, that is really what all of us are fundamentally concerned about.

The hon. Minister also talked a good deal about the need for labour mobility, and he put his finger on a key point. We are talking about planning to meet the problems of the future and to adjust to the challenges of the future. We have to have a high degree of mobility of labour. This is not the first time the hon. Minister has talked about this. I think he is persuaded of the importance of labour mobility in the future development of our economy, and I would only wish that he could convince some of his hon. colleagues and the federal government about the importance of it.

The hon. Minister tried to make the best statement he could for his hon. colleagues, and perhaps for the federal government, by saying that we have programmes designed to increase labour mobility. Well, Mr. Chairman,

I think the hon. Minister is too intelligent a man to really believe that the programmes we have to increase labour mobility are anything but drops in the bucket; they are hardly worth anything.

We have some retraining programmes where people are paid starvation allowances to learn skills, if you can call them that, which may or may not be economically valuable in the future, where a very small proportion of our labour force has some training, but we are certainly lagging behind in the whole field of technological education.

When I say lagging behind I mean lagging behind the clear needs of the situation. We have no provisions of any kind to facilitate the movement of workers from one area to another. We have no moving allowances. In Sweden they pay people in some cases more than full wages in order to take training.

It being 6.00 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS AND DEVELOPMENT

On vote 401:

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, I would like to extend greetings to those members who have been impelled, by a sense of duty or the Whips or both, to forego the pleasure of watching the hockey game on television so that a quorum could be provided in the House.

Before the recess, I had been talking about labour mobility and the almost total lack of any plans in this country or province to increase labour mobility. I had proposed that the government might take a look at the sort of programme they have in Sweden, which has been an important factor in maintaining unemployment at little, if any, more than one per cent of the labour force for 15 or 20 years. I think perhaps I can leave that subject on that note, Mr. Chairman.

I have one other topic I would like to refer to briefly. It arises to some degree out of the remarks of the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall). I am referring to the question of federal-provincial co-operation in the economic field. I think such co-operation is important in all fields, but we are concerned mainly with the economic field at this time and I will try to concentrate my attention on that.

The hon. Minister, himself, recognized in his introductory remarks this afternoon that the economic welfare of this province ultimately depends on adequate economic policies at the federal level and—I think this is a fair inference to draw from his remarks—that any economic programmes we may devise should, as far as possible, be co-ordinated with those at the federal level.

I would have hoped that the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) might have been in the House to hear that portion of the hon. Minister's remarks. I think they might have been beneficial to him. I know he talks a good deal about the need for co-operation and the determination of the provincial government to co-operate in the economic field. The hon. Prime Minister is an amiable man. He rarely says "yes," he practically never says "no," and he almost always says "maybe." I think that has been his approach to federal-provincial co-operation.

I am submitting to this committee, Mr. Chairman, that it is not an adequate approach from the head of the government of the economically strongest province in Canada. I think that this province should assist the federal government in giving leadership—and the federal government from my observation requires a substantial amount of prodding—in developing a co-ordinated economic plan for the development of the whole of Canada into which provincial plans can readily be fitted.

As we all know, we have a situation in Canada which creates difficulties which are perhaps greater than those in most federal states. The province of Quebec is in a special position. I want to make it clear that anything I may say tonight is in no sense intended as a criticism of the province of Quebec or its government. That province has a government which is responsible to its people, and it will be held accountable to its own people and nobody else for what policies it may adopt. I think it is inappropriate for us to try to make any comments at all, critical or otherwise, about its problems.

But I think we can recognize that there is a special situation in Quebec, requiring special policies by that government and special consideration by the federal government and the rest of Canada. I regret it, when I see our hon. Prime Minister of Ontario forever putting forward the proposition that if a concession is to be made to one province it has to be made to all the others. Perhaps that is correct technically, but on the other hand I would suggest that, if he cared to exercise the leadership that his position calls for, he would take the further position that just because that may be technically true there is no reason why this province should claim the concession.

We can argue, if we wish, that technically any concession offered to one province should go to all the provinces, but we should take the position that we are not necessarily going to claim concessions which may be made to Quebec. Our position should be to try to develop a stronger federal union so that we can develop the kind of economic policies which, in this day and age, are essential to the well-being of Canada and, as the hon. Minister has pointed out, to the well-being of Ontario. Economic developments in some of the underdeveloped sections of this country, if I may call them that and I think they are appropriately called that, are of vital importance to Ontario. Ontario, as the manufacturing centre of Canada, will prosper as other parts of Canada prosper.

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): That is right. That is what he said.

Mr. Bryden: Yes, that is what the hon. Minister said, but I do not think we see sufficient evidence of that in the position the hon. Prime Minister has taken in vital matters affecting federal-provincial co-operation. I think that, instead of insisting on our rights as a province, we should be trying to give leadership to all the other provinces in working together with the federal government in the development of adequate economic planning.

I would suggest that one thing we should propose is the establishment of what I might describe as a federal-provincial planning and development council. The hon. Minister of Economics and Development has noted that there is fairly continuous consultation between federal and Ontario authorities in a number of fields. I think this should be regularized and systematized, and we should have a full-scale organization with adequate staff to carry on consultation and voluntary co-ordination of efforts in all economic fields. Such a council, of course, would have no power, but it would be a medium of exchange of information between the federal government and the provinces, and among the provinces. It would assist them to come to co-operative plans for the benefit of the whole country and it would at least permit each government to be advised as to what the other governments are doing so that if necessary it could adjust its own plans to take into account the plans of the other jurisdictions.

We see a problem right now in the United States. The federal government has undertaken a significant tax reduction programme to stimulate economic activity and, to an important extent, that programme is being nullified by the fact that various states are now moving into the vacuum to pick up the taxes the federal government has vacated. Therefore, the effect of the programme, whatever it may be, has been neutralized. This is the sort of thing we should avoid in Canada. We should try to develop joint plans, common plans, for the benefit of all of the country; I would emphasize again that this will be particularly to the benefit of Ontario.

We heard an announcement earlier this week with regard to certain compromise settlements which had been arrived at primarily between the government of Canada and the government of Quebec. We all welcomed those announcements as an important step forward but at the same time we should consider the other side of the coin. If the concessions offered by the federal government are fully exploited by this province and other provinces they will tend in the direction of balkanization of our economy, as so many developments in recent years have done.

We have to face the fact, as I said before, that Quebec has a special situation; but let us not take advantage of that situation to create minor economic empires in the various provinces and regions of Canada.

I should, to be fair, concede that the Conservative administration of Ontario over the last 20 years has taken what I would call a progressively more constructive attitude toward federal-provincial relations. It is certainly a far cry from the days of Mitch Hepburn with his bucolic inspiration when he coined such phrases as, "Ontario will not be the milch cow for the rest of Canada." I am afraid in the past, to a considerable degree—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Why don't you get up to date and tell us about Woodrow Lloyd?

Mr. Bryden: The sensitivity of these hon. gentlemen beside me is quite remarkable. I have been under the impression, Mr. Chairman, that they had long ago disclaimed any responsibility whatever for Mitch Hepburn. In fact I thought they had even disclaimed responsibility for John Wintermeyer. Time started with them about six months ago. It certainly had not been my intention to stir them up from their slumbers. I thought a reference to Mitch Hepburn would merely be among the rest of us. I did not think that it would even make an impression on them.

However, Mitch Hepburn coined the phrase, "Ontario will not be the milch cow for the rest of Canada," overlooking the fact that to a considerable extent the rest of Canada has been the milch cow for Ontario, and I—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Mr. Bryden: The hon. member for Downsview can certainly speak with authority about—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, if you can remember that far back, the administration in Ontario, certainly since the days of George Drew, has taken an increasingly constructive attitude toward its responsibilities to the rest of Canada. I think that is an intelligent point of view. I regret the frequent throw-backs we see toward the old attitude that was epitomized in Mr. Hepburn's famous comment, and I may say in the attitudes of many other Premiers in previous eras in this province. I think that notwithstanding the relief with which we all greeted the announcement with regard to the pension settlement—if it is a settlement—we once again, in the pension negotiations, saw a tendency toward narrow provincialism and toward a balkanization of economic policy in this country.

I do not think we should let our policy be determined by Quebec and that is essentially what was happening in the pension negotiations. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to go into the entire pension question tonight. It obviously should be discussed at some other time, but the pension programme has important economic implications and I want to discuss some of these economic implications tonight.

The decision taken by the Ontario government produced a watering down of the original federal plans in a number of stages. Two of those stages are particularly important from an economic point of view. First of all, the attitude taken by the Ontario government forced the government of Canada to abandon its original proposition of an unfunded plan in favour of a partially funded plan. The original position of the hon. Prime Minister was that he thought the plan should be fully funded. The new plan proposed by the federal government is not fully funded but it is partially funded. That is the first important change in the economic field. I will refer to its economic consequences again in a moment, but while I am at it, I would like now to mention the second important change, which was advocated, at any rate, by the hon.

Prime Minister of this province. Whether he was the one who forced the change, I am not quite sure, but the final offer by the federal government was to make all of the investment funds arising from the funding of the plan available to the provinces in which they are collected. The position of the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario was that 90 per cent of those funds should be made available to the province. As it has turned out, the federal government has offered 100 per cent.

I saw an analysis on television in which the commentator stated that the close-to-the-vest position, or whatever it may have been, of the hon. Prime Minister actually turned out to be hard bargaining. The hon. Prime Minister asked for 90 per cent and he got 100 per cent. That is hard bargaining? I have never heard of a bargain like that before. There was indeed hard bargaining. The hard bargaining, however, took place in the province of Quebec. The province of Quebec insisted on 100 per cent and as a result Ontario also got 100 per cent of the investment funds.

The hon. member for Downsview does not think investment funds have any economic consequences but I am sure that you are fully aware of their importance from an economic point of view, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister of Economics and Development this afternoon emphasized the importance of investment in some of the other areas of Canada. Through this modified pension programme, substantial investment funds become available, but they become available only for the province in which they have been accumulated. Yet in terms of total economic policy for the country, which includes the benefit of Ontario, it may very well be that the investment funds would be better made available in other less developed parts of the country. I am suggesting to this House, Mr. Chairman, that this great victory achieved by Premier Lesage, I believe, but in which the hon. Prime Minister of this province shared, was actually a retrograde step.

Investment policy, and fiscal policy and financial policy fundamentally have to be under the control of the federal government if we are to develop a strong economy in this country. Here is an important area of investment policy which is not in any sense at all under the control of the federal government, it has been handed over entirely to the provinces. It will tend, if it has any effect at all, to increase rather than reduce the disparities between provinces, and this, as the hon. Minister pointed out this afternoon, will not be to the benefit of Ontario in the long run.

I am suggesting this was a retrograde step in federal-provincial relations. It was not a constructive attitude by the government of this province, it did not contribute to the kind of federal-provincial co-operation which we require. It reduced the possibility of the strong type of economic leadership that I think most of us in this House will agree is necessary on the part of the federal government.

I would also like to refer back now to the first point I made as to the modifications produced in that plan as a result of, to some degree or other, pressure from this province; and that was the decision to fund the plan in part. One effect of that, of course, was that pension benefits have been reduced. But the other effect is the one I am interested in at the moment.

It is purely an economic effect, or rather it is primarily an economic effect. The pension plan now becomes in part a form of compulsory saving on the people of Canada. The major part of the saving it compels will be by those who are least able to save; that is the lower income groups.

A disproportionate part of the savings under this compulsory plan will come from lower income groups. This will have consequences in the future of reducing demand which surely is something of some consequence to a province that is primarily dependent on manufacturing. It will reduce demand because these people will have less disposable income. They will be compelled under this plan to save, and they are the people least able to save. Yet the method by which we are now raising investment funds is by compelling saving on the part of people who at the present time hardly have enough income to meet their current bills.

I think we can carry the analysis one stage further, Mr. Chairman. This is not really compulsory saving, it is taxation. The pension benefits that will be paid in the future will not be paid out of the premiums that are collected today. Let us get that notion out of our heads, if it is necessary to do so.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): On a point of order.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Sargent: By the widest stretch of the imagination what connection has this with the vote we are on in this budget?

Mr. Bryden: Investment funds, economic—

Mr. Sargent: Well, that is stretching it pretty far. Let us get down to the business of the House and quit this drivel. This goes on for hours and it is not intelligent.

Mr. Bryden: I would say, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Grey North is a very poor judge of intelligence. If he wishes to go and hear the hockey game that, I think, would greatly contribute to the debate in this House.

I am dealing with economic policy as far as Canada and Ontario are concerned and if the hon. member for Grey North does not think that this proposed new pension plan has important economic implications and is integral to a consideration of economic policy, then I certainly am not going to take time to improve his education, Mr. Chairman, because that would take a long time indeed.

The point I was trying to make was that this compulsory saving is really a form of taxation. The contributions made today do not pay the pensions of tomorrow. The pensions of tomorrow come out of tomorrow's production, but the effect of the so-called funding of the plan is that certain people are required to sacrifice certain purchasing power today—certain income today.

That income, I understand, will be used for investment purposes. I hope that in this province—now that we have grabbed 100 per cent of it—we will use the money available to an important degree for education, for investment in the physical facilities for education. I have no doubt that the hon. Prime Minister has that in mind to some degree.

So what is really happening, Mr. Chairman, is that under the guise of a pension plan we are taxing the lower income groups to provide capital to create educational facilities. I am a strong believer in the need for increased educational facilities, but I think this is the worst possible way to go about it. It makes even more regressive a tax structure in this country that is already regressive, it weighs heavily on the lower income groups. They are the groups least able to make the funds available for this purpose and yet as a result of the positions that have been taken by the government of this province this is what is happening.

This is what is happening in Canada today, and I am suggesting that this is a retrograde step, both economically and socially. Its economic consequences are undesirable, sir, because it discourages consumption on the part of those who have the greatest need to buy goods. It goes flatly contrary to the type of policy that has been adopted under the Kennedy-Johnson administration in the United States, in which there have been significant tax reductions and a significant part of them has been for the lower income group. We are now proposing to impose a new tax on the lower income groups under a guise of accumulated investment funds. The investment funds we are accumulating are now being distributed in such a way as to intensify rather than reduce economic imbalance across the country.

That is why I say, sir, that the policies adopted by the government of this province as distinct from the exhortations given to us this afternoon by the hon. Minister of Economics and Development tend towards the balkanization of the country. They are parochial policies that do not take into account the needs of the country as a whole and the need of Ontario to have a strong central government with the capacity to carry out strong economic policies.

That is why I suggested a little earlier that I could only have wished that the hon. Prime Minister had been present for that portion of the remarks of the hon. Minister of Economics and Development. I think that some of his remarks in this field were very much to the point and very much worthy of consideration. I am hoping in the future they may actually represent a philosophy that will be translated into government policy. But for the present time it would appear that this government's support of increased federal-provincial co-operation in the economic field and other fields is in words mainly. When we get down to the brass tacks we do not go as far as Mitch Hepburn did.

I will agree we do not have an Ontario-Quebec axis which tries to disrupt Confederation for the short-term benefit of the individual provinces. Certainly I do not think there is any danger of any recurrence of that, but we still have a strong provincial, parochial tendency which is bound to weaken any role the federal government may wish to take in the development of economic policy. It is indeed essentially a determination of Ontario policy by the province of Quebec.

As I said at the beginning I am not making any comments favourable or otherwise about Quebec's policies. All I am saying is that we should determine our own policies. Our situation is entirely different from Quebec's. We should make our policies in terms of our situation, and our situation demands strong leadership by the federal government. I believe that this government, if it were willing to accept the responsibilities of leadership, could induce the federal government to give a far stronger lead than it has been willing to give to date.

Mr. Chairman: Is vote 401 carried?

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, I would like to address some remarks to item number 6.

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Economics and Development): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we could take item four and bypass five and do five after 411. I think it would be in context with the rest of the presentation. Put all housing together with capital expenditures.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to address some remarks to item 6 in 401—the Conference of Women.

In the course of his remarks this afternoon the hon. Minister made the comment that he wanted to pay tribute to the women who had made the trade crusade a success.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. MacDonald: Now let me add my tribute to all of this outburst of enthusiasm here.

Interjection by hon. member.

Mr. MacDonald: Gallantry obviously is not dead in the backbenches of the Tory party. But the thing that puzzles me is that it is all very fine for the hon. Minister to be paying tribute to the women. I want to review what has happened in the Conference of Women and their role in the trade crusade over the past year, and I wonder if his tributes to the role they have played really match some of the actions of this department. When I say actions of this department, I recognize that the hon. Minister came in sometime during the month of October, if I recall correctly—no, in November—so that prior to that the hon. member for Riverdale (Mr. Macaulay) was the man responsible. Therefore, I want to divide my comments into two chapters, so to speak. Chapter one was the period up to September 25 and shortly thereafter; Chapter two is the reorganization of the Conference of Women that has emerged slowly and was formalized in an official statement by the hon. Minister early in February of this year.

If we go back to chapter one and its beginnings something like 15 months ago, you will recall that the then Minister of Economics and Development, the hon. member for Riverdale, launched one of his real productions. And when he launches a production Cecil B. De Mille is really thrown into the shadows. There was going to be an involvement of all the women of the province of Ontario in the crusade for trade, and obviously within the context of his proposition it was a very logical move. If you are going to influence the consumers to buy Ontario products and not to buy foreign products—without examining the merits of this whole concept for the moment—clearly, the women who control the major force of purchasing power—in the purchase of food, clothing, furniture and so on—these were the people to whom he had to get the message across. So, over 15 months ago—about the beginning of January—some 6,000 invitations were sent out to women across the province of Ontario—women in almost every organization. And in the month of February, on February 12 to be exact, a conference was held at the Royal York Hotel; and at the famous banquet about which we have heard so much, there were 2,300 of those 6,000 in attendance. A pretty successful kind of venture. Unfortunately—

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): It was a free dinner.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. leader of the Opposition interjects it was a free dinner—he is right, but it cost a fair amount of money. Most of the publicity it got by way of cartoons, with some rather cheap gibes from politicians and others, was with regard to the amount of drinking. Incidentally, Mr. Chairman, I am told that the number of drinks served that night were 600-odd.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): It was Ontario whisky.

Mr. MacDonald: And I would suggest to you that if only 600-odd drinks were served to the 2,300 people being there—and since the press was there, I suspect that the ladies had at the most about 300-400 drinks—that would be one in six who had a single drink. I present this little mathematical calculation particularly for the hon. members here who really had a field day in picturing all of the women of Ontario in quite a “drunk”, given free by the—

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Chairman, this is strictly untrue. On a point of order. I, at this time a year ago, brought this matter up stating the government spent $17,000 on a free dinner where they had bars. A great many people I know were there; I could not accuse the women of going on a “drunk.” The hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrope) completely misused the remarks I made, as the hon. member for York South is doing so now. Please stick to the facts; try to keep to them, will you?

Mr. MacDonald: I am trying to straighten out the facts. The image that was created was that an awful lot of drinking was done; and the simple fact was that 600 drinks were served to 2,300 people, plus the press.

An hon. member: Where did you get that information?

Mr. MacDonald: Never mind where I got the information. At this banquet, Mr. Chairman, the hon. Prime Minister gave a speech which apparently was a bit too political because most of the women had been brought there under the impression that this was a very above-politics venture, in which they were going to be involved to save the economy of the province of Ontario. However, sir, they suffered that because they were subjected to the impassioned pleas of the hon. Minister of Economics and Development. He was pleading for them to play their role, saying that they had a role to play in the development of the economy of the province of Ontario, to create 60,000 new jobs which were necessary if we were going to be able to have full employment.

Indeed you will recall, Mr. Chairman, at that time the theme he was operating under was, “Do you really care?”

I remember one time, and I think I have already mentioned this in the House, when I went home and was looking over the mail which had come in during the day; I saw one addressed to my wife which started out: “Do you really care?” My interest began to perk up, and I wanted to know what strange male was beginning to intrude into the serenity of the MacDonald home, it was much to my surprise to discover it was the Minister of Economics who was writing to her, starting out: “Do you really care?”

However, seriously, Mr. Chairman, once again I have to give credit to the hon. member. The hon. member convinced the women that there was a job to be done here. As a matter of fact the women came in and participated in this whole work, almost in an atmosphere of war-time self-sacrifice, as a contribution to the economic welfare of this province.

When the conference of women was over, they went home, and their executive committee got into operation. The Minister announced that he was establishing a women's division in The Department of Economics and Development—in answer to the interjections, let me say it has died in the interval, like so many things. A director was appointed. In the course of the ensuing months they organized a central information agency, and established a speakers' bureau.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, I want to inform the House of some of the developments which took place then, and I will tell you that I am reading it from the minutes of the executive council of the conference of women. If anybody is curious to know where these minutes came from, I will tell you that there were about 30 or 40 copies, at least, distributed to all the women. Then, as I shall comment a little later once the election was over the women were just dropped—like that! There was a very great and widespread feeling of disaffection in regard to the whole matter.

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): These minutes are not before the courts, are they?

Mr. MacDonald: No, they are not before the courts. They are before the court here.

For example, when they got into the organization, it is interesting to read in the minutes—of a meeting held on February 20, 1963—almost one of the first meetings, very shortly after that banquet on February 12 down at the Royal York Hotel.

There is a note on page 5 of the minutes which says that the chairman will appoint chairmen of subcommittees in a number of regional areas of Ontario—i.e., Metropolitan Toronto, Hamilton, Kitchener-Guelph-Galt, Peterborough, Windsor, North Bay, Sudbury, Sault Ste. Marie, Owen Sound, Kingston, Fort William, Port Arthur, Stratford, London, St. Catharines-Niagara Falls, Sarnia, Ottawa. You can just see the Macaulay touch here, the whole of the province was being covered. We were getting an organization which would encompass the four corners of the province of Ontario.

They also set up a great number of committees which were to cover the whole range of consumer problems. There was a manufacturing committee to look into the hard goods; a retail sales committee; a production committee, a production-promotion committee; a human resources committee; a natural resources committee; a consumer purchasing committee; a textile committee; and they had volunteer groups working on all those.

There were literally, so I am told, tens of thousands of people involved in it. And these women were playing their role. They all thought they were making a contribution to the development of the economics of the province of Ontario, and they did; indeed they accepted the assurances of the Minister and his deputy and others. So, as the summer went by, and they discovered that they had been too late in giving consideration to organizing exhibits which might go to all the fall fairs, they thought they would do that next year because the Minister had told them this was a five-year programme.

Toward the end of August, they came before the Minister and other members of the committee and presented their programme for the coming year. In the minutes, for example, of September 4—we are into the election campaign now—there is a note which said:

The Minister informed the executive council that he and Mr. Clarkson would go over the brief and let the council know, on the first or second day of October, how much money the Treasury board would allow them. Mr. Clarkson told the executive council that money will be found for the organization of the regional conferences proposed in the presentation and that plans were to go ahead for the proposed mission from abroad.

In other words, in the early stages of their action, they were told that as soon as the election was over “we will have meetings and we will set up your programme for the coming year”.

Well, I will tell you what happened, Mr. Chairman—and I am waiting until I have the attention of the hon. Minister of Mines because I want him to be brought up to date.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): My ladies have been appointed.

Mr. MacDonald: Will the hon. Minister just listen? I am talking about chapter one. If he just listens he will not get himself confused.

There was a promise that right after the election the executive council would be called and it would map out the plans for the next year. The executive council was never called. That group of women was never called back at all, never once. Once the election was over, it was just dropped in the most callous manner.

Some hon. members: Oh, no!

Mr. MacDonald: And if the hon. Minister of Mines thinks I am wrong, I invite the hon.

Minister to get up and deny what I have said to be the case.

Now, I will tell you what happened in all this, Mr. Chairman. Tens of thousands of women were harnessed into a magnificent political machine; they were invited to do a job on idealistic terms, to meet the economic needs of the province of Ontario. But what they did not realize, in their degree of naiveté, is that they were being used in the Tory build-up to election day.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, okay, Mr. Chairman, just let me document my case by going back to the minutes of April 9, 1963 for the executive council. This is rather delicious; this is so inimitably the hon. member for Riverdale. The minute reads:

The Minister personally pledged his absolute devotion to the success of the Conference of Women—

Do you really care? Here was the Minister's response. He was pledging—it is officially recorded in the minutes—his absolute devotion to the success of the Conference of Women:

—and requested that a meeting of the executive and members of the council of the Conference of Women should not be held until October.

In April he pledges his support, his passionate support, and then he requests that they not meet again until October. The executive met September 1. It agreed to meet right after the election about its budget. In the five or six weeks that the Minister was in his department after the election, the group was never called together at all. It was dropped.

The organization just drifted out into limbo. The director did not know when the end of her period of employment came. Her salary was just cut off. One woman, after a change in Ministers was made, wrote in because she thought—she just wanted to test the situation, I think—that if there was a change in Ministers it was like a change in the Prime Minister and as a Cabinet Minister you tendered your resignation. By way of finding out what the reply would be, she tendered her resignation and she got a thank-you letter back from the new hon. Minister. They were dropped, I say to the hon. Minister of Mines, just like that. They had served their political purpose and nothing more happened.

But if you want to find out what was happening during these months, let me go back to the minutes of April 9. The second paragraph after this expression of passionate devotion to the success of the Conference of Women:

It was requested by the Minister that a weekly report be submitted to him in connection with the speakers' bureau.

An hon. member: A very good idea.

Mr. MacDonald: A very good idea, you bet. The politician spoke there.

This report is to include information as to who the speakers are, where they are speaking, what organizations they are speaking to and the size of the reaction and the audience. If the Minister were informed ahead of time of these speaking engagements he would be in a better position to facilitate the speakers as to press, radio coverage and the attendance of the local MPP.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if you can think of anything more fatuous than that the very busy hon. Robert Macaulay should be looking after the press and TV for each of the meetings of the Conference of Women, I invite you to speculate on it for a moment. What was happening, Mr. Chairman, was that these women, in the course of doing their duty, were being used by the pre-election machine of the Tory Party.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, just by way of checking it out—I have not done this before—when the Minister requested the speakers and the reaction and the size of the audience and everything else so that he could arrange for the press and the publicity and the attendance of a local MPP, was there any single Opposition member ever invited to one of these meetings? Let us put it this way. Were all Opposition members invited to any of the Conference of Women's meetings to share in all of this ostensibly non-political publicity? Was there a single member of the Opposition invited to any one of these meetings?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: No, of course not, Mr. Chairman. What was happening was, as usual, the public affairs of this province were integrated into the Tory machine and only the Tory members were invited to the meeting, so that the women who were serving the high interests of the economic needs of the province of Ontario were a very integral part of the Tory publicity.

In other words, if I may just sum it up, Mr. Chairman, it is a story of how the Ontario government—chapter one of the story I tell the hon. Minister of Mines—led the 500,000 members of the various women's organizations up the garden path and left them standing there. To put it bluntly, it is the story of how the government used the women of this province to serve their own political purposes in the month leading up to the election and then, without so much as an explanation, without so much as a thank you, dropped them in a callous manner and they never had another meeting.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: No political party could ever lead 500,000 women up the garden path—

Mr. MacDonald: Now, I think it is about time the province knew a bit about just how this government is operated, Mr. Chairman. As my hon. colleague from Woodbine said, prior to this election last September 25, this party had pretty good public relations. It was presenting a pretty good image and maybe it is only a coincidence it has been stumbling and fumbling all over the lot ever since the hon. Robert Macaulay left.

However, Mr. Chairman, let me go on to chapter two of the Conference of Women, because, Mr. Chairman, it became very obvious to a number of people in the government that after they had so badly treated these women who, in the words of the hon. Minister this afternoon: "I pay tribute to the women who made the trade crusade a success"; after they had revealed, following September 25 how callously they had used the women politically and then dropped them, there was a great deal of disaffection. In the event you want to try to pinpoint the source of my information let me say that I have called up and I have spoken to virtually everyone who was on the original advisory committee and I got the same story, with variations, from every one of them.

Mrs. A. Pritchard (Hamilton Centre): Did you ask them if they cared?

Mr. MacDonald: I was thrown for a moment when the hon. lady from Hamilton Centre turned and asked me if I asked them if they really cared. I thought I was getting into Bob Macaulay's category.

But they had to start to rebuild the advisory committee of the women, so they got Mrs. Lymburner, who I think had been chairman of the advisory committee before. In the early part of February the hon. Minister held a press conference and he is reported in the Globe and Mail of February 7 as saying—or the story reports—that the role of women in the Ontario Trade Crusade will continue this year.

The broader programme calls for a paid chairman and an executive secretary.

And later on the story states that:

Mrs. Lilah Lymburner, of Port Colborne, chairman of the conference, will receive what Mr. Randall termed an honorarium of $4,000 a year. She emphasized at a joint press conference with the Minister that the conference is not a club; I expect at least 50,000 women will become involved in this.

Still later down, the story says that Miss Fell, a provincial civil servant, will receive a salary of from $5,200 to $6,300 range; she was taken in as a full-time executive secretary.

Now, I would like to put a question to the hon. Minister. When did Miss Fell resign?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Miss Fell took the job and found it was not the kind of job she wanted and she asked to be transferred back to her job in The Department of Lands and Forests. I do not know whether the young lady has gone back or not as yet, but I understand she is going back.

Mr. MacDonald: Right, thank you.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, the one full-time person—because Mrs. Lymburner is on an honorarium and is not necessarily a full-time person—the one full-time person in chapter two has already left. She has left, I submit, because the programme so far is so unsubstantial by comparison to what she was led to believe that she figures that after 23 years in civil service she does not want to revert at this stage to being a mere clerk-typist. So she has gone back to her job in the civil service and the post will have to be filled once again.

Seriously, Mr. Chairman, I have said at the outset of my remarks that I think there can be a role for women to play in this thing. I think the record of this government in abusing and using the Conference of Women for their political purposes before the election and dropping them afterwards should be condemned in the strongest possible terms. I am curious to know what is going to happen in the new chapter.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I could not do that with my women, they will not drop me.

Mr. MacDonald: For example, a year ago the hon. Minister announced that there was going to be a division of women in The Department of Economics and Development with a director. Now I would like some clarification from the hon. Minister, and perhaps we should take these questions one at a time; is there a division of women in The Department of Economics and Development or has this been washed out as part of the liquidation of chapter one of the Conference of Women?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mrs. Lymburner is heading the division.

Mr. MacDonald: There is actually a division?

Hon. Mr. Randall: That is right.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, if there is a division of women, how come it is not listed at all in our estimates for this year? All you have is the Conference of Women as item six in the main office vote.

Hon. Mr. Randall: That is right. We call it the Conference of Women, but it is a division of the department.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, perhaps we are just quibbling over words.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I think we are.

Mr. MacDonald: Will the hon. Minister indicate to me what is the composition of the new advisory committee and what are the projects that they are now going to launch in this year's programme? Specifically, for example, have they resurrected all of that range of committees on which a great deal of voluntary work was done by people who thought they were making a real contribution for a non-political cause last year?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Would you like me to answer the question now?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Randall: First of all, Mr. Chairman and hon. members, I agree with you, I think Mr. Macaulay was a terrific salesman and did an excellent job of getting everybody into the act. The success of the programme last year certainly indicates so when we look at the number of unemployed we have in this province—less than 3.3 per cent, actually 2.5 per cent at the end of last month—and the gross provincial product was up 6.9 per cent. All this had a bearing on the prosperity of this province.

I mentioned this afternoon that there were 308 items imported here in 1962, and last year 208 of these showed a considerable reduction, which indicated the women had taken the programme seriously, were looking at the label and were comparing price and quality with imports and decided to buy Canadian-made goods.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Randall: I might also mention, as I did again this afternoon, that we not only helped provide the 60,000 job opportunities, we provided twice that. At the end of March this year, there are 124,000 more people working in this province than there were last year.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Randall: I say, Mr. Chairman, that you cannot argue with success and the women's division in my estimation had a great deal to do with the success of the trade crusade programme.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald: It is all very well to have a political speech with this wired-for-sound applause from all the back seats, but I wonder if we can get down to the important substance of this.

Will the hon. Minister indicate why the advisory committee was never called together after the election?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I was just trying to remember—I heard your speech on the radio a few months ago and you read the same thing word for word tonight, so I would like to repeat some of the things that maybe the hon. member had forgotten. I would like to read the facts for you. I would be glad to tell you what the Conference of Women is doing and has done. I think perhaps these facts will be rather enlightening to all of us.

When the women's programme was first planned late in 1962, Mrs. Muriel Wright was employed at a salary of $6,600 per year outside the civil service to organize the programme. The Conference of Women was established under the chairmanship of Mrs. L. Lymburner who is, of course, still the chairman. A small executive committee was brought together by Mrs. Wright to assist in the organization of the work, and committees were established. The government's objective then, as now, was to involve the women of this province in our trade crusade drive to provide jobs for their sons and daughters. Do not think for one instant that they are not interested in such an important objective.

The executive committee met monthly, initiating projects such as fashion shows, trade crusade weeks at the arcade, a conference in the Niagara Peninsula. Mrs. Wright went to Europe to explore the possibility of fashion shows there. Many talks were given to women around the province, and other meetings were held.

Several women dropped out of the executive committee during the summer for one reason or another. For example, career women found it difficult to attend meetings during the day and others could not attend regularly; I think that is true of most women's organizations.

There was a tendency to concentrate on activities in Toronto and, according to the deputy Minister, the organization and methods services—which is a unit of The Treasury Department—reviewed the Conference of Women organization and made recommendations. These recommendations were presented to the deputy Minister in a report dated September 30.

The report recommended that two civil service positions be set up for women to ensure closer co-ordination and co-operation in the department. These recommendations were accepted and, after discussions with the civil service commission, it was decided that only one position should be established within the civil service but that the chairman of the Conference of Women should be paid; and you know what the pay is.

The Department of the Civil Service reviewed the position and decided on the salary range of $5,250 to $6,300. The position was advertised on November 16, 1963 as competition No. 1,854, and ten applications were received. The position paid considerably less than the $6,900 which Mrs. Wright was now receiving, and she did not participate in the competition.

I should point out that every civil service position must be filled by competition. At this stage I was appointed as the Minister of the department and of course matters were held in abeyance until I had the opportunity to review the situation and give my approval of the programme. This I did and the successful applicant in the competition was appointed and is now with us; since then Miss Fell has resigned and gone back to her old job.

For the record I would refer to several dates which will show that there is no foundation to the charge made by the hon. member for York South. I have already referred to the OM study, which was completed on September 30. The former Minister sent a long memorandum to the deputy Minister on October 7, just prior to his resignation, in which he set out his views on the conference. He also was concerned about the lack of co-ordination, stating that it was not his intention to have two programmes in the department—one for everybody, and one for women. He stated that the programme of the Conference of Women should be more closely integrated with those of the department. He also felt that there should be a female industrial development officer in the department, and that the executive committee should be in an advisory capacity to the Minister, among other things.

A possible reorganization and reorientation of the programme was discussed with the chairman, Mrs. Lymburner. The deputy Minister also took into account the views of several of the ladies who had been closely associated with this programme. For example, in a letter dated October 29, to one of the members of the executive committee, the deputy Minister comments as follows:

Over the past two weeks I have spent considerable time in an endeavour to clarify the future role of the conference and to make sure that it will be established on a firm and permanent basis. I believe I have made good progress, and this includes the establishment of one of the two permanent positions in the department which specialize in women's activities.

I have also held talks with Mrs. Lymburner and we are in substantial agreement as to the future role of the Conference of Women.

Meanwhile, promotions sponsored by the Conference of Women are proceeding. The conference has sponsored a booth at the Canadian National Exhibition and it has sponsored a daily fashion show. There were active negotiations with the federal government to sponsor a fashion show at the Canadian fair in Philadelphia during the week of November 12.

A major promotion was organized in connection with the Royal Winter Fair, November 21, whereby a fashion show was sponsored, and leading buyers from major United States stores were flown in for the event. This promotion, the success of which was due to the great deal of work put into it by Mrs. Wright, received wide recognition. For example, stories and pictures written by departmental staff on the event were carried by more than 200 newspapers throughout the United States. I have copies of the stories which appeared in 25 of these.

On January 7, I replied to a letter which I had received from one of the members of the executive committee who had tendered her resignation:

"I was sorry to receive your letter of resignation from the Conference of Women. While there had been no meetings of the original committee for some time, please be assured that the Conference of Women has my full support. There is much to be done and it is my intention to make sure that we have a sound, firmly established organization to carry out the programme of the Conference of Women.

"Much closer co-operation in the work of the department is desirable and I appreciate the problems faced by Mrs. Wright and the committee in the past month. A great deal of excellent work has been done in the past year on behalf of the government.

"May I thank you sincerely for your personal efforts as a member of the executive. Your resignation is accepted with regret and you may be assured that we are most appreciative of the contribution you and the members of the conference have made in the past."

In planning our budget last fall, an amount was included to cover the administrative expenses of the conference for the coming year. Further amounts, for example the promotion of trade crusade weeks, which are of interest to the Conference of Women, have been included in the trade and industry branch appropriations. It was decided that an expanded advisory committee should be appointed to give representation from all parts of the province. This has been done and the ladies appeared here in the Legislature while attending a meeting here last month.

There are many things we have planned for the Conference of Women. The programme is under way. We will have a "Canadian Week" in Kitchener on May 25. We have other fashion shows coming up and the programme is working. As far as I am concerned it is going to be a large part and parcel of our trade crusade programme.

There are going to be changes in personnel. I do not think you can get so many women together without some dropping out. We have 22 in the new advisory committee right now. I am quite sure that with the family problems these women run into—they are all married and most of them have small families—we will lose some of them before the end of the year. So I am quite sure there are going to be some changes in the advisory committee, and the committee previous to this is no exception.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the women we had previously working with the trade crusade group have done, in my estimation, an excellent job. While I am quite sure that there may have been some dissatisfaction with the odd one, certainly I am not going to deprecate any woman who made a contribution to the trade crusade week; and on that statement, sir, I stand.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister did not answer my question as to why the advisory committee was never called together again after September 25.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I will be glad to answer that for the hon. member right now, if he likes. Mrs. Lymburner at that time was an honorary chairman, and had a business of her own. I have a letter here from her, Mr. Chairman, written to Mr. Macaulay, and it reads:

Sir:

I felt I should tell you that I leave Toronto by TCA this evening of September 30 for Winnipeg on a speaking tour which will take me from there to Fort William, Port Arthur, Sault Ste. Marie and back to North Bay, returning to Toronto on October 12.

That is why the meeting was not held. Mrs. Lymburner was away.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, my point is this: It was never held. I do not want to belabour this much longer, except that it is all very well for the hon. Minister to pay tribute—and tribute which should be paid—but the original advisory committee was allowed to disintegrate. Perhaps it was part of the interregnum while the new hon. Minister was getting established. I am not going to try to elaborate now why all the things happened. But many of the women were not even thanked for the contribution they had made. Sure, one woman resigned, and she got the letter of thanks the hon. Minister has just read. I think there was even a highly amusing incident in another case where another member of the original advisory committee was thanked for her letter of resignation when she had not submitted it. The confusion was really greater than you could imagine.

However, the hon. Minister now says that the advisory committee has been enlarged to include women.

Let us face it, the new advisory committee—I think I am correct, in fact I am certain I am correct but if perchance I am wrong let the hon. Minister correct me now—other than Mrs. Lymburner, has only two of the original group on it. So they were just dropped, with no explanation, and a new group is being brought together. It is a closed chapter and the sooner it becomes a closed chapter and we forget about it, the better. But it is a pretty sorry chapter, in terms of using and abusing a group of women for your political purposes, and then dropping them in this fashion when they had made a real contribution.

The hon. Minister has indicated the programme of work they have lined up for the next year—regional conferences I presume instead of this kind of, monstrous kind of conference they had down in the Royal York Hotel a year ago. But there is one basic point I want to make. When you get women working in what is the consumers' field—I am a little curious as to what are the various jurisdictions of organizations attempting to do work in this field.

For example, as the hon. Minister knows, one of the government departments makes a grant to the Canadian Association of Consumers, Ontario Branch. They are attempting to do one phase of work in this field. There were a great many people who were suspicious of the advisory committee's new establishment because it was going to be concentrated primarily in the rural areas in the Women's Institutes, where Mrs. Lymburner's past experience tended to be concentrated because she, I think, is the past president of the Canadian Women's Institutes. I am told that the new advisory committee is made up of people whose names were submitted by local chambers of commerce and community groups of this nature, so that it is one that represents city as well as country. Indeed, I understand, among them there are some good Liberals, so let me say to my hon. Liberal friends: do not complain that this is a Tory organization.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): They are all good.

Mr. MacDonald: There are Liberals anyway.

An hon. member: Stick to the issue; stick to the point.

Mr. MacDonald: But what is the exact delineation of the responsibilities of this body as compared with the CAC? Is this body going to get into anything of the field of the Canadian Association of Consumers? Because, if it is, I submit to you that we are beginning to spend money in a duplicated fashion and wasting it. Can the hon. Minister give me some assurance that we are not going to get into a duplication of works?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Yes, I will be glad to. Let me draw a comparison. In the economic council we have a committee engaged on research. When we set up the first committee and asked the chairman to take over, we found there were nine different groups engaged in research in this province, Mr. Chairman, so I suggested to the former Minister, before we start another group out doing a research job, we should find out what the other nine are doing, so that we do not duplicate our efforts. I might also say that, in the Windsor committee, we also found, when we set up the economic council, there were 27 reports since 1957, on what is wrong with Windsor. So before we compiled another report, we examined the 27 reports we already had. And I would say to you, sir, that the women's organizations we have set up now will try to co-ordinate their activities with the consumer groups, and with any women's groups across this province and try to sell them on the programme of a trade crusade and the need to work with us with our trade crusade programme—on fashion shows and promoting Canadian-made products and as I say, looking at the label.

Just to give you one example of how it would work: I was at a fashion show at the Constellation Hotel just a week ago; there were over 300 people in there and the show was put on by a local shopping centre. Our Conference of Women appeared there and we get a chance, we believe, while talking to these people who gather groups of women together, to tell them the story of the trade crusade and why they should look at the label. And again, I just want to emphasize that they are passing along the same information that I do, and that is: We do not tell them not to buy imports, we just simply tell them to look at the label, if the quality, if the price is comparable, buy Canadian. That is going to be their punch line.

Mr. MacDonald: I thank the hon. Minister for his explanation and I think we can do nothing more now than hold a watching brief over chapter two of the Conference of Women and wish it the best in its work.

As a footnote to this discussion of women, and on the comment that the hon. Minister made this afternoon that he was reducing a great deal of the advertising programme in connection with the crusade for trade, I think it is well for the House to be informed as to what some people thought of the advertising that it had in the past. I have here, for example, a column that was carried in the Toronto Telegram, written by Nancy Phillips on February 28, 1964; it is entitled:

IT IS A DOWDY BILLBOARD

My vote for the dowdiest-looking woman in Toronto goes to a would-be fashion-plate. If you drive up Yonge St. past the liquor control board building—just north of Roxborough—you'll see her gracing a large Ontario Government Trade Crusade billboard.

The only message on the sign is: "Look For Made in Canada" which of course is another way of saying why buy imports when the national product is just as good or better? But the lady thereon who represents—presumably—a discriminating shopper is sporting an outfit that Minnie Mouse would be ashamed to give to the TSO rummage sale.

The whole thing reeks of Hicksville. Not only is it an affront to a city which boasts some of the nation's best dressed women, it's also a sad comment on the taste of our trade crusaders.

My point, gentlemen, is that any woman who dresses like your billboard gal is incapable of making intelligent decisions. About labels, anyway. So, maybe it is just as well that you are cutting down on your advertising programme, if that is the reaction it has produced.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I will be glad to comment on that. I have been covering appliances for 35 years and any time you put out any kind of an ad that does not have a particular appeal and nobody looks at it, you are wasting your money. I can recall buying a television programme, the first all-Canadian television programme in Canada, called RCMP. After the first showing we got hundreds of letters from our dealers insisting that the acting was lousy and the dialogue was putrid and it was an amateur show, but in every case they said they liked the commercials. Now that year our sales went from $35 million to $42 million, so we were delighted to have such a bad show. Now, as far as Nancy Phillips is concerned, I respect the lady's opinion, but all I would say to you, sir, is that we have had hundreds of people call in and say they have had a look at the billboard and they have noticed what Mrs. Phillips said about it and as far as I am concerned, I could not care less what any fashion writer said, as long as the people look at the billboard and get the message. And that is exactly what I am getting.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, on vote 401, what fascinates me is this figure of $750,000 for advertising, exhibits, conferences, special services and publications arising therefrom. Now in discussing this, I say as I have said before that I have a great deal of regard for the hon. Minister of Economics and Development and if he will devote his many fine qualities to the benefit of all our citizens—my criticism is not personal, it is on policy.

Now, this department that he heads up, as a back benchner I would suggest it is a relatively new portfolio, and after watching how it dovetailed into the election last June, July, August and September, and stepped up with increasing tempo close to election day—for every television commercial with the hon. Prime Minister was preceded by a promotion on the crusade business—I felt that my tax dollars were abetting his election. I did not like that. Now I would hope that this is not in any way going to be a gigantic PR machine for this government but I think, as things will develop in this portfolio, going along with the machine of ladies you have working for you, that the image of the government will not suffer, believe me.

We have this figure of $750,000 and repeatedly I believe that every time the government gets in trouble we have a column in the Toronto Star.

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: You do not have to read any columns—

Mr. Sargent: Thank you, George. It is written by Dalton Camp. I understand he is a top brass in your party machine—top man. This is a cosy arrangement, Mr. Chairman. In the last year, Mr. Camp, who runs an agency—he is a top Tory—

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: He is in our camp.

Mr. Sargent: He received $153,000, and $119.75 in one department—it is the hon. Minister's department. On another bid he received $9,920 for publications. We will dodge down a bit further on B-15 last year, in the Ontario-St. Lawrence Development Commission—he received $67,000.

An hon. member: We are supposed to be on—

Mr. Sargent: Well, we will get to that in a minute. Then further down on maintenance, he gets another $6,152. Now this is a very cosy set-up, where the president of the Conservative Association can run an agency, then if his government gets in trouble, can have a full shot on the editorial page of the Toronto Star to back up their—now this is handy, it is real dandy—

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: What is wrong with it? Give us the details of your organization in Owen Sound.

Mr. Sargent: I would tell the hon. member for Forest Hill that he has a four-column spread on the editorial page of the Star. "In This Corner," is the title of the column, by Dalton Camp. Now, I imagine it is the same Dalton Camp.

Mr. E. A. Dunlop (Forest Hill): I think you will probably find that the Star pays him for that.

Mr. Sargent: Well I guess the taxpayers of Ontario are paying for it when you see these handouts and agency commissions.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sargent: Now, I would suggest to the Ontario government and to the hon. Minister that we are looking at a giant PR machine insofar as further facts are concerned, that have developed from the Owen Sound fiasco, when the government—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Sargent: I would suggest to the hon. Minister that the facts as they unfold and the facts presented to this House before on the Owen Sound situation and fiasco as it developed, that this Owen Sound group—and this may be ODA but it leads up to the point, Mr. Minister — that this machine, that I believe you head now, is the basic conception. Whoever dreamed it up, it was a giant PR machine to hold this government in a favourable image. And I would suggest to you that the hon. Minister—and I wish that Mr. Macaulay were here tonight, sir, because I see that last year he spent $12,000 of our money in travelling expenses. Now, that is a lot of money, and I would like to know the area that the hon. Prime Minister will entertain in that a person can be a member of this House and not ever show his face here. I think it is important to all of us who try to do a job, to attend a session. When a man holds a seat in this House and never appears here, I cannot ask the questions properly to this hon. Minister here, when the hon. Minister is not here to defend himself.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Do you want us to keep an attendance record?

Mr. Sargent: Well, as this unfolds—going back to the field where our money was used to promote the Conservative Party in the last election—I wish to ask the hon. Minister—and it is not his baby, but he will have to assume the mantle now—that after this programme had been launched, the Owen Sound management of the firm approached Mr. Etchen, who was one of the top brass of the ODA—

Hon. Mr. Randall: On a point of order, we are on vote 401.

Mr. Sargent: I suggest the business is advertising.

Mr. Chairman: I am asking you to deal with vote 401, advertising, exhibits, conferences, special services and publications arising therefrom.

Mr. Sargent: Well, I suggest there is a wide area for discussion. This is advertising that I am bringing up, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman: You are dealing with 406.

Mr. Sargent: I am dealing with advertising on 401.

Mr. Chairman: Continue.

Mr. Sargent: As the hon. Minister will tell you, public relations covers a big sphere. So, anyway, the Owen Sound management approached the ODA and asked them if they wanted to close the plant on July 15. Now, at that point $80,000 of the province of Ontario's money had been expended in this operation.

Mr. Chairman: Order. The $80,000 that you speak of, was that in advertising or was it—

Mr. Sargent: I would suggest that it is advertising, yes; it went into the Owen Sound plant.

Mr. Chairman: Order. Will you direct your question to the Minister on that basis?

Mr. Sargent: Yes, my question is to the hon. Minister. At that time $80,000 had been spent and pledged by the Ontario government. This had been used up and when they approached Mr. Etchen he refused to close the plant and said to leave it in operation. The plant was left open until two days after the election and the information I gave the House on the last point that a Mr. Marshall had called to close the plant down—it was a Mr. Mitchell of your staff.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: That is the second time I have heard that.

Mr. Sargent: Yes, I know, but I am clarifying the whole issue now, George.

An hon. member: With respect to the advertising end of it?

Mr. Sargent: Yes, sir. It is not a laughing matter, it is $170,000. And so, two days after the election, Mr. Mitchell of your staff called to close the plant down. That is a matter of record. I talked to Mr. Mitchell on the 'phone last week and he confirmed that he had made that call. And Mr. Macaulay told this House, or the present hon. Minister told this House, that the order came to close the plant on October 21. Now there is a great variance of truth and I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that if $170,000 has gone into this operation and it was used to support this government in the election drive, I say it is basically not in the public interest. And I say therefore this could be conceived as a PR machine for the government.

An hon. member: Well, it did not work.

Mr. Sargent: That is why they closed the plant down.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, on this item of advertising, I spoke on this last year and what I said then still holds. I feel that the government is spending far too much money on advertising, $759,000 is a lot of money, and the unfortunate part about it is that most of this spending, practically all of it, is used really for political patronage. Now I do not care what political party does this, be it provincially or federally; I say that basically this is wrong in principle. And it is about time the public woke up to the fact that political parties are using this type of thing in order to pay for election programmes or to pave the way for a campaign that is bound to come sooner or later.

The very fact that under this item one particular advertising agency alone, Dalton Camp Associates, gets nearly $250,000—last year it got about $200,000 that we know of—shows that this money is being paid and used for political purposes. It is not the business or the purpose of government to have these fancy billboards all over the province. Last year it was moose heads and hippopotamuses, this year it is a dowdily dressed female. This is a waste of public money; and it is, in essence, a political payoff, Mr. Chairman.

In other words, they are rewarding those who have helped them during a campaign which has just passed. Last year it was for getting in preparation for the campaign.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: That is the biggest untruth I have ever heard in this House.

Mr. Trotter: This is an absolute fact. All you have to do is read the public accounts. Mr. Camp is the greatest beneficiary in the payoff; but there is the Lovick agency, McConnell Eastman—all the well-known active Tories are being paid off with thousands upon thousands of dollars of the taxpayers' money. And I say it is wrong.

I know you fellows think it is a big joke because this time it has worked. But again I want to emphasize for the record, Mr. Chairman, that this, in essence, is a waste of money. It is most obviously a political payoff. I am surprised it has taken a year for a shrewd member like the hon. member for York South to wake up to the fact that these dinners, and all this work among the women, was nothing but a preparation for an election campaign. A year ago I tried to tell this House that, and they thought I was trying to make a mountain out of a molehill; but the truth is that this is exactly what is being done—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Oliver: Mr. Chairman, really now, the hon. members opposite ought to try to contain themselves a little bit at any rate. The rule, of course, is quite clear—that my hon. friends across the way cannot interrupt when a speaker is speaking in this House. Yet they are doing it continuously, not only continuously but loudly and boisterously; and one of those is enough, but when you get all three of them together it is too much. I would ask you to rule that they do not interrupt the speaker.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order! I would ask the members to refrain from interrupting while the speaker is on his feet trying to make statements; I think the business of the House would move along in a faster manner.

Mr. R. J. Boyer (Muskoka): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Trotter: Yes.

Mr. Chairman: On a point of order?

Mr. Boyer: No, I wish to ask a question of the hon. member.

He has given several large figures of money which he says are paid to certain individual firms. Why does he not admit that this money is used to pay for advertising in media—in newspapers, magazines, radio programmes, television programmes; that is the purpose of these expenditures? The hon. member has said this money is given to a certain company; it is not, it is used for the payment of those accounts.

Mr. Trotter: Why, sure. The agency makes around 15 per cent at least, and in the meantime the remainder is spread around where it counts more: $17,000 for a dinner, or money to different newspapers throughout the area in advertising. Government advertising is all part of the angle. You are paying them 15 per cent and then some. The hon. member knows nothing about the advertising business.

An hon. member: What do you know about it?

Mr. Trotter: I repeat it is a political pay-off. Dalton K. Camp is one organization—for which he gets a good percentage. He then passes it out to those newspapers and radio stations who are friendly to the government.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Is the hon. member suggesting that you can buy the newspapers?

Mr. Trotter: That one man alone passes out, by getting this commission, $250,000 on this one department alone. I say that it is a prime disgusting waste of the taxpayers' money, and you are misusing the money and misleading the people of the province of Ontario.

Mr. Chairman: Order! I would ask the member to direct his question to the Minister of this department.

Mr. Trotter: Well, the hon. member was asking the question; I was giving him the answer, Mr. Chairman, which he obviously should know. He should not be vice-chairman of the Hydro if he did not know the answer to that question; because while I am on this subject, this hon. member who asked me the question is vice-chairman of the Hydro, which spends about $1 million a year passing out the money, the same way as they do with Dalton Camp. The Hydro was one of the big wasters in advertising in the province of Ontario. It, too, resorts to political payoffs, obviously.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question? I wonder if the hon. member would repeat those statements outside the Legislature?

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I asked a question, Mr. Chairman. Would the hon. member repeat that outside the Legislature? I don't think he does.

Mr. Trotter: I did, during the election campaign. I have said this on a number of occasions. This is so obvious, so obvious.

Mr. Chairman: Order! Let us get back to vote 401.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, on advertising on this 401: With regard to the amounts, we are all aware that the amount is not net—it is 15 per cent, and two per cent off for the agency. But there are a number of things, Mr. Chairman, in this department—

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Chairman, may I point this out? I think the hon. member would agree that 15 per cent is paid by the media to the advertising agency. The hon. member for Parkdale—I do not know whether he intended to say this, or not—inferred that the government somehow or other pays 15 per cent to the agency. That, of course, is not the case.

Mr. Sargent: The hon. member is quite wrong there; the government pays the agency and the agency pays the media.

Mr. Boyer: Yes. And the media pays the agency—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, my hon. colleague is quite right, it is the extras which count in this business. I am talking, first of all, about the money for the media, allotted to the amount of $750,000; then we have the items for the publications, and such things as this report of the advertising firm headed by Dalton Camp. The National Progressive-Conservative Association president was given the government advertising contract for two Ontario historic centres, without a tender, four years ago.

Mr. Chairman: Order! We must deal with vote 401 under The Department of Economics and Development.

Mr. Sargent: I am talking about The Department of Economics and Development, sir.

Now, Tourism and Information Minister James Auld acknowledged in the Ontario Legislature yesterday that Dalton K. Camp and Associates still holds the contract for promoting the St. Lawrence Parks Commission, which operates the Upper Canada Village—

Mr. Chairman: Order! This has nothing to do with vote 401.

Mr. Sargent: Well, it comes in to show that this contract was given. It is under this department and was given without a tender.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): There is no tender for advertising. They all charge the same.

Mr. Sargent: It may be done that way in the hon. Minister's business but in our business it is done on a fairly legal basis.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member knows perfectly well that every advertising agency has exactly the same rates, whether they be Liberal, Conservative or NDP—and I do not think the NDP is in the advertising business.

Mr. MacDonald: They are.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Scarborough North has the floor.

Mr. T. L. Wells (Scarborough North): Mr. Chairman, as one of the few members of this House in the advertising profession, I think that I should say a few words about this clouded picture being portrayed of advertising.

First of all, the agencies which have been mentioned as having government accounts are some of the finest advertising agencies in this country. These are agencies which have proven they can produce advertising campaigns to do the job which they were called upon to do. I think I should point out here first, that you never tender for an advertising agency. There is not a commercial company or a business which ever asks for tenders from an advertising agency.

What is done, Mr. Chairman, is that they are asked to make a presentation. They are given the problem: "What is the situation. Why are you going to advertise?" They are asked then to bring in a suggested programme as to how they would approach this problem. They bring in layouts of the advertisements, and so forth. Then the person who is buying the campaign, be it the government or a company, decides if they like the approach of the agency, if this is the approach that can do the job. Then an agency is picked on this basis.

Every agency charges the same, except for one or two who are now actually charging their clients fees, but this is not a generally accepted principle in the advertising business right now. The agencies basically make their money by the 15 per cent that is rebated to them from the rates that media charges for the space, or the television or radio time, and this 15 per cent and two per cent discount for each is a standard rate.

Let us look at the statements that have been made here tonight—one of them being, I think, that the money spent went to publications that were favourable to the government—I think that this is a slur, a very sad slur upon the fine men—

Mr. Trotter: You are naive.

Mr. Wells: It is a slur upon the fine men that work in these agencies and select media, Mr. Chairman, because I know many of these men personally and I work with many of them. I know personally that they do not pick media on this basis. Media are picked—radio, television or print media—on the basis of "Can it do the job?" "Has it got the audience?" "Is it the best buy?" I know from personal experience that these criteria are applied to government advertising as well.

I think that this picture can become very muddled. I am reminded of a statement—I think it was in Marketing magazine recently—that $332,000 was being spent by the federal Department of Labour to publicize this new social security number programme; you know those advertisements with all the different people standing in a row. It went to MacLaren Advertising—

Some hon. members: Oh, no, no.

An hon. member: Was it tendered?

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Troy: Point of order, Mr. Chairman. The last remark of the hon. member for Scarborough North has no connection with this government at all. He is talking about the federal government. Will you strike that out?

An hon. member: Strike it out.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could bring this to a close by pointing out that I feel somewhat, with everybody participating, like the young lad who tied the two cats' tails together and hung them over a clothes line. I sit here and enjoy the fight.

I want to assure hon. members that I do not think any government, anywhere, can operate a business as large as this without an advertising programme in many areas and I do not think hon. gentlemen across the floor believe it could be possible to operate a government like this—you have to have a promotion and a sales department to sell the province and that is exactly what we have in this programme of ours and I gave you my assurance this afternoon that I have checked the advertising programme very thoroughly. We are diverting some of our domestic advertising dollars into markets where we believe they will do the most good in getting foreigners to buy Canadian-made goods.

Prior to this we had first of all to convince Canadians to buy Canadian-made goods. That is one of the reasons for the diversification. I might say to you that as far as the advertising dollars are concerned, this $759,000 is not all advertising. There are many things that go into making up an advertising account as most of you know, and I am sure that if you are in the legal business, you have to have your name in the telephone book and your sign outside. That is promotion, that is advertising and this $759,000, of course, is broken down into many items, and consumer advertising is one; for domestic and international it is—

Mr. Bryden How much for consumer advertising?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Consumer advertising? We have $350,000 and we have—

Mr. Bryden: How much does Dalton Camp get out of that?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Dalton Camp is not the advertising agency for this department this year. We had five agencies that want to do our work and I did exactly as I have done all my life. I asked them to submit a proposition to us and we chose McConnell, Eastman and Company Limited. They had the best presentation. So that is the way advertising in my department is done and I am pretty sure that is the policy of this government and many of its departments.

Now, if there were 22 advertising agencies in this province I am sure 11 of them would be looking for Conservative business and 11 would be looking for Liberal business. I have heard the comment tonight about the advertising agencies and I can tell you that these people are very reputable. There was an article in the Telegram just a little while ago—and I know that the hon. member for Nipissing said it does not apply to his party—but there is an article here which says:

The major part of the federal government's $9 million a year advertising business has been switched from Conservative to Liberal agencies since the Liberals came to power, it was revealed today.

I am sure also that if you read the newspapers tonight you will find Mr. Lloyd making the same charges against Mr. Thatcher out there, that he had too big an advertising programme.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I can assure hon. members that there will be no wasted dollars as far as I am concerned but we are certainly going to spend those dollars where they will do the most good for the province of Ontario. I think that 100 years from now—whoever has this portfolio—will be spending money on advertising to promote the interests of the province and its economy.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Oliver: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister what proportion of this $700,000 vote goes for billboard advertising. Could he tell me that?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I will give the hon. member the breakdown: exhibition and displays, $55,000; summer and fall fairs, $34,000; films, $25,000; conferences, $20,000; publications and reports, $45,000; trade crusade week, $25,000; international fairs, $100,000; and I mentioned domestic advertising, $300,000. Billboard advertising would be included in the $300,000 we talk about.

Mr. Oliver: Does the Ruddy Company handle the billboard advertising?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I think it is Outdoor Advertising plus two or three more in the city of Toronto here. We use, I believe, more than one. However, the signboards are not owned by the advertising agencies. They are owned by different sign companies.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, I have often observed the different signboards that are used. Most of them are Ruddy Company, at least in the Toronto area. Was the hon. Minister encouraging people to buy Canadian? I do not know if he is aware of it, but the E. L. Ruddy Company is owned by General Outdoor Advertising in Chicago, Illinois. You are paying the Americans to advertise "buy Canadian."

Hon. Mr. Randall: I understand we spend $25,000 in billboards and we use all companies and I think the reason for using all companies is that those signs, as you know, are purchased—the top of buildings and corners. They get a lease on those corners and the billboard is owned or pretty well controlled by the advertising company, whether it is an American subsidiary or Canadian, but I am advised we use all the advertising outdoor companies for the billboard advertising and we hope to get the best displays in the best centres, where we get the most readers.

Mr. Troy: I am glad that the hon. member for Scarborough North spoke, because we know now who is responsible for the hippo, anyway. May I ask the hon. Minister, who was your representative of the women's conference from the city of North Bay?

Hon. Mr. Randall: We have one from Timmins and one from Kirkland Lake. There is nobody from North Bay.

Mr. Troy: Oh, say, discrimination again.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Send us a recommendation.

Mr. Troy: Is it for a fashion show? Certainly I can give you some very good ones.

Hon. Mr. Randall: It will be welcome.

Mr. Chairman: Is vote 401 carried?

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, before you leave vote 401, the hon. member for Grey North made a passing reference to travelling expenses. I would like to pursue the matter a little further. As one goes through the public accounts for 1962-63, one finds that the travelling expenses for the Ministers in most cases were between $1,000 and $1,500. The travelling expenses for the hon. Prime Minister that year were $1,800. For the hon. Minister of Economics and Development they were $12,242.24. I would like to ask the present hon. Minister if he intends to continue to be a major patron of the airlines of the world as his predecessor undoubtedly was?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I think I can answer that question better by saying if the House had adjourned earlier this year, I would be on my way tonight to Russia. I say yes, I will be doing a lot, I hope, of international travelling on behalf of the province. I believe this is what should be done when the opportunity presents itself to open doors for our Ontario products and I fully intend to get into international markets as often as I can. I think it will be proven that Mr. Macaulay's visits last year certainly paid off and I would think I would be very remiss in my responsibilities to the government if I did not get into international markets.

Mr. Troy: The hon. Minister, sir, in his opening remarks referred to an industry in northern Ontario to which a considerable amount of money had been lent in promotion. Where is that industry located?

Hon. Mr. Randall: We did not grant any money to—

Mr. Troy: I did not mean a grant of any money, but you spoke of an industry in northern Ontario about—

Hon. Mr. Randall: I think the hon. member for Grey North was speaking of a company that got a loan from ODA.

Mr. Troy: No, your own, sir. You referred to it, a mention of $400,000 was included in your speech. You said a northern Ontario firm.

Hon. Mr. Randall: That is right. That was a loan from Ontario Development Agency to a company that applied to us for a loan.

Mr. Troy: I am not asking the name of the company, but where is it located?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Sapawe, Ontario, the Mathieu Lumber Company.

Mr. Troy: Oh, that is—he was here not very long ago!

By the way, sir, would you have the files, I presume you have, of the former Minister of this department? I recall he visited my home city on September 21 and he made two speeches on that occasion. In his address to the people of the area, he said we were going to have two industries in North Bay. He said I cannot tell the names now, I cannot divulge, but there will be two industries. Now have you anything in your records about those industries and when we may expect them?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I can give you something on that. That will be under the trade and industries vote. If you will let it go until then, I will get it for you. Under vote 411.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister what is the period covered by the date of issue of the latest annual report of this department?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I am sorry, I did not hear your question.

Mr. Bryden: I was inquiring as to the period covered by and the date of issue of the latest annual report of this department.

Hon. Mr. Randall: We have the annual review of the department, and it will be out tomorrow, for 1963.

Mr. Bryden: Annual review you call it. Is that what is described as an annual report for all other departments?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Right!

Vote 401 agreed to.

On vote 402:

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): On vote 402, Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few comments on the report of the Windsor Economic Committee of the Ontario Economic Council.

Sir, every year since I was first elected to this honourable House, and that was in 1959, I attempted to point out to this government that my area has been plagued for too long a period of time by unemployment and that this government should do everything it could in an attempt to overcome this cancerous situation, this hard core of the unemployed. This problem needed, yes, merited, special attention.

After four years of prodding and after pointing out in my reply in the debate on the Speech from the Throne on December 19, 1962, that the employment index in my community was still dropping until at one time it was the least desirable of any Canadian urban area and at a low of 70.2 in July of 1962, only then did the hon. Prime Minister rise in this House and finally agree that the Windsor problem was acute enough to merit that extra bit of attention. As a result he said, and I quote:

I have asked the Ontario Economic Council to set up a committee under its aegis to conduct a full-scale inquiry with a view to formulating long-range policies to make maximum use of the advantages of that area.

On January 3, 1963, six members were named to this Windsor Economic Committee. On January 18, four were added, making a total of ten.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. members of this House, the composition of this committee. The composition is one to which we should pay special attention, because it does not represent one side of a picture at all.

For example, the chairman is Mr. Leroy D. Smithers, president of Dow Chemical of Canada. The second member is Mr. Henry C. Johnson, president of the Phil Wood Industries Limited. A third is Mr. R. H.

Long, president of Bendix-Eclipse of Canada Limited. A fourth is Mr. R. W. Todgham, president of Chrysler of Canada Limited. We can see that we have four outstanding men from the business world.

A fifth was Mr. George Burt, the Canadian director of the United Automobile Workers.

A sixth was Mr. Hugh McConville, past president of Local 195, United Automobile Workers. A seventh was Mr. Frank Quinlan, president of the Windsor and District Labour Council. The eighth was Mr. Henry Reynold, president of Local 200, United Automobile Workers. Now here we have four labour representatives.

To that committee we also had Mr. J. Blake Gertz, professor of the School of Business Administration at the University of Windsor; and as secretary, Mr. Murray Elder, industrial commissioner of the Greater Windsor Industrial Commission.

Nineteen briefs—not 27 as the hon. Minister mentioned—19 briefs, reports, letters and memos were submitted. Considerable research was also required to provide a document acceptable to all members of the committee and beneficial to the Windsor area. Faculty members from both Waterloo and Windsor Universities provided the additional research and furnished the draft report. After months of study, the committee re-wrote the report.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to inform the House of the contents of this report. When Ford of Canada moved its assembly operations to Oakville, Windsor faced a staggering unemployment problem from which the city has not fully recovered. To make matters worse, satellite industries followed the Ford move. Of significance, is this comment—and I quote from the report:

At no time did Ford or the parts plant blame anything other than the market changes or economic reasons for their decision to move.

Notice, there is no comment as to labour conditions or problems being a reason for the Ford Motor Company deciding to move. It was strictly a matter of market conditions and economics.

During the last ten years, manufacturing employment in the Metropolitan Windsor area dropped from a high of 43,000 in 1953 to a low of 27,000 in 1961. This drop meant an annual loss of about $14 million in pay-rolls. There is still the threat or fear that other industries may leave in the future.

During this last decade only small companies have moved in and set up operations.

About 25 years ago, Windsor was the cradle of industrial unionism. Because of the resistance to recognition of unions by automobile companies, Windsor became a centre of a struggle for the union recognition which is now provided for in the laws of all provinces.

The national press, as the result of this struggle, continues to give a disproportionate amount of publicity to any labour-management dispute which occurs in Windsor, regardless of its magnitude. Because of this publicity, Windsor would appear to have a poor reputation from a labour-management relations point of view. Yet fewer days were lost in Windsor through work stoppages on the basis of population than in the Toronto-Hamilton area during the period of 1957 to 1961, the latest period for which statistics are available.

And I quote now from the brief:

It is our feeling that the problem of labour-management relationships has been much overemphasized.

The migration of industry from the area during the last ten to 12 years has tended to focus attention on this labour-management relationship factor. On the other hand, there are a number of companies which have relocated, whose management have said that labour relations were not a factor in their final decision to move from the community. Many manufacturers within the city have also said that they enjoy labour-management harmony, which repudiates further the city's reputation for poor industrial relations.

How does a community erase the past reputation? Apparently only the hiring of a public relations expert is the answer.

One of the recommendations made by this committee is that The Ontario Department of Labour should provide at all times a high priority for consideration of labour-management disputes in the Windsor area, so that the appointment of conciliation officers and boards may be made quickly. Surplus manpower areas might well receive Department of Labour priorities so that remedial conciliation and arbitration processes could be available quickly to prevent further aggravation of this problem.

The public, Mr. Chairman, sees Windsor as a high labour cost area because of the dominance and influence, actual or otherwise, of the automotive industry. This may have been true in 1951, but today there are at least four other cities with higher labour costs. One of these, with approximately 33 cents an hour greater labour costs, has an employment index of 137.1 as opposed to Windsor's today of 83.1.

Then again there is the predominance of male employees in the larger Windsor plants, which makes Windsor's position in this comparison somewhat distorted. Communities with which Windsor is frequently compared have larger female work forces.

Mr. Chairman, turning to the topic of unemployment, the report states:

Unemployment is the end result of a number of conditions affecting the area, many of which are beyond the immediate control of local government.

And the report underlines:

—many of which are beyond the immediate control of local government.

Senior governments can help to alleviate unemployment.

At this point, may I state that the federal government's tax incentive, depreciation allowances, home purchase subsidies, auto parts incentive programme, have relieved the situation substantially. However, the National Employment Service report for the end of March, 1964, shows that there are still 5,578 claimants for unemployment insurance. This figure, mind you, is a marked improvement over those of March, 1963, one year ago, when 7,564 persons were out of work, an improvement of almost 2,000.

Good weather, local winter works projects, and the general upturn in the automotive industry have helped. Just imagine how more critical would the Windsor picture be if it were not for the industries and businesses across the Detroit River. Detroit is the third biggest employer, after Ford and Chrysler. It was estimated by the U.S. Customs in May, 1961, that there are about 4,028 Canadians working in Detroit.

Federal and provincial governments should always remember that tariffs, freight rates, sales and excise taxes, are very important factors affecting the Windsor area employment level. In fact, there is considerable evidence that Windsor suffers from inequitable freight charges.

Mr. Chairman, the report has a very important recommendation which I would like to bring to your attention at this time, and I quote:

Unemployment can also be partially relieved by according Windsor every consideration with respect to the location of institutional facilities in this area.

In this connection the establishment of permanent expanded facilities for the Western Ontario Institute of Technology, an institute which has already, though limited in scope by its makeshift temporary quarters, has proven its value both to the economy of Windsor and the economic development of the province.

There is also a definite need for trades training facilities in Windsor at the adult level.

Here are two institutions that are needed, not only in the local area but also to enhance the economic development of Ontario.

We have already seen the beneficial, social, cultural and economic effect that the present University of Windsor has had and we can foresee the marked advantages of a greater, greatly expanded University of Windsor.

Institutional expansion would be a sort of diversification from the consideration of Windsor being a one-industry town.

The report continues into a study of municipal efficiency and states:

This is the area of primary importance needing urgent attention. In fact, we believe that unless the greater Windsor municipalities pool their resources and community planning, civic administration and economic development, all other efforts likely provide less adequate solutions to the area's economic problems.

This report goes into some detail on the effects of unco-ordinated action in the Windsor area because of political fragmentation and arrives at general conclusions that are similar to those reached in the studies of many different urban areas in North America. It reports on two water supply systems, one recently put into operation when the pumping capacity of the city of Windsor system had more than doubled, the pumping capacity to meet the forecast demand for Greater Windsor up to the year 1976. It reports on sewage disposal and mentions an engineering study by Gorre and Storey, prepared for the city of Windsor, that indicates $1 million could be saved in the next decade by joint provision of sewer services for the entire urban area.

It reports on the lack of overall development control as a result of land use in the Windsor area, sir, that has been dictated primarily by real estate speculation and inter-municipal competition for industrial and commercial assessment. Now I quote:

As a result an irrational and generally unattractive and uneconomic pattern of land use has evolved.

Planning, to be effective, must be integrated.

It reports on the industrial-commercial assessment to residential showing Windsor's to be 60-40; Sandwich East, 37-63; Riverside, 8-92. One of the footnotes in the report on page 39 is worthy of note because it mentions:

If it were not for the present structural provincial grants any suburban municipality, except Ojibway, would be labouring under a financial handicap.

The industrial assessment of Ojibway is in no way contributing to the welfare of the rest of the urban community.

As for possible solutions to enhance municipal efficiency, four approaches were considered. One, intermunicipal agreements; two, intermunicipal boards; three, two-level metropolitan government; four, complete merger.

The Ontario Municipal Board interim report citing economy as a reason for not granting the city of Windsor the annexation it requested was studied. The anticipated loss in provincial grants appeared to be the major obstacle to metropolitan merger.

In 1935 the ruling of the judicial committee of the Privy Council of England on the amalgamation of the Windsor area at that time, stated:

If local government in any particular area becomes ineffective, it is not only right but it would appear to be the duty of the provincial Legislature to provide the necessary remedy so that the health of the inhabitants and the necessities of organized life in communities should be preserved.

The reports reads:

We believe that local governments in the Windsor area acting separately cannot best create the kind of community that people want and industry prefers. The economic situation in the Windsor area is critical and the provincial Legislature should provide financial assistance to facilitate the remedy.

Before I resume my seat, Mr. Chairman, I would like to state that since this report has been made public significant announcements have been made that will have a marked effect on the economy of the area within the next 12 months. General Motors has shown its confidence in this area by announcing a $20 million interior trim plant. This plant will employ an estimated 1,750 people and will be a real economic transfusion. Labour, business, industry and municipal government hail this announcement and have expressed their appreciation to General Motors for this expansion.

This is one new industry that is bound to attract to the community new satellite industries and further enhance labour opportunities.

Every day one sees the willingness of American capital to invest in manufacturing, retail trade and in real estate, but the Bay Street people today still look with a jaundiced eye but I may add a less jaundiced eye, at Windsor.

Today there is a new Windsor, a new spirit, a new climate, a new awareness, a new sense of pride. Today the credit rating of the city of Windsor is among the highest in Canada while the debt per capita is the lowest of all major Ontario cities.

Mr. Chairman, may I summarize the recommendations that involve the provincial government:

1. The Department of Labour provide at all times a high priority for consideration of labour-management disputes in the Windsor area so that the appointment of conciliation officers and boards may be made quickly;

2. That special consideration be given Windsor with respect to the location of government and institutional facilities in the general area;

3. That consideration concerning the possibility of establishing an industrial relations research centre at the University of Windsor be made; and

4. Amalgamation is a necessity as the area cannot afford to continue its multiple political jurisdictions, its uneconomic patterns of growth and servicing and its inner municipal competition for industrial and commercial assessment.

These are all recommendations as contained in the report. I would like the hon. Minister to comment on this report and inform this House what the government's intentions are concerning the recommendations.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Chairman, the report was prepared in roughly a year and I think there was a lot of work done, as the hon. member has pointed out. I think it was a good report. I think it even acquainted the people of Windsor with the fact that things were not as bad as most people—even some people in Windsor—were painting them. Windsor certainly is a very thriving and industrious city.

Indeed, I think the very fact that General Motors have indicated that they are going to put a plant down there, indicates also that they have confidence in the future of Windsor like many other plants that have set up business there in the last year.

Now, insofar as the recommendations that the hon. member has suggested, I am in no position tonight to say what the government will or will not do—

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, if I may correct the hon. Minister, these are not my recommendations. These are the recommendations from the report.

Hon. Mr. Randall: As far as the recommendations are concerned, as you know the report went to Windsor about a month or so ago. We have not talked to the Windsor people since then. We will be talking to them, I presume, very shortly.

We have already had a few letters from the surrounding areas on the basis of amalgamation. You appreciate some are for it and some are not. That is a matter for the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner) to take into consideration.

But insofar as the recommendations made, we have not had the opportunity of studying them with the various hon. Ministers, but I can assure you, we are very much interested in the problems of Windsor. Insofar as my department is concerned, we certainly intend to take a good look at the report, stay with it and see if there is anything we can do to improve the working conditions down there and also to improve the replacement of industry there.

As I pointed out this afternoon, we have a regional development programme which is developing, and certainly Windsor, and Cornwall at the opposite end, are two cities we have in mind. So I can assure you the report is not going to be forgotten so far as we are concerned. We are certainly going to be looking at it, and studying it with those other hon. Ministers who are involved, who probably have more to do with the three items you mention here tonight, than I would have.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, may I thank the hon. Minister for his reply, because if we do not get some type of action from the government, I will make my sixth plea next year.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon, if I understood the hon. Minister correctly, he stated that the economic council in co-operation with the Ontario Research Foundation, I think he said, is now studying the question of automation. Did I hear the hon. Minister correctly? Is my recollection of it correct?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I think what was said this afternoon, sir, is that we are studying this with the federal economic council and that we hoped to get in other provincial bodies who have a similar problem, who would like to work with us on a national basis. We will be discussing it with them very shortly.

Mr. Bryden: Now that the hon. Minister has refreshed my memory, I remember that is what he said. Well, what I want to ask, Mr. Chairman, is what has happened to the foundation on automation and employment, which was at least forecast in the report on the automation conference held last September?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, I made a statement about this in the House some weeks ago after a meeting had been held with the Economic Council of Canada and the Economic Council of Ontario. I believe, and I am remembering the context of my remarks, that at least two other provinces were involved then as well, and we were working out with the Economic Council of Canada, a national approach to the problems of automation, and in the interim, while these negotiations are continuing on, the establishment of the foundation here, which we had originally envisaged as being purely an Ontario approach to the problem, is being held in abeyance, with the knowledge, the full co-operation and agreement of the steering committee that we had set up to establish the automation foundation. In other words, there is an opportunity for us to get some co-operation on this problem on a national basis from the start we made here last September, out of which came the idea of our automation foundation in this province. We have the necessary funds voted to carry on either the establishment of the foundation or the co-operation with Dr. Deutsch and his council at the federal level. We have not lost sight of the establishment of the foundation here, but if we can work this out on a national basis, we think we may have a better approach to the problem.

Mr. Bryden: Well, I would certainly agree with the hon. Prime Minister that any co-operative action that can be elicited in this field will be desirable, but I do not see why delaying action on the part of Ontario will contribute to the possibility of co-operation.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: We are not delaying action, we are directing it in another direction. I will send you a copy of the statement I made in the House here.

Mr. Bryden: I do recall the statement. Of course, at the time, as with most of these statements—of which we get an average of one or two a day—we had no chance to comment at the time.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well, we try to keep you informed.

Mr. Bryden: Yes, I realize that, but we do not get any chance to comment at the time. I would like to pursue this a little bit further. As I understand it, all that is being studied is the feasibility of study.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: No, that is not so.

Mr. Bryden: You are studying the problem of automation?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Right, and the two councils together are doing this—that is the Ontario Economic Council and the Economic Council of Canada. We are ready to go ahead and establish the foundation here but it appeared that in co-operation with them, we might get a better approach to it, so that what we had planned in establishing our own foundation is held in abeyance until we see where this new development is going. This new development has come out of recent meetings, held on a national basis, but as I say, if my memory serves me correctly, I think there are two provinces involved and we feel this is a better approach than the approach we started here in the province by ourselves.

Mr. Bryden: But regardless of what might happen in terms of intergovernment co-operation, I still think that there is a role for major study in this province and I would think that a specialized agency would be better equipped to undertake it than the Ontario Economic Council, which has a great many matters under consideration. I do not suppose there is any point in belabouring the matter. The hon. Prime Minister has stated the government's position—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well, I think I can say this, Mr. Chairman. Really the hon. member and the government are seeking the same answer and we are seeking it in the most efficient way we can. Our intent is to come to grips with these problems and solve them; that is why we held the conference last September. It was as a result of that conference that the idea of the foundation arose. Well, as you know, through the change in government, there was a change in organization at the federal level and we intend to pursue our studies here. We have allocated funds for it but we also intend to do it on what we consider to be the most efficacious basis, but we are proceeding in what we consider to be the best fashion.

Mr. Troy: On the economic council. I was interested, Mr. Chairman, in the article in the Monetary Times about northeastern Ontario by the deputy Minister of this department. As you very well know, Mr. Minister, the economic council and the tourist committee were set up, I believe, two years ago, and in that economic council, there was a northern development committee. According to this article of the deputy Minister's, the council was studying airport facilities in northeastern Ontario municipalities with a view to possible establishment of intermunicipal scheduled air services. Probably the hon. Minister knows also that we on this side of the House have been suggesting intermunicipal air service for some time. It mentions, too, the feasibility of a study of Moosonee harbour, now underway to determine whether this port can be developed for shallow draught vessels. The committee is also checking the possibility of developing an all-weather air strip for Moosonee. The tourist committee is presently preparing recommendations from a survey of the northeastern Ontario tourist development potential and the research foundation is conducting various research projects in an effort to create new industrial activity in the region.

I wonder, Mr. Chairman, when we may expect these reports of the economic council and its subsidiary committees, particularly as they concern northeastern Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I might say that these studies were initiated, as the hon. member knows, in the early part of last year and as the hon. Prime Minister pointed out a few minutes ago there was a change in government. We have been talking to the federal people; it is a joint partnership programme we will be talking about insofar as the air services or air fields are concerned in northern Ontario. Those discussions are still under way.

I would assume that in the next few months we should have a definite opinion from the council as to whether we can or cannot proceed with the transportation service. Many factors have to be looked at. One is, who is going to run the airline? Who is going to take care of the fields and who is going to travel? And these studies cannot be done, as I think it will be appreciated, overnight or over a few months, but I can assure you that the economic council is pushing these projects through because we have others for them to get cracking on and I would think that we will have some further information on these within the next few months.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that the committee of supply rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to a certain resolution and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will commence with the Budget debate and if there is time left in the morning we will return to the estimates of The Department of Economics and Development.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 10.35 o'clock, p.m.

Introduction of bills.

THE UNIVERSITY OF GUELPH

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to incorporate the university of Guelph.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments about this bill, dealing as it does with an historic occasion. The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart), who seconded this bill, will also make a few comments.

As hon. members of the House are aware, from the remarks I made on Wednesday last in relation to the Acts concerning the overall functioning of our universities and the creation of a Department of University Affairs and the Ontario Universities Capital Aid Corporation, as well as the statements and remarks contained in the report of the advisory committee, we are in the province engaged in an unprecedented and very massive programme of university expansion which is needed to serve the needs of the province.

This expansion has taken a variety of forms. We have taken old universities and have added new facilities and new staff. In some cases our older universities have increased two or threefold. We have created new universities. Some colleges, which through their early history and early part of this century were affiliated to larger universities, have attained new and independent status themselves, and have begun programmes of expansion. New universities which have no prior affiliation have been created, and are now in varying stages of development.

This bill to create the University of Guelph marks another substantial step forward in the programme of provincial university expansion and in a real sense this will be a combination of the long established affiliated college which has certainly come of age and which will now join and be affiliated with a brand new university.

The hon. Minister of Agriculture will outline to you the history of the federated colleges, but it is sufficient for me to say that the beginnings of the federated colleges go back over 100 years. During this long period of time they have served this province well. In fact I think it would be fair to say they have served this country well. Certainly they have served the whole field of agriculture in our rural communities with distinction. And nothing, Mr. Speaker, either outlined in this bill or contemplated for the future, is intended to change the traditional role which has been filled by the federated colleges.

Through the greater part of this 100-year period the colleges, starting with the Agricultural College and after that the Veterinary College, have enjoyed affiliation with the University of Toronto, which in the beginning was, of course, the provincial university. This has been a fine and, I think, a mutually beneficial association.

Graduates of the colleges have received University of Toronto degrees, and many have gone on to do specialized work in their chosen fields within the University of Toronto. The principals of the Agricultural and Veterinary Colleges have, through these many years, been active members of the senate of the University of Toronto.

Mr. Speaker, this very historic affiliation which has lasted over so many years will come to an end. This is an inevitable step, as these colleges prepare for the new role they will play in the educational life of our province.

Hon. members will recall how, in 1962, legislation was introduced concerning the colleges. That legislation had, as its purpose, the strengthening of both the administrative organizations and the research facilities contained in these colleges. At that time I pointed out that these institutions were basically developed for the benefit of the agricultural community of the province and that, in their present form—in the form in which they were then—they did not fit the general pattern of university development.

I indicated at that time that careful study was being given to granting university status to the colleges and, when that study was completed—about one year ago—I was able to announce that a new university would be created on the Guelph campus.

Now, with the unprecedented demand for university accommodation we face at the present time, it became inevitable that the basic facilities of these colleges, with their truly unparalleled capacity for rapid expansion, would have to be shared on a broader basis by the people of our province. We were of the opinion at the time the decision was made, and subsequent evidence has further supported this view, that with the excellent facilities presently forming a base there, we can expand much more rapidly and more economically in this area than has been possible in some of the other new universities which have been created in recent years.

As a result, it is estimated that it will be possible to accept 500 additional students in arts and science in 1965, and for the university, including the colleges, to reach a total enrolment of 6,000 students by 1970-1971. Now we can carry our projections further; and, of course, the further one projects perhaps the less certain the results become. It is anticipated that further extensions and expansion may make it possible for the university to enrol up to 15,000 students by the 1980s.

To be of greater service, it will require more than a decision to change the status and add facilities. It requires the creation of a truly new institution and that is what this Act will allow. An important section of the Act provides that the existing federated colleges will become part of the university. As a result, for the time being at least, the colleges will maintain their present association with The Ontario Department of Agriculture, and matters such as status of staff, organization for research activity, and provision of operating funds and so on, will remain unchanged as they relate to the colleges. However, this relationship will, in time, change.

But many adjustments must take place, and it is assumed that inevitably the university will assume greater responsibility in such areas as these I have noted. But to make the necessary changes will take time, will take very careful study, will take negotiation, and a good deal of effort—because much is involved. These matters really are quite complex. On the other hand, the circumstances we face in requiring additional university spaces in our province makes it necessary that we make a start and that we press on with the job. This Act being introduced this morning will permit us to achieve this latter objective I mention. At the same time it will permit an orderly approach to the problems of integrating the existing colleges with the new institution.

However, as I have said on other occasions in this House, I would repeat my assurance to the people of the province, particularly those living in the rural areas, that no matter what agreements are reached, nothing will jeopardize the position the colleges hold as the foremost agricultural institutions on this continent. I think that we can be very proud of these institutions and what they have done over the years. As I have said before, there are many people trained there who do not use this training in the province of Ontario, but we are determined that the character and the function of these institutions will continue.

There has been sufficient experience, not only here but in many parts of the United States, to show that an institution whose beginnings are orientated towards agriculture can be expanded for greater service in other disciplines without prejudicing the original objectives. Indeed, I think if we handle this situation properly the position and the programmes of the federated colleges will be strengthened rather than in any way weakened, and this is our intent.

In the bill are named certain persons whom we have requested to serve on the board of governors, and to them will fall a very large responsibility. I notice that Mr. T. A. McEwan from Guelph is here today attending at the birth of this institution. He has been very active over the last few years in the preliminary work that has been done; and Dr. J. D. MacLachan, who will be the president of the university, is here as well. And I would just mention that their efforts have been very beneficial to the government in bringing us to this point where we are this morning, where we can introduce this bill secure in the knowledge that the background work has been done and that problems have been delineated and many of them have been solved.

The men whose names are in the bill have all signified that they are prepared to serve on the board of governors. We have confidence that under their guidance the university will build on the traditions there already, that have been established over the years, and we feel quite certain this new institution will meet the challenges that lie ahead, in the same fashion that it has met the challenges in the past.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I crave your indulgence to say a few words this morning. It may be somewhat unprecedented to speak on the introduction of a bill as a seconder of such a bill, but I believe this is such an historic moment in the province of Ontario as far as agriculture is concerned, that I would like to say a few words as the hon. Prime Minister has suggested I might.

This university, as has been so well expressed by the hon. Prime Minister, is much different from the establishment of other new universities. The University of Guelph will devolve on a campus that is steeped in history and accomplishment with facilities, with buildings, with staff, and with an already established world-wide recognition. It is an historic moment for the city of Guelph itself, which has long been a college town and has benefited from the college being established there and will benefit even more, I believe, in the future as a university city.

The university will grow and will expand from an agricultural nucleus and from an agricultural concept. The new Wellington College will embrace arts and sciences, as has been suggested and proposed by the hon. Prime Minister in the bill which he has introduced. The students in these faculties will benefit from their contacts with agriculture and the academic experience of the agricultural students will be further enhanced through the broader campus interests. To my way of thinking, this will lend itself to an improved understanding and relationship between rural and urban students, which will carry over into their positions in life wherever they may find themselves as time goes on.

It is important to agriculture, I believe, Mr. Speaker, in this transition period, that the ties of the Ontario Veterinary College, the Ontario Agricultural College and Macdonald Institute, remain close to The Ontario Department of Agriculture. Many essential agricultural policies have been developed and are administered through the college at Guelph, or the various colleges at Guelph. A sudden break in this linkage that has been so well established, should be avoided. It must be emphasized, however, that the academic aspects of the Guelph colleges have had and will continue to have, complete freedom of expression. I am referring to those programmes carried on at the colleges involving The Ontario Department of Agriculture services to farmers and to research, as well as other academic services that have been provided. The Ontario Agricultural Research Institute, with its important co-ordinating powers, will continue as in the past.

It is important to the staff of the Guelph colleges as well, that they are not suddenly cut off from the public service until such time as agreements can be reached on matters of superannuation and of salaries and such. This has been the concern admittedly of a great many staff members at Guelph who have become staff members under certain conditions which they believed would continue and who had planned their investments, and so on, in the light of the superannuation benefits of the Ontario public service.

The agricultural committee of this House has had an opportunity from time to time to visit the Guelph colleges. I believe at this historic moment, when they are passing into a new phase of existence; that it is only right that we place on the permanent records of this province certain matters concerning their history and their accomplishments.

The Ontario Agricultural College was established in 1874, as the School of Agriculture, under The Department of Agriculture, and began teaching that year. And then in 1880, the Act of incorporation was passed on the name, changing it to Ontario Agricultural College and Experimental Farm. The Ontario Veterinary College goes back even beyond that date to 1862, when it was established as Upper Canada Veterinary School here in the city of Toronto. In 1896, the name was changed to the Ontario Veterinary College. In 1909, an Act was passed bringing the Ontario Veterinary College under The Department of Agriculture. And then in 1922 the college was transferred from Toronto to the OAC campus.

We are pleased to note that it has been considered the only English-speaking veterinary college in Canada since that time. We note with a great deal of interest—and with extreme satisfaction—that a new veterinary college is to be established in western Canada at Saskatoon and will be open to receive students, I believe, this coming year.

The Macdonald Institute was established on the OAC campus in 1903 and has been identified with the OAC until 1962, when an Act for the Federated Colleges gave the institute status as a college itself. The Ontario Agricultural College carries on a number of different courses: the undergraduate course, the diploma course in agriculture, which carried on except during the very early history and for the years 1944 to 1946, inclusive, the war years. The two-year diploma course has provided a very great training, I think, for the young people of the province of Ontario who do not wish to continue on to the VSA degree course that was established in 1888.

The affiliation with the University of Toronto took place in that year and established the first degree conferred. And then the graduate studies began in 1926 with the MSA degree programme under a joint committee arrangement with the University of Toronto.

I think it is interesting to note that the total number of graduates to date in the diploma course in agriculture from the OAC has been 3,391. In the Bachelor of Science agriculture degree there have been 4,658 graduates and from the Master of Science agriculture degree, 495. The Ontario Veterinary College began in 1862, as I mentioned earlier, a two-year course leading to the veterinary surgeon degree diploma, which continued until 1909. An optional third year was added leading to the Bachelor of Veterinary Science degree from the University of Toronto.

In 1919 entrance requirements were upgraded and changed to a four-year course leading to the Bachelor of Veterinary Science degree from the University of Toronto and in 1946 the degree changed from Bachelor of Veterinary Science to Doctor of Veterinary Medicine.

In 1949, this again changed from a four-year to a five-year course which eliminated any graduates in 1953. In 1930 Veterinary Science and Master of Veterinary Science degrees were established under a joint committee arrangement with the University of Toronto. The first Master of Veterinary Science graduated in 1957 and the first DVSc in 1958.

The total number of graduates to date in the undergraduate—that is Bachelor of Veterinary Science and Doctor of Veterinary Medicine—are 6,073. The graduates' studies and graduates in these courses amount to a total of 40.

A word about Macdonald Institute I feel is quite appropriate because here a variety of courses have been given, including manual training, nature study in the earlier days and then leading into home economics. The courses vary from three months to two years. The last diploma graduation was in 1962. A degree course in Bachelor of Household Science was initiated in 1948. There are no graduate courses at Macdonald Institute.

It is significant to note that the total number of diploma course graduates from the Macdonald Institute are somewhere in the neighbourhood of 8,000, who have attended these various types of courses.

It is very difficult to make a fair comparison with the number of agricultural diploma graduates. The degree course at Macdonald Institute has graduated 412. While most of the graduates of the Macdonald Institute have come from the province of Ontario, have originated here in Ontario, others have come from all over the world because Macdonald Institute, like the other colleges on the Guelph campus, is recognized on a world-wide basis.

Conversely, the graduates are distributed throughout the world, and I might say that at present the demand for graduates from Macdonald Institute far exceeds the number available. In fact this is true of all the three colleges. I think it lends support to the fact that we must do everything possible to increase the facilities, the educational facilities, in connection with Macdonald Institute as soon as it is possible to do so.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, a word about research and the services that have been provided at the Ontario Agricultural College and Veterinary College. These colleges have always maintained a close identity with rural Ontario. The demands for research in agricultural problems, particularly since World War II, have resulted in major adjustments in work programmes. Though Macdonald Institute is still primarily identified with teaching, 60 per cent of the operational budget of the three colleges is devoted to research and the allied services primarily directed to the welfare of the agricultural public and the agricultural industry of Ontario.

As mentioned before, the Agricultural Research Institute will continue to act as the co-ordinator of the research needs of agriculture in this province.

While we have reached a milestone in agriculture this morning by the introduction of this new bill, Mr. Speaker, under which the Ontario Agricultural College and the Ontario Veterinary College and the Macdonald Institute, are combined along with the new Wellington College to form the University of Guelph, these colleges have had from time to time students from most countries in the world. I have been advised, and I know this to be true, that wherever one goes throughout the world, one can find graduates of Guelph as it is looked upon throughout the world as the source of students and of graduates who have contributed so much to the development of agriculture on a world-wide basis.

While the Guelph college can look back with the pride of accomplishment on what has been done and the contribution that they have made to agriculture in Ontario, and to Canada, and to the world and food agriculture picture, they can look forward, indeed we can all look forward, Mr. Speaker, with even greater enthusiasm in the sense of future accomplishment to the new era of even greater influence through the establishment of the new university at Guelph.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Speaker, permit me to comment on the introduction of this bill on first reading.

I would like to assure you, sir, that the Liberal Party is delighted with the introduction of the bill and supports its principle heartily. There is no doubt, also, that you will permit me to remind the hon. members opposite that the reasons for the incorporation of this new university have been presented to them strongly in the past, not only by the present sitting hon. members on this side but by some of our good friends in the Liberal Party who are no longer present. I think, sir, particularly of the former member for Oxford, Gordon Innis, who was a graduate of this university or, at least, this institution, some years past. It is felt that the incorporation as a university will greatly benefit the growth of the institution and the rural community as a whole.

We are also pleased that both the hon. Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Agriculture have asserted once again their belief that the essential agricultural nucleus of this establishment must be preserved, for the benefit not only of the agricultural industry, but certainly in its connection with the communities throughout Ontario, but that it might also very well serve in one important area whereby the new university can expand along the lines that have already been referred to.

We think on this as a red letter day indeed, not only for the government but for all hon. members of the Legislature as we give this bill first reading. No doubt in some further discussions of it the possible way in which we hope the development of the new university might be directed might be discussed in the House, but we wish it nothing but the best on this, a red letter day.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I hope you will permit me to say a brief word in connection with this historic day too. I have just received a note from one of the hon. members of the front benches asking me if I was not regretful of the fact that I did not graduate from this great institution. I would say to him that I am somewhat regretful, but perhaps I can give him some reassurance when I tell him that I graduated from one of its sister colleges, Macdonald College in the province of Quebec, at least as far as teaching is concerned.

Indeed, in that connection, if I can add another small comment, the hon. Minister expressed a very desirable objective in that bringing the agricultural students together with other students would establish the kind of rapprochement and cross-fertilization of ideas and contacts—all of which he thought would be good. But my recollections of the battles that went on between the "aggies" at Macdonald College and others at the college does not altogether square with that hope of his. However, perhaps in the future we can do somewhat better.

The only comment I want to make at the moment, Mr. Speaker, is that I agree with the hon. Minister that we can look back with the greatest of satisfaction on the achievements of OAC in all its various forms down through the years. I look forward with even more excitement to its future, for this reason—one of the worries in the minds of people who are most deeply interested in higher education today is that our institutions of higher education should be something more than glorified secondary schools.

In other words, they should not just be teaching institutions, they should be research institutions. They should be adding to the repository of knowledge and wisdom rather than just disseminating it. One of the astounding things about OAC, as the hon. Minister has just reminded us, is that in certain of its facets 60 per cent of its activities have been in research. Now if we could have had this kind of balance of activity in all our universities, all of our universities in Canada, even our greatest, would be much greater.

Indeed, to my mind one of the most incredible facts of OAC in the past is that this kind of an institution, with all of its research capacity, in part because of its relationship with the University of Toronto, has never given courses for PhDs. I do not know how you can describe this as anything other than a tragic missed opportunity. When we visited OAC just a month or two ago, we were reminded that OAC is a Mecca for people in many fields who are PhDs, to come and study at OAC and see what they are doing. Yet this institution has not been provided with an opportunity to teach at the postgraduate level and provide PhD degrees.

Now, this is something on the opposite side of the ledger, so to speak, of OAC's relationship with the University of Toronto. In some respects that relationship has been good. But I think it has been that relationship that has inhibited postgraduate work that is so necessary in the future. As an independent institution they can now move into this field.

So I repeat, Mr. Speaker, at the moment I see nothing other than to concur with everybody in acknowledging the historic nature of this day and to look forward, with an even greater degree of excitement, to the possibilities of the future rather than the achievements of the past.

THE MOTHERS' ALLOWANCES ACT

Hon. L. P. Cecile (Minister of Public Welfare) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Mothers' Allowances Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. L. P. Cecile (Minister of Public Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the main features of the amendment are that at the present time an allowance may be paid to a mother whose husband has deserted her and has not been heard of for six months or more. This proposes to reduce this waiting period to three months.

Second, the Act provides that an allowance may be paid to a mother whose child was born out of wedlock if the mother is 18 years of age or more and if her child is at least six months of age. This amendment would permit payment of the allowance when the child has reached three months of age.

Third, the Act now permits the payment of an allowance to a mother whose husband is in prison, providing he has already served a term of six months or more. The amendment would permit a wife to apply for the allowance at any time after commencement of the term, providing the husband has a term of six months or more remaining to be served.

Fourth, at the present time, Mr. Speaker, the allowance may be continued on behalf of a child who is more than 18 years of age if he is attending a secondary school and is making satisfactory progress with his studies.

It is proposed to extend this provision to cover a child who reaches 18 years of age while in attendance at an educational institution other than a secondary school, but only until the completion of the required term of attendance at such educational institution during the year in which he attains the age of 18 years.

ONTARIO HOUSING CORPORATION

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Economics and Development) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to incorporate the Ontario Housing Corporation.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Economics and Development): Mr. Speaker, I covered this yesterday but I will review the matter again for the hon. members. It is proposed by this bill to establish the Ontario Housing Corporation, to be responsible for all housing matters within the meaning of The Housing Development Act, RSO 1960. The proposed corporation will replace the existing housing branch of The Department of Economics and Development.

The purpose of establishing the corporation is to take advantage of pending federal legislation which will give provinces greater freedom to assist municipalities in meeting their housing needs. By using more diversified methods of providing housing, and by reducing the administrative procedures involved in the development of projects, the corporation will substantially increase the supply of housing for families of modest income.

SHERIDAN PARK CORPORATION

Hon. Mr. Randall moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to incorporate the Sheridan Park Corporation.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Speaker, I would like to reiterate again what was said yesterday with reference to this bill. It is proposed by this bill to establish a non-profit corporation in accordance with the original proposal to acquire approximately 160 acres of land which lie adjacent, part on the east and part on the west, to lands already owned by the Ontario Research Foundation. The purpose is to ensure that adequate, orderly developed lands will be available at reasonable prices to attract research facilities to the centralized research complex. By establishing the corporation, the government is recognizing the paramount importance of industrial research and development as the basis for expanding industry, and therefore the province's economy. The proposed bill will permit the development of the first research complex of its kind in Canada.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart).

Now that the court has rendered a verdict on the Farris perjury charges, will the hon. Attorney General release the NONG report and indicate whether further charges will be laid?

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member, I would say that the conviction in the Farris case is subject to review by the court of appeal. I understand that an appeal is actually going forward. Other charges have been and are being considered. Under the circumstances at the moment, the report will not be released at this time.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I beg leave to present to the House and table the Ontario Research Foundation annual report for 1962.

And while I am on my feet, I would like to point out to hon. members that they have on their desks this morning the Ontario Industrial Review for 1963. I think they will find it not only interesting but most informative.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The second order, resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair and the House resolve itself into committee on ways and means.

ON THE BUDGET

Mr. E. G. Freeman (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, one of the items I want to raise during this debate concerns the facilities available to retarded children at the Lakehead. I was very pleased when the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) yesterday introduced a bill which will enable the government to provide full financial support for schools for retarded children. I look forward to seeing the details of that legislation and I can assure the hon. Minister now of my complete support. However, there is one additional factor which the government should take into consideration and it was brought to my attention just recently because of a situation which exists in my riding.

We have a school for retarded children in Fort William which will take children between the ages of five and 18. A group of volunteer workers have organized a small nursery for some of the younger children. They would like to make use of the special equipment in the school for retarded children. I gather that the principal is prepared to co-operate and that a classroom could actually be made available every school day morning, but unfortunately the principal's hands are tied because The Department of Education will not make grants available for children under the age of five. Classroom space can therefore not be made available during school hours.

But, as we know, chronological age is meaningless for these children. In fact, the younger they are the more likelihood there is that they may be helped. I want to urge the government, and particularly the hon. Minister of Education, to rescind that regulation as far as retarded children are concerned so that communities which are fortunate enough to have nursery groups can take full advantage of the special facilities offered in these schools.

Not only would this be the decent, humanitarian thing to do, it makes economic sense as well. With more training started at an earlier age, there is a better possibility of the child growing into an employable adult.

The other matter I want to raise under this same heading concerns the hospital school in Port Arthur. A new wing was added to the Port Arthur Ontario Hospital, and completed last year. Parents in that area, whose children must go to Orillia and Smiths Falls, eagerly awaited the opening of the hospital school but so far they have been disappointed.

Inquiries have brought the answer that the wing is vacant because of lack of staff and funds. There have been resignations from the Ontario Hospital in recent months and general morale appears to be poor. The Department of Health maintains that it is practically impossible to attract medical staff to the Port Arthur hospital school because they can earn more in private practice and the location appears to be undesirable. Certainly, at the moment, the department cannot make any prediction when the new wing may be opened.

Now this seems to me to be an extraordinary situation. Here we have a hospital school, the only one in northwestern Ontario and The Department of Health says it does not know when it will find the staff to open it. I do not wish to sound biased, but I find it difficult to believe that the twin cities at the Lakehead are such an undesirable location. Staff has been found for Orillia and for Smiths Falls, towns which are considerably smaller in size than the twin cities. I think it to be an insult to northwestern Ontario to suggest that competent professional people cannot be found to staff the hospital school and that they would refuse to live at the Lakehead.

If conditions at the Ontario Hospital are such that professional men and women refuse to stay, then The Department of Health should investigate the situation. In any case, I urge The Department of Health to delay no longer and get the medical and psychiatric staff which will enable it to open the hospital school, so that children from northwestern Ontario can stay in that area and closer to their parents.

Now, it would be understood, I think, Mr. Speaker, that in my remarks to this House that my remarks would be more or less confined to the area which I represent, because of the fact in the first place that we have so very many problems which should be of tremendous interest to all of the hon. members of this House from all over the province. Some of the matters which are so tremendously important to us, of course, concern that same old matter of resources and the use of resources. In connection with that very matter, we get back to the important matter of woods operation and the use of the wood resources which exist in that part of our province. And in connection with this, I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. members present this morning, certain facts which I think they may, in some cases, have already in their possession and in other cases, perhaps they are quite ignorant of, because they have not had the opportunity to be exposed to this type of thinking, due to the fact that they are so tied up with other matters in their own ridings and their own districts.

One of the things, the uncontrolled cutting of forests on a liquidation basis, has characterized almost all logging operations in Ontario for more than a hundred years. This practice began in the southern part of the province and I can well remember as a small boy in eastern Ontario, down in the Belleville-Kingston area—north of that part of Ontario—that very large operations were carried out in logging excellent lumber, shingles, spruce shingle mills, saw mills dotted all over the country, but that, I believe, does not exist to any great extent at the present time. We know that the land in that part of Ontario has been almost completely denuded of worthwhile forests. The consequences are manifest in the near extinction of such valuable species as white pine, in serious soil losses through erosion, in growing flood control and water pollution problems and in the lowering of water tables.

During the past generation, the growing timber requirements of the pulp and paper industry in the northern Ontario forest region of the province, have been depleted significantly. Our accessible black spruce stands are gone. There have been no serious attempts, sir, at silvicultural or regenerative measures, with the result that our future forests will be lower in quality than those obligatorily removed from a high proportion of our productive areas. This will add another difficulty in Canadian competition with areas such as the southern United States. It now appears that within 30 years, the pulp and paper industry will have liquidated the remaining virgin coniferous stands within economic transportation distance from existing mills. And to bear that out perhaps, with some figures, Mr. Speaker, it might be interesting to the hon. members present to quote a few figures here. In the Lakehead area alone, in northwestern Ontario, under a heading of land ownership and use, we find that there are 6.1 million acres in Crown land, most of which is licensed to timber companies.

Three hundred and fifty thousand acres is owned by timber companies; 750,000 acres is owned by private individuals, of which about 100,000 acres is actively farmed. In the area we have five pulp and paper mills, four large saw mills, one veneer mill and about 80 portable saw mills. This is where we get to a point where it should be of keen interest to the hon. members. The annual wood-using capacity of industries in our area, in spruce and balsam pulpwood, 750,000 cords; jack-pine pulpwood, 170,000 cords; spruce logs, 20,000 cords; pine logs, 60,000 cords and in hardwoods, 50,000 cords, for a total of 1,050,000 cords.

Now the actual cut in that area—and this is important, I believe—from the company limits we are taking 360,000 cords; by 300 permittees on Crown land, 30,000 cords; from patented land, 90,000 cords, for a total of 480,000 cords, which shows a serious deficiency in the amount of wood which is being harvested and the amount of wood which is required by the industries in that area. This district supplies less than half of the wood requirements of these industries. Therefore, it would seem apparent that we should make every effort to maintain and increase the forest productivity of the district. Much of the best and the most accessible forest land in this district, is relatively unproductive. This land is close to markets, to roads and to people. It is not necessarily cleared land, in fact most of it contains trees and other vegetation. Often the trees are what we call off-site species, or inferior species and this type of forest has been called "junk forest." This condition was caused by repeated cutting, by fires and by land clearing. Most of this junk forest—the most accessible, particularly—is privately owned. There is little hope or evidence that private owners will ever undertake any large-scale forestry projects. The money and the time make it almost a prohibitive measure for these people to do so. The time element in the first place would be in the neighbourhood of some 60 years and the money to these individuals is just not available.

There are possible solutions that have been studied, and groups who are interested at the Lakehead have made repeated surveys over the past years and just very recently have come up with what they think could offer a solution to this important problem, if the government sees fit to activate it and to study it thoroughly and make the best possible use of a plan which will bring a condition of greater productivity to this area.

One solution is to subsidize and encourage private forestry. No matter how well the job is done, it is doubted if the results would ever be significant in the entire area. Another method, purchase of junk forest land by government and practice of forestry: In both of the cases just mentioned, the first objective of forestry would be to change the junk forest into a productive forest by stand conversion. This is a costly job involving the destruction of the junk forest by mechanical or by chemical means or possibly by fire and the establishment of a new forest by planting trees. This job should be done on a large scale, and preferably in continuous large blocks of land because it involves the use of much heavy equipment. Jobs like aerial spraying of chemicals would also be easier and cheaper on large-scale blocks of land than on small, irregular properties.

The costs of stand conversion are estimated to be up to approximately $50 per acre. No one knows the exact area of junk forest that should or could be treated. The results of a recent parcel survey of this area have not yet been completely reviewed. Our best guess is that perhaps one half of the private land is junk forest which could receive attention. The total private land amounts to 750,000 acres—less farm land which is presently in use, approximately 100,000 acres—less land reserved for future farming which should be given consideration in this area, about 200,000 acres. The balance, for the use of forestry in this particular area alone, is 450,000 acres.

Let us assume that 200,000 acres needs stand conversion. If we treated 5,000 acres a year, the job would take 40 years. The cost per year could well be about—well, on the purchase of land, 5,000 acres is estimated at the present time at about $10 an acre, or a total of $50,000. Stand conversion, including planting 5,000 acres at the figure I previously quoted, is approximately $50 an acre, or $250,000, for a total of $300,000.

Last year a complete land use survey was made of one township in our area, O'Connor township; it was classified as to its best use, for forestry or for agriculture. Although a report on this survey has not been completed, it was possible to pick out a suitable area for a forest project. Concession No. 7 was chosen as the best place to start. This area is ideal from the point of view of forest experts who are employed by The Ontario Department of Lands and Forests. They have looked the proposition over and are in agreement that this could well be done.

The area is ideal for a stand conversion project. It is accessible, close to a population centre, and is practically abandoned as a farm area. There are about seven rural residences on this concession and only one active farm. For our purposes the farm and the rural residences could easily be by-passed. The total area involved is approximately the figure I have just mentioned—5,000 acres.

It is recommended by those who have been intensely interested in this matter that the unused portion of Concession No. 7 in O'Connor township be purchased, that all cleared land be planted with trees, and that all areas of junk forest be converted to productive forest. Direct benefits to rural residents would be in the form of employment for tree planting and other forest work. In the long run, this work would benefit the whole area and provide future employment by providing raw materials for our local industries.

This project will, I believe, if it has not already been brought to the attention of The Department of Lands and Forests, sir, be brought to the attention of that department in the very near future. I believe that the government would do well to give very close scrutiny to this matter because of the great need, in the very near future, of much more accessible forest raw material from our forests for the use of the industries in the Lakehead area.

We are getting farther and farther away from the supply of raw material from our mills. And if, as I have just found suggested in some correspondence in the last ten days to two weeks, more companies are planning upon establishing pulp mills and paper mills all over this province—in other parts of Canada but particularly in this province—then we are going to need more accessibility to the raw resources, the wood resources. We are going to have to give close attention to the matter of a complete forest regenerative programme.

We believe the government should immediately initiate policy directed toward these following objectives:

1. The production of maximum yields of high quality fibre from all accessible forest soils, both freehold and publicly owned. It is contrary to both provincial and national long-term interest to permit, in aggregate, extensive areas in an idle, unproductive condition. Ownership should not confer this right and it must be recognized that a sound forest policy will necessitate some encroachment upon property rights as currently constituted.

2. The restoration to productivity of all idle municipal and Crown lands by a large-scale reforestation programme, particularly within areas accessible to existing mills.

3. A review of present timber licences to free those limits held in excess of present and contemplated mill capacity, thereby making limits available for further development of secondary industries or the use by secondary and ancillary industries of species and log types not used by the present holders of limit licences.

4. The requirement that the holder of a timber licence must build a basic road structure without which it is impossible to implement a modern forest management plan with sustained yield cutting.

5. The government should share the cost of building such a structure on an amortized basis through financial arrangements, along the general lines which are successfully in effect in the province of British Columbia.

6. The implementation of silvicultural procedures, in conjunction with all logging operations, particularly in the northern part of the province, to maintain the productivity of areas which have been cut over as to species, quality and quantity and to reduce waste resulting from present cutting methods.

7. Large-scale clearing operations should be prohibited. The administration by the province of adequate standards of regeneration, these standards to be established in the light of varying economic and physical conditions in the different forest administration regions of Ontario and, in order to help settlers and farmers, the government should create an authority to assist the creation and operations of pulpwood marketing co-operatives so that prices for such pulpwood might be closer to the real cost of the wood and those operators get a fair price for their product.

In western Ontario at the present time, Mr. Speaker, farming definitely does not seem to be a profitable venture except in very rare cases. Many of the farms are marginal or submarginal, merely providing a home from which the men go to work in the woods, on the lakes and docks, in highway construction and other seasonal or year-round occupations.

Other activities, such as the handling or shipping of ore, are of a seasonal nature; and employment has already been affected by improvement in material handling methods. Western Oil and Gas, by pipeline, has decreased the amount of coal received and distributed.

Due to the appearance of larger lake freighters with speed for a quick turnaround, and mechanical loading and unloading, the stevedore requirements are decreasing. The opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway was a mixed blessing, for with increased traffic came foreign competition in shipping.

Investigation of the principal employment field thus will still indicate the need for some support to the economy. We do not contend that the rehabilitation of the forest lands adjacent to the lakehead will cure all the ills of the area, but it will provide a modest increase in employment and will, over a period of time, result in an improvement in the forest which will be beneficial to the small land owner, industry and the Crown, and might well form the basis for several new industries.

Rehabilitation measures would follow two general directions. In the first place, through the construction of forest access roads and through suitable arrangements with The Ontario Department of Lands and Forests, small areas of timber which cannot be operated economically by the larger units of industry should be made available to farmers and settlers in the area. This will not only ensure, to the forest-based industries, a maximum volume of work from this most economical source but would provide a guarantee of employment for those requiring a supplementary source of income in addition to their farming activities. Providing the revenue obtained from such activities warrants it, this type of operation might be expanded to the point where the establishment of forest villages might be justified.

The second direction in which the rehabilitation programme could move would be in the improvement of forest areas for future wood production. This would range all the way from the reforestation of denuded lands to the improvement of stands verging on or at maturity.

With respect to this area in our part of the country there are some other matters that I think might be of interest to the hon. members here and might be worth further study. In the area that I am suggesting, the area that we think of as northwestern Ontario, there is an area I would say of quite 2,000 square miles, where I know such a very large amount of good, excellent wood is available.

To do justifiably worthwhile work in that area with regard to forest regeneration undoubtedly would take several years, possibly up to 20 or more years.

But in order to bring this about, it seemed to the people who are most aware of the facts, behind all of this problem, there are certain things. A study would involve as a minimum requirement: A close look at and a close study of the apparent need, profitable benefits, boundaries and areas, freehold and Crown lands included, forest product allowable cut and present annual depletion, access development required, nursery facilities available and required—and at the present time these latter are extremely limited in their scope. Further there would be the site classification, estimates of expenditure—and I have just mentioned the matter of the 5,000 acres of suggested area which could be profitably exploited, and continuously so over a period of years, should we regenerate that forest region and bring the wood growth into closer accessibility to mills in the area?

Various organizations could be, or should be, interested in such a project. The federal, the provincial and the municipal governments—certainly including those of the lakehead cities.

Now, the Northwestern Ontario Development Association is intensely interested in this matter and are willing to do anything possible to further its objectives. The Northwestern Ontario Timber Operators Association have also signified their entire agreement with the problem and with the suggested projects and their willingness to go along. The Canadian Economic Council and so many other organizations would be interested.

Think, Mr. Speaker, of the values involved! With this concerted and sound planning could come about in a greater degree, in addition to the work that has been done by The Department of Lands and Forests in providing recreation areas, tremendously greater areas which could be used for the purposes of recreation along the lines which are presently going on, but expanded in that connection.

On water conservation: We have heard much in this House in the last several days with regard to water conservation, and certainly this is something that should demand our attention here and in the near future. It has been remarked, I think by the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Troy)—one of the hon. members, certainly it seems to me on this side of the House—that in the not-too-distant future water might be one of our most profitable exportable resources.

Fish and game production is another matter which I am sure is of extreme interest to the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts) and is getting his attention. We do know that in various parts of northwestern Ontario the game population is becoming depleted.

Believe me, sir, I am not talking about moose. I know that we are pretty well supplied with moose at the present time, but there are various other types of game and wildlife which have become seriously depleted. I would hope that The Department of Lands and Forests is giving proper consideration to this problem, possibly withholding the right to hunt certain species of game which at one time were present in large numbers in northwestern Ontario and are now almost impossible or very difficult to find.

Again, various other agencies are very willing to co-operate with the various government departments to bring these desirable results about.

Some weeks ago, possibly a couple of months ago, we had, as many of the hon. Cabinet Ministers will remember, a number of people from northern Ontario who had come down to make submissions to the Cabinet. I was present at the hearing as an interested listener. I believe that the group who came to Toronto, to Queen's Park, at that time, had an excellent hearing from those Cabinet Ministers who were present and that attention undoubtedly is going to be paid to some of the submissions they made and some of the resolutions they introduced at that time.

They are all actually of very real interest to us in our part of Ontario, but there is one that we have a certain area of feeling of hope, perhaps pride, in, and it is developing and could develop to the benefit of tourism and so on, and highways. It could develop into a very worthwhile idea over a period of years.

There is a certain section of Highway 17 from the Canadian lakehead to the Manitoba boundary. It has been designated by The Department of Highways as the Lake Superior route, but actually it leaves Lake Superior at Fort William and goes up into northwestern Ontario and up to the Manitoba border and on into Winnipeg. I grant you that it passes many very beautiful lakes, very lovely country—rugged, wonderful, fine country—but it is not actually the Lake Superior route. The people from northwestern Ontario, people who were here not very long ago, requested the Cabinet to consider the idea of changing the name of that route from the Lake Superior route, a designation which does not appear to properly describe this portion of the highway, particularly when it gets to the western section close to and beyond Kenora. They brought to the attention of the Cabinet at that time the fact that northwestern Ontario was becoming better known by the designation “Northwestern”. This was recently exemplified by the naming of the range of mountains southwest of Fort William as the “Nor’Westers”. It is their official name as of just a few months ago. I would ask the government to give attention to this matter, because, while it may seem of a very minor nature to many of the hon. members who are present in the House at this time, as tourism enlarges, and our means of transportation improves as time goes on—faster cars, better highways, and our gasoline taxes of course—we will gradually get further and further with our explorations. I am sure that when people from various other parts of this continent and other parts of the world visit Ontario, and our part of Ontario, that they will find that the name “Nor’Westers”, or the Nor’Wester route, would have much more appeal to them than the Lake Superior route which they have already passed over from Wawa to Port Arthur.

These things may seem small to some of the hon. members, but I believe they do have a very real value and could have a very real value in future years.

Another matter which was submitted to the Cabinet at the time of the visit of the people from northwestern Ontario was what is called, and this is very briefly gone over, the great river road. Perhaps some few of you know about this great river road. It is mostly an American project, I will grant you, because it takes in ever so much more of the United States than it presently does of Ontario or any other part of Canada.

As a matter of fact it would only enter Canada in Ontario and this brochure, “From Pines to Palms”, starts out with a very attractive picture of a Manitoba scene on one side at the top of the page and an Ontario scene on the other side. The Ontario scene, in keeping with The Department of Economics and Development, shows a very interesting picture of a bull and a cow moose standing about knee high in some northwestern Ontario water. I think it is very fitting. I am very glad they did not put a lady’s picture on there, as one of the billboards has done just recently. It would have had no appeal.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): That is the romance of the northwest, bull moose instead of ladies.

Mr. Freeman: Yes, well, we are a rugged people.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): How did you like the hippo?

Mr. Freeman: No, we do not go for that, except intellectually. The other picture down this way, shows us various scenes in Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, and so on. But this is a very interesting project, Mr. Speaker, because of the fact that it involves a total mileage of just under 6,000, as a matter of fact. It is presently in the 5,600 range of miles, but all areas which have not been completed in the United States as yet—that is thoroughly completed to the standards they wish them to be completed to—but it should be of interest to people in this House to know that this route, this great river road, enters Canada at a point just a few miles east of Kenora and it connects at Longbow Corners. It connects with a section that is wonderfully scenic, very lovely country and the roadway comes down through Fort Frances, and in the very near future I hope that the dream of the hon. member for Rainy River (Mr. Noden) will come true and that the Fort Frances-Atikokan Highway will be open to traffic. Therefore it will make it accessible to all of eastern Ontario as well.

Now, one of the bad features, one of the very serious features about this situation, is that a great number of the people will be entering Canada from the area of Kenora, Longbow Corners, and in some cases a large number of them will want to return to the United States possibly from such a point as Fort Frances and International Falls. At the present time, I am sure many of the hon. Cabinet Ministers and perhaps some of the hon. members have crossed the present bridge at Fort Frances and International Falls, and I do not think they would take—neither would the American people take—any great pride in that structure as it exists at the present time. In the foreseeable future, this great river road is going to reach the stage of completion and it is going to be required to take care of a very heavy volume of traffic, something it cannot do at the present time. In view of this fact, the Mississippi parkway project, which I just referred to as the great river road, is, as of last year, more than 74 per cent completed and in a very few years will funnel thousands of new travellers through the port of entry at Fort Frances and in the Kenora area. Tourists entering Canada, not only by way of the parkway, but from other routes in the United States are not being properly serviced, due to an inadequate bridge and customs facilities at Fort Frances.

Now we all know that planning, legislation and financing of an international bridge is an involved, and a very time-consuming process, and the people of northwestern Ontario respectfully but in a most pressuring manner, would request the government to give attention to this matter and to enlist the assistance of the federal government in the manner in which it is required to see that action is taken with regard to the erection of a new bridge at Fort Frances - International Falls, something which we will require, something which we, as Ontario residents, could take pride in, in future years, rather than to feel the degree of guilt that we would over the one that exists at the present time.

Now, a few little matters that perhaps may be of interest to the hon. Minister of Tourism and Information (Mr. Auld). I do not know whether it affects the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton) at this time too seriously or not in his department, Mr. Speaker, but we have, in several places in Ontario, border-crossing points, which are open during certain seasons of the year for a period of 24 hours but for a great length of time of the year, several times a year, they are open from a period in the morning until midnight or thereabouts. Due to the fact that at the Pigeon River crossing in northwestern Ontario, entering towards the city of Duluth in Minnesota, there is increasingly greater traffic summer, fall and winter—summer of course with tourists, fall with both tourists and hunters and in winter, as it is now coming into effect, the fact that so many of these people from that part of the United States, Wisconsin and from the state of Minnesota and many from the state of Illinois, are coming into northwestern Ontario because of its skiing opportunities—the country up there is becoming much better known, much wider known as an unusual skiing area. It has been pointed out by experts that with some work that is now going on at the Lakehead with regard to the improvement of a chairlift on the Nor'Westers, the mountains that I spoke about a moment ago, with the improvement of the chairlift to take it to the top of the Nor'Westers, we will have at the Lakehead the finest skiing area between the Laurentians and Banff and I think that opening up an opportunity such as that to skiers—and they are becoming increasingly enthusiastic and greater in number—will bring a tremendous influx of people into the Lakehead during the winter months, when hotels and motels could well use those visitors, and where the general economy would benefit considerably.

Now, there are many other matters, Mr. Speaker, that I would like to speak of with regard to our part of the country, in speaking on the Budget debate, but I know that other speakers wish to be heard from and I would in my brief remarks, ask for the consideration of the government, the various department heads and of the Ministers. Before I sit down, I would like to say to the hon. Prime Minister (M. Robarts) and to the Ministers present this morning, that I have during the short time I have been a member of this House, had occasion to approach many of the Ministers and the senior civil servants and I must say that I have been received with every courtesy and whenever anything could be done for me or the people in my area, it has been done. I trust this co-operation will continue. Thank you, sir.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to deal briefly with a matter concerning the working conditions and the rights of labour of men and women who are employed with the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority. This essentially concerns a matter that went to arbitration and as I go into a few of the details of this case, I would like to show why I feel that the decision of the board of arbitration was essentially very wrong. It is a decision that will affect all employees who work for any public corporation and also does affect the rights of not only the workers but the tenants who live in these large housing authorities. At the present time, the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority has about 2,000 units and about 4,000 tenants, and I hope in the years ahead that there is going to be a lot more, because I think that the public housing that has been begun here in Toronto and throughout Ontario is an excellent thing for our people and it should be encouraged. But at the same time, as we encourage the public housing we should make sure that they are not ghettos, that the people who live in them are not second-class citizens and also that the workers are not treated as second-class citizens.

Let us bear in mind a public authority has an opportunity to lead the way in how labour is treated, and when they do things against the best interests of labour and the best interest of their tenants, it is time that the legislative assembly of this province took note of it. I might say—and I am glad the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree) is in the House today—it is time that the human rights commission took note of how the workers are treated in some instances.

Now I refer, Mr. Speaker, to a little book called Your Job and You; it is issued by the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority to all of its employees. On page 10 there is a paragraph entitled "Application of Discipline," in which there are 14 items, most of which I cannot disagree with. There are, however, two—one of which I will not deal with in detail. One is this: "Having wages become subject to garnishee, then the employed can be fired."

I think this is a most unfortunate provision. We know that an awful lot of people today, being more or less "sucked in" in signing conditional sales contracts where they are buying appliances, find they cannot pay for them. Many speakers in this House have dealt with this subject. It is most unfortunate, when employees are at the mercy of their creditors, that they know that if they are garnisheed they are going to lose their jobs.

This is quite a common provision which many employers have, but I am sorry to see that a public authority has it. I think it should be discouraged and I hope the hon. Minister of Labour will do what he can to discourage employers who put in their provision of employment that, if employees' wages are garnisheed, they will be fired.

I will say something more about this matter of credit; I hope maybe a bit of it today. I hope it will be on a resolution which is on the order paper, because so many employees all over this province have been sucked into paying excessive rates of interest then are at the mercy of the creditors and their employers, in fear of being garnisheed.

But my main point in dealing with employees of the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority is this one, and it is in section 14. You know, that No. 14 has rather an odious smell to it, because we have heard about section 14 of Bill No. 99 and the rights of individuals. This, too, is section 14; and this is it:

An employee can be discharged for entering a housing unit without authorization, or for a purpose other than the execution of his duties.

In other words, if an employee works at Regent Park South here in Toronto he cannot call on somebody at Lawrence Heights. This can be carried to ridiculous heights. For example, he could not visit his brother, he could not visit his sister, he could not visit a friend unless he got written permission from his employer. I think this is an utterly ridiculous situation.

I could hardly conceive of any employer, let alone a public housing authority, trying to carry this situation out, to the point of being a rather fantastic condition of work. And yet it has been carried out to such an extent that it went to arbitration in December of 1963 and the arbitration board upheld, on a decision of two to one, that an employee of the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority can be discharged from his work if even on his own time, he calls on somebody he knows.

It does not make any difference. In one case here a man called on his sister-in-law. You can imagine if a man was calling on a fellow union member, or was calling on somebody from the veterans' lodge, if he was perhaps going out on the annual pledge of his church, giving out pledge cards, he would still have to ask Big Brother, the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority, if it was all right to do this. It casts an odium, not only on the employees of the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority but also on the tenants, of which there are about 4,000 of them in the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority.

Mr. Speaker, I think that this is wrong in principle. I think it should be jumped on hard now. And I certainly feel the provincial government, which has an interest in this Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority—I believe it was an order-in-council of this government which created it—should be seeing to it that this should be stopped. There may be employees of any concern; there may be tenants in any apartment, anywhere, in any apartment building, who can wander from the straight and narrow path, but why damn every tenant in Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority? Why damn every employee of that authority simply because they have a stupid and asinine rule of employment?

I want to get down to a specific actual case and give the opinions and reasons why this is held by the authority to be a good thing and why, by labour, it is held to be a bad thing. I believe, not only for labour but in principle, it is an extremely stupid and an extremely bad thing for public housing.

Some time in 1963 a man named Gordon Wisdom, who is an employee of the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority, left his work at one o'clock. He told the caretaker in charge of the building that he was leaving his employment for the afternoon; he was going down to the credit union to see about some matter there. After he had been to the credit union, instead of returning to his employment he had a drink; then, when he was driving his car up the main street, he recognized one of the lady tenants with her children and offered to give her a ride home.

The facts were quite simple: She wanted to do some shopping and he stopped off. She purchased some food, he drove her family home, and he went into the apartment—which was wrong—and had coffee. Now this is what was shown in the evidence—in fact, as it comes from the dissenting judgment of Mr. Drummond Wren, who represented the union. He said at the hearing that the authority had no charge to make against the grievor except that, after working hours, he had returned to the project with a lady tenant and her family and, on the tenant's invitation, had entered her premises where they had drunk coffee.

That is the only matter before the board of arbitration, Mr. Speaker.

However, in defence of its having discharged the grievor for that action, officials of the authority cast reflections on the morals, particularly of the mother and that family. Whether or not the authority has grounds for such reflections, no offence or attempted offence is imputed to either the grievor or the tenant. In other words, in this case, it was not a question of morals, it was just a question of this man, Wisdom, having gone into the apartment. This man, Wisdom, had been once before warned about visiting people in the apartments. He had, on one occasion, visited his sister-in-law and this was considered an offence by the Toronto housing authority.

I repeat the principle that I feel should be held in this matter of employment by the public housing authority. It is after working hours. Is it none of the business of Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority what its employees do, as long as they obey the law of the land and show up for work in the morning and do their job. It is none of the business of the executive director, Mr. Brady, or anybody else.

There is too much of this business of trying to be a Big Brother.

Years ago, Mr. Speaker, a school teacher, especially in these smaller areas, had to board at a certain home, could not wear makeup, her dress had to be down below her knees, and if anything just was not so-so, the school board interfered. I can remember hearing stories years ago that a bank employee had to lead just the proper life and be sure the manager saw him in church each morning. I do not know if the hon. member for Rainy River (Mr. Noden)—I think he started his career in Brandon years and years ago—I do not know if they made him attend church each morning or not but years ago this was the way it was done and the employees were always under the thumbs of the employers.

So here we see this being revived in the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority and I feel that if this principle is established in a system of public housing that is growing and that I hope will continue to grow, it should be stopped because it is most unfair to the employees.

Now, when a tenant moves into the public housing authority, he signs a lease and in that lease it is said that no employee can enter an apartment without the consent of the tenant, even though it says specifically in his lease that the tenant can give the consent, the housing authority comes along and says that they and they alone can give the consent for an employee to enter an apartment.

There are only at the present time, about 75 employees of the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority. They are their janitors, caretakers, groundsmen, general workers and a few employees in the office but it seems such a restriction on 4,000 people who are tenants and those people who are employees. Imagine a situation of a janitor being invited in for a cup of coffee. If he accepted he would be fired according to section 14 of the rules of Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority.

I suppose this authority might be even more shocked if the fellow had had a glass of beer instead of a cup of coffee. The authority is a sort of hangover of a puritanical age which is gone and which these people do not want to pass away. Now, on this arbitration that was heard in December, those who found in favour of the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority were Judge Eric W. Cross and a Toronto solicitor named J. W. Healy, and they gave their reasons. Mind you, they found no moral fault with this man, Wisdom; they did not criticize the fact that he maybe had had a drink in the afternoon after he left his employment, but that he was merely in the place. Why did they say that he should be watched? This is the reason that Judge Cross gives:

The authority has under its supervision some 2,000 units and approximately 4,000 occupants in five projects. Of these tenants, 450 are what the authority described as mother-led families, meaning thereby that the mothers were in residence with children and separated from their husbands and living apart from them.

Bearing in mind that the authority is a public authority it was argued on their behalf that it must be sensitive to public opinion and public relations. It was therefore of the utmost importance to the authority that the good name and reputation of its tenants and employees may be maintained.

May I interject here, Mr. Chairman—is that not kind of the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority that they are going to protect the good name of their tenants? They say that it is a ghetto that they are trying to establish. It is none of their darn business who these tenants are out with or see as long as they obey the laws of the province of Ontario and of Canada.

When it became known, that without the permission or knowledge of the authority female tenants were visited secretly by employees from time to time, the good name of its housing projects would suffer. Quite apart from the fact that the authority is a public authority, it would appear to me that any landlord has a proprietary interest in the good name of the tenants who occupy his premises and has a right to lay down rules and regulations both for his employees and tenants which will preserve this object. Such an object may well seem all the more desirable to a publicly owned project supported by taxpayers.

Well, here is one of the main principles I wish to emphasize, Mr. Speaker. The fact that it is a public authority and the fact that it should be sensitive to public opinion and public relations is all the more reason why any public authority should avoid trying to dictate how its tenants shall live. These tenants have a lease. They are bound by that lease and they must behave themselves as any other tenant in any other apartment. I do not say that they should be allowed to carry on as they please, because, again, they are bound by a contract just as in any other private apartment.

But what this housing authority is trying to do in Metropolitan Toronto is to impose its will, a puritanical law of its own, upon these people and it is infringing on the rights of the tenant and it is most certainly infringing on the rights of the people who are in its employ.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Will the hon. member tell us who were the arbitrators?

Mr. Trotter: I am reading, Mr. Speaker, from the decision, the award of the board of arbitration in a case and if the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions missed it, an employee of the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority was discharged because he visited a tenant and the union took it to arbitration and the decision was brought down in January of this year.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Who were the arbitrators?

Mr. Trotter: The arbitrators were His Honour Judge Cross—that is Eric W. Cross; Mr. J. W. Healy, QC—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Why, he was a great former Liberal Minister of Welfare—with such a philosophy?

Mr. Trotter: I am not interested in his politics. I am interested in the principle behind this, because this is a recent decision and the dissent which was written by Mr. Wren, who represented the union, was released in early March of this year. This is a very recent matter and it is something that could involve a basic principle in public housing and labour relations in general and I think it is the duty of government and The Department of Labour in particular to see to it that the influence of government is brought to bear on these housing authorities that they be most careful in respecting the rights of the tenants and in respecting the rights of labour.

I am again quoting from Judge Cross. In his decision he said this:

The union on the other hand argued very strongly that the company's rule was an unpardonable invasion of the personal liberty of their employees when off duty, and that the authority had no right to interfere with these activities. The grievor however cannot claim lack of knowledge of the company's policy because the executive director, Brady, stated that he had interviewed the grievor after his visit to a sister-in-law's apartment and referred him to the regulations that he had acknowledged in 1962.

Mr. Brady said that he had made it clear that if he entered an apartment without authorization of the manager or himself it would lead to discharge.

Here again, these men come, are employed and sign these documents; it is a job for them, it means very little to them at that time until they realize that they have had restrictions put on their liberty which I say that no employer in his common sense today puts on his employees and a public authority should have no right in commonsense or in law in putting on its employees. So I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Minister of Labour is taking this in and will bear in mind that there are many things that go on in Ontario against the rights of labour and this is one of them that should be corrected.

I just want to point out a couple of examples of judgments made in the United States on labour. I think we, in our labour negotiations, tend to follow what has been accomplished in the United States. They developed industrially, as you know, more rapidly than we did, and we have in many ways tended to copy what they have done. Mr. Drummond Wren, the union nominee on this board, quoted from a book entitled Employees Discipline by a man named Stessin. Stessin summarizes the decisions that have been reached by some of the well-known arbitrators in the United States, and on page 126 Stessin says this:

Finally arbitrators seem to agree that employers have no control over what workers do during their off hours provided it does not affect the employer-employee relations.

On page 96 in the same book, he quotes a man named Bruler, who wrote a decision re International Harvester, saying this:

The company has no jurisdiction over the private lives of its employees, and the employees are not answerable to the company for their actions in this area.

Again, here, I say from experience and from learned men who have had experience in this field, that companies have no jurisdiction over what their employees do during the off hours.

Imagine, if the hon. Ministers and their various department heads went snooping around to see what civil servants did in their off hours, what a chaotic mess it would be and how unjust it would be. The morals are no business of the employers, let that be ruled in the home and through the church.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): One of the main picture companies has another view of that.

Mr. Trotter: They can have their views. I am expressing my views on this occasion.

So long as it does not affect the work of the company or the relations of the company, again, this is their own business. I think probably in the motion picture industry you are referring to what would necessarily affect contracts. So, Mr. Speaker, this is an entirely different situation.

Finally, I say that I hope the human rights commission has looked into this situation to see to it that not only the employees are protected—and fortunately the employees have a good union that can speak up—but also the tenants who are not quite so fortunate and are in a difficult position because if they speak up things could be made most difficult for them. Usually, in fact always, they are in the lower paid category and the tenants, like so many consumers today, are unorganized. So on their behalf I also press home this point that the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority is trying to enforce an asinine regulation. It is a regulation that infringes upon the liberty and the rights of individuals, and this it has no right to do.

Mr. Speaker, I have one other item on which I shall be brief—

An hon. member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trotter: If I get that "hear, hear" from the Tory benches I might continue on, so do not urge me, I am tempted.

Mr. Speaker, on the Throne debate I had spoken on this matter of salesmen, and unjust prices charged for various items by magazine salesmen, by vacuum salesmen, by the freezer salesmen. As a result of what I had to say and what the hon. member for Yorkview (Mr. Young) said, there was quite a flurry.

I heard from a tremendous number of people who had been taken in, and also I heard also from a number of the companies involved trying to explain what a good deal they give the public.

I want to repeat, or enlarge on this a bit, for this reason. I do hope and wish that the government would bring out legislation that would license these people, that would enforce a control upon them, because they obviously fear any type of control and they obviously are trying for a short term to cover up.

There were two or three pleasant outcomes of the flurry which took place in the House over this subject. One was that some of the advertisements did not appear in the newspapers for a while. The company that sold the freezers did not see fit to put ads in the paper for a while until very recently, and then the same old thing appeared again placed by the Wholesale Food Market. That is the company that advertised something free. You just pay $16 a week and you get all this extra food—and you get a freezer. A freezer, incidentally that is worth about $200, and, depending on the contract, you end up paying $586 or $756. They are back advertising again.

I do hope, Mr. Speaker, and I say to the hon. members of this House through you that I hope that on the estimates, on the Throne debate, or the Budget debate, whenever they can, if they have a case they get up and they name names. It is the only way, until the government does something, that we can shut them up and cut them off.

I have been disappointed in the Better Business Bureau. In this matter it has been very weak. I once checked with them myself to see what they would say, and had other people check and other people have volunteered information of the answers they get from the Better Business Bureau. I think it is time the Better Business Bureau brought up its standards.

For example, when I mentioned a couple of incidents of the magazine salesmen they said, oh, they had tried to clean that up. Mind you that was the result of what went on in the Legislature here about a year ago.

Oh, they had tried to clean that up! Well it is not as rampant as it was, but people are still getting sucked in buying things they should not be buying and they really do not want until they have found out what they have bought.

What I cannot understand is there were complaints made to the Better Business Bureau about the Wholesale Food Market. The Wholesale Food Market used to put an ad in the paper saying, "we are not in the freezer business," and they would have a picture of a freezer—and that was an obvious lie, that they were not in the freezer business—and after complaints the bureau persuaded the Wholesale Food Market to withdraw that ad. But if you phone the Better Business Bureau today, as some people have, they say this outfit is all right. This outfit sells freezers that are worth $200 for somewhere well over $500 and well over $700, and the Better Business Bureau seems to think that that is good business.

Well, that is no protection for the public. I am amazed that the Better Business Bureau is so weak on this. Again I say I wish they would bring up their standards of what they consider better business.

In fairness, there is in Ontario a group known as the Canadian Central Registry which registers salesmen or anybody who wishes to be registered and keeps up a certain code of ethics. I do not doubt for a minute that they in many respects do a good job. They have approached me because they claim I am hurting the magazine-selling business by some of the remarks I have made.

I must admit that they make a real effort, but at the same time they still are not protecting the public. They may be helping some, they are trying to govern their trade, but they in law cannot force people to join. Even so, even if they have a member whom they have registered and who they find has done wrong and they strike him off the register, the damage is still done to the individual who has been sucked in.

The only answer on this—there are really two answers: One, we give as wide publicity as we can to these people who prey upon the innocent; second—and there is some talk that this is going to happen—the government must take cognizance of the fact that the people of the province are being rooked and see to it that legislation is brought in in order to protect the people to some extent. You are not going to protect the public completely, I do not believe you can possibly do it, but I think you can go a long way towards protecting the people from this business of getting usually the lower-paid worker rooked on account of that.

To give you an example: If a family had $1,500 in debts to finance companies, and this is not uncommon, it is going to cost $30 per month for the interest charges, and the Dominion Bureau of Statistics tells us that one-fifth of the families in Canada with three children under 16 are making between $2,000 and $3,500 a year, and that includes family allowances; people with four children or more—over 25 per cent of them are making just between $2,000 and $3,500 a year. Now, it has been my experience on the countless contracts that I have seen as a result of people phoning me, that it is almost always the lower-paid person, the person who thinks he is getting a bargain. They could never afford a freezer normally and here is a bargain if they get it free and they get all this food. So this goes on and on, and again I say to the hon. members of this House and through them to the public that the public should be aware of the fact that they just should not touch this stuff, because even if you phone the Better Business Bureau you will get a bad steer. It is a pity that the people today seem to be the victims of a serious situation.

Finally, one of the worst offenders in this—mind you, I have met groups like the Wholesale Food Market, and the Compact Vacuum Cleaner people—and this type of company, they start this stuff, but the people who are just as bad if not worse, are the finance companies, because I am quite convinced that they are quietly in alliance with these people. It is so obvious when you see the contracts, when you see the names of the finance companies, you practically know that with the Wholesale Food Market people the Frontier Finance Company is mixed up, and you can see that with Compact the Laurentide Finance Company is mixed up. It is almost inevitable that these particular companies are in alliance, and I hope that the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) gives us an opportunity to discuss a resolution I have on this paper where I will go into more detail of what this financing costs, because almost always—not always, but almost always—these people who sign these conditional sales do not know what they are signing and they sign them in blank, the final figure is never discussed, and then they are filled in.

It is awfully hard to prove in the courts but I believe these people when they tell me this because they come from all over and their stories are so consistent, and of course, as it happened to me recently, when I make a speech in the Legislature, these companies like the Wholesale Food Market phone me and say, "Anybody who has signed a contract and does not like it—we will be glad to help the people out because we do not want to sell anything that the people do not want." Occasionally if you get it quick enough you can stop it, but you see there is one trick: "We would be glad to settle with these people, we feel sorry for them, but you see we have sold our promissory note and conditional sales to the finance company, and the finance company is insisting that the contract be carried out. We cannot do a thing about it."

Well, of course, I really do not believe them when they tell me that, because I am quite convinced that the finance companies and these sharp operators are in alliance, and it is only when we not only hit these salesmen but hit the finance companies that we are going to put an end to this rooking, this consistent rooking of the public, that is going on. I notice even in one quote here I had from a Toronto newspaper that—it is Mr. Marvin who is being quoted, he is the man who runs the Compact Vacuum Cleaner Agency, he says if his office gets a legitimate request to cancel a contract before he has turned the deal over to the finance company it will do so. But then, of course, he goes on, if it is turned over to the finance company they cannot do anything about it. Well, I have been through a number of these and I am quite convinced that as soon as they get that contract signed it is immediately turned over to the finance company. That is one more reason why we need a cooling off period where these people who have signed these contracts have three or four days, I believe as the legislation is in Great Britain, to cancel their contract, and this is one way we can give some type of protection.

In the long run it has to be that the law needs to be changed and we need to publicize these people. It is in the interests of legitimate business to see to it that these people who make a mockery of the words "free enterprise" are put out of business because they are not fit to be carrying on in the fashion as they have been doing, and I certainly hope the government will lend its efforts in that respect.

Finally, one thing that is most unfortunate is that some of the major newspapers know this is going on. I have mentioned this before, that their advertising people should be more careful. Since this has received publicity I notice now that the only one that is printing seems to be the Toronto Star, but surely they in their policy, in the advertising policy, should see to it that ads such as this should no longer appear. This is the one where the people get a $200 freezer for $500 plus. This ad is now back in the Daily Star and it is most unfortunate. I wish these newspapers would take note of it because some of the papers have done a marvellous job.

One particular group in the Toronto Telegram is a fact-finding squad; over a period of time they have done a marvellous job in giving it publicity, and so have the Star and the Globe, but they allow these ads to be in when they should know, if they do not know, that they are misleading the public, and with that I close with a plea to the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) that he give this some thought. I understand that the former Attorney General (Mr. Cass) was going to bring out legislation. What we need is a consumers' bill of rights. The government has been pretty slow on this, because we have made numerous speeches in regard to this subject, but the present situation is hurting legitimate business, and in fact it is hurting the low income earner very, very much, and it is our responsibility to protect him.

Mr. O. F. Villeneuve (Glengarry): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this Budget debate, I first of all want to add my belated congratulations to you publicly for the very efficient manner in which you preside over this House. When I first came here in 1948—I see now there are several changes, and I am considered somewhat of a veteran. I believe the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Oliver), the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Edwards) and the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Downer) preceded me here and then I came along with you, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Gordon), the hon. Minister of Public Welfare (Mr. Cecile) and one or two more, I think the hon. member for Hastings West (Mr. Sandercock).

However, in going back over the figures as far as government estimates and expenditures, I do find in the last 20 years a very pronounced change has taken place. In particular, education 20 years ago had a total budget of a little over $16 million and this year will be in the neighbourhood of $420 million, a 2,600 per cent rise in a period of 20 years. So one can readily see the responsibilities of government are becoming more burdensome, every level of government is looking for finance and naturally the people being taxed resent being loaded with taxes.

However, I have listened to many fine contributions in the way of speeches. Every hon. member, irrespective of what group he represents, tries to present the problems that confront him. I am no different from anyone else but representing a rural riding, I must speak out for agriculture and in the time allotted to me, Mr. Speaker, I will try to keep my remarks to that subject as much as possible.

The importance of agriculture in the economy has been constantly and consistently recognized by the Ontario government. And the importance of The Department of Agriculture in provincial affairs has been stressed over the years, not only by the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario (Mr. Robarts) today but also by his predecessors in office. Agriculture in this province has always received a dominant place because the importance of farming and food production to the welfare of our people cannot be overemphasized.

As the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart) stressed in this House as recently as last month, in introducing the estimates of his department, agriculture has made possible the industrialization of this province because, as history has shown, no country in the world has moved to an industrial footing without first having achieved a sound agricultural economy. And as the hon. Minister went on to say, agriculture continues to sustain the well-being of Ontario, and a healthy agricultural and food industry will continue to lead this province into new accomplishments and into a new era of development.

We in this province, as a government, have been constantly aware of the needs of agriculture, the needs of farmers, the needs of those depending on farm products for the growth of the great food industry, and the needs of the whole economy in which agriculture plays such a large part. Because of the stress placed on a strong agricultural industry, the people of Ontario have enjoyed and are continuing to enjoy a plentiful supply of good food at reasonable prices.

To my urban friends, may I remind you, in spite of what you hear about subsidies being paid to agriculture, the facts are the government of Canada last year spent $172 million in total aid of agriculture for all of Canada. The tobacco growers of Ontario alone contributed $400 million to the federal Treasury in taxes. There are 200,000 less occupied farms in Canada today than there were 20 years ago, yet those fewer people have increased productivity by 54 per cent.

Agriculture is unlike the life it used to be. It is now a business and requires capital to operate. Today it involves not just tilling, sowing and reaping, but chemistry, physics, genetics, economics and mathematics. Too many urban Canadians think farming is for the strong in the back and the weak in the mind. It is not a job for misfits.

In the last ten years, according to statistics, food costs to the consumer have risen 19 per cent. Rent, in comparison, has risen 32 per cent and medical care by 63 per cent. But the farmer's income share is shrinking. For each dollar you spend on beef, he gets 57 cents; on milk he gets 53 cents; on bread, 11.5 cents. The rest goes for transportation, packaging, processing, wholesaling and retailing.

The average net income per farm throughout Canada is only $2,150, according to 1961 statistics. Oftentimes the remark has been passed that farmers pay little or no income tax, but the answers are very clearly seen if one will go into a study of the figures of revenue.

In Glengarry county—I am sorry to say this but it is factual—56 per cent of the farms had less than $4,000 gross income and 70 per cent had a gross income of less than $5,000. The first question which will be asked by many is: Why do they stay there?

Admittedly, we are confronted with a situation where so few, less than seven per cent, of our dairy milk producers have an urban centre to ship milk to. Those who are fortunate enough to find a market which has existed within their family for 60 years or more, into the city of Montreal, are in that category; the rest have to find an outlet in the manufactured end of milk products, which is the condensory, or cheese, and which pays in the neighbourhood of $3 a hundred pounds to the producers of milk.

We are not as fortunate as to be surrounded with a large urban centre within the confines of our own province; and, as you know, Quebec today is producing more milk than it can consume, and how long those seven per cent or so will enjoy the benefits of the Montreal market no one knows. Strained relations and this feeling, which persists in Quebec, of patronizing their own and not wanting to do business with the outside world—I am sure the intelligent people do not feel that way but nevertheless it is in existence.

Since the net income is not more than two-fifths of the gross, over half and perhaps two-thirds of the farm families in my county are not earning a decent living and the facts bear this out. According to statistics, about 25 per cent of the farmers in Canada account for 75 per cent of the total agricultural production. But there has been in recent years in Ottawa, particularly since the last election in 1963, a drifting away from the traditional concern of Canada for a strong and healthy agricultural industry.

Agriculture remains the largest primary industry in Ontario, as it does throughout the rest of Canada. There has been a minimizing and declining attitude toward the importance of agriculture in our national affairs by the present federal government, and throughout all of this country today there is a growing alarm that agriculture is being downgraded in the national political scene.

I need only say that the federal policy in respect of agriculture lacks much basic honesty, imagination and leadership in regard to the farm problems of the present day. I think it is sufficient to say that, since the Liberal Party has been elected to office in Ottawa, there has not been one piece of important farm legislation introduced for the consideration of Parliament. The Family Herald, Canada's leading national farm paper, quotes the following:

Were it not for the wheat deal, the Liberal Party's agricultural performance in government would have been a disaster.

An hon. member: But what a wheat deal!

Mr. Villeneuve: The government before had sold it for them, to start with.

The province of Ontario's concern over national farm development policies, such as credit and rural development—and one must speak out in protest against the sham which the federal Liberal Party has made of the great and vital agricultural industry of this country. The hon. gentleman from Grey South (Mr. Oliver) knows conditions are not good on farms. He knows it. The hon. Harry Hayes, Minister of Agriculture, is relegated to the lower echelon of importance in the Pearson Cabinet.

The spectacle of confusion in agriculture in our national policies, with very long-term serious consequences for Ontario, can no longer be ignored, because I would say, Mr. Speaker, without any hesitation, if there is not a change in trend, and this is the responsibility of all governments, 50 per cent of the farmers who are farming today in the outlying rural areas who have not an urban market for their milk or other produce, will not be there within ten years from now.

We, in Ontario, are developing concern for the weakening structure of national agricultural policies. In these days of federal-provincial conferences, Ontario cannot sit by when agriculture is relegated to the back seat of national government. One needs to look only at recent events to be concerned over decisions to take important agricultural programmes and transfer them to non-agricultural departments in which the concern of federal officials over the farm problems, either does not exist or is limited at best. The Canadian government spent on agriculture less than three per cent of the national budget, while in the United States, the agricultural budget amounts to seven per cent. In Holland, Denmark, France, England, West Germany, Norway and Sweden, it is eight per cent of the national budget.

Yes, I will admit, to my hon. friend that this government has ignored agriculture to some extent, as far as finances go, because in accordance to our expenditures back in 1948, we in comparison, interested in agriculture, have not received the amount of the Budget I believe it is necessary to receive in order to help this industry. The technological revolution has brought with it the need for larger increased capitalized farms. By 1961, the average farm holding in farm capital, had risen 328 per cent since 1946. The farm family is probably asked to accept more risk for less pay than any other segment of our economy.

Now, the dairy industry is the most essential form of farm income in eastern Ontario. We are favourably located near a heavy concentrated population of the United States and our surplus of dairy cattle sold in the United States, represents a cash crop income. That has been maintained for a period of some 30 years and is perhaps the most responsible for the sustenance of the dairy farmer of that area.

Eighty per cent of the milk produced from Prince Edward county eastward to the Quebec border is sold to the manufacturer trade through condensories, creameries and cheese-manufacturing plants. Dairy products provide over 20 per cent of the farm cash income of Ontario. Automation and mechanization costs in farm operations necessitate more research in agriculture and I am pleased to hear the hon. Prime Minister of this province make the statement of what he intends to do, or this government is going to do in the expansion of the Agricultural College.

That institution is recognized as one of the finest on the North American continent and if we are to get answers to agricultural problems, research must be the essential responsibility of the government to give us the facilities to get the answers. And I am more than pleased, Mr. Speaker, that this announcement has been made today and that that has taken place.

We must face up to it and provide leadership and guidance to avoid having any particular section of this industry destroyed. A healthy farm economy is a tonic to every industry, to every branch of commerce. The dairy farmer is part of an important basic industry in this country, we must maintain a proper balance in our economy and to do what is within our power to assure our dairy farmers of a fair compensation for their labour—and at the same time to maintain a continuously reasonably priced food supply to the consumer.

The Babcock test system now presently in force for milk testing has been one of grievous concern for many years and any system that permits the plant operator to base the amount paid for milk on a test taken at the plant, by or on behalf of the plant operator, will always be open to suspicion. The relationship of solid and fat in milk content should receive further study in accordance to the returns it could increase to the producers, on a quality basis.

If we are to take an overall account of the dairy industry we must take action to resolve it by diverting milk supplies to the channels of the domestic market, where it will have the greatest consumption and an opportunity to be sold as an export product. Today, there is almost complete recognition that the four dairy groups cannot operate separately, that one overall marketing plan and board is needed in each province if the dairy industry is going to once again get back on a stable footing.

Agriculture has a need for fewer and stronger organizations, in my estimation. The provincial government has jurisdiction over the marketing of milk. Large dairies should be restricted so as not to be allowed to exploit the milk producers by manipulating surplus milk supplies to their own advantage.

Placing milk in schools for the daily food diet consumption of children is one means where the Canadian population could be better served.

Actually, there are many families living in urban centres, particularly in our smaller income class population, where children do not receive the amount of milk they should to maintain a healthy body. Science has not, as yet, discovered a product which is richer than milk in calcium, so essential in the building of strong, healthy bodies. Educating the children to partake of nutritious food when they are young is a form of an educational programme which will certainly influence their eating habits all through their lives.

A land use survey has just been completed in eastern Ontario and we are now in a position to apply the ARDA programme, in its full meaning in this province, with federal government co-operation assistance to help the rural areas, where poverty and low farm income has existed for far too long—a policy which will restore confidence in people willing to work to help themselves.

Mr. Speaker, I will move the adjournment of the debate and continue later.

Mr. Villeneuve moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Monday we will proceed with the estimates of The Department of Economics and Development. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Is there a night sitting on Monday?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: No. Night sittings are on Tuesday and Thursday.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 1.00 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

MONDAY, APRIL 27, 1964

The House met at 3 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park), in the absence of Mr. A. W. Downer (Dufferin-Simcoe), presented the second report of the standing committee on education, health and welfare, which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bills without amendment:

Bill No. 85, An Act to amend The Department of Education Act.

Bill No. 86, An Act to repeal The Residential and Farm School Tax Assistance Grants Act, 1960-61.

Bill No. 88, An Act to amend The Secondary Schools and Boards of Education Act.

Bill No. 90, An Act to amend The Public Schools Act.

Your committee begs to report the following bills with certain amendments:

Bill No. 87, An Act to amend The Separate Schools Act.

Bill No. 89, An Act to amend The Schools Administration Act.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Hon. G. C. Wardrobe (Minister of Mines): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word about an editorial which appeared today in the Toronto Globe and Mail, entitled: "Troubles of the North". It mentioned that mining towns of northern Ontario have a difficult and unstable existence. I quote:

To compensate them for this, the mining municipalities get part of the profits tax levied on mining by the Ontario government. This tax returns an average of $90 million a year to Queen's Park, which returns an average of $26 million to the mining municipalities, the amount paid to each being determined by the number of miners living in it. The mining municipalities want this raised to about $50 million, and their case is well founded.

As far as the Ontario government is concerned, the Ontario mining tax has amounted to a maximum of approximately $18 million a year when the uranium mines were in full production. Last year, it was approximately $10 million, of which the mining municipalities received about $6 million a year.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, on a question of privilege, I want to correct a misstatement, to put it mildly, in last Saturday's Toronto Daily Star. I will read the offending paragraph, Mr. Speaker, and then make a comment on it:

During the debate on the so-called police state bill, the Liberals and the New Democrats expressed support for limited use of wire-tapping by police and the new Attorney General is resisting this pressure.

May I just say, Mr. Speaker, that anyone who was in the House will know that the Liberals—none of us on this side in this official Opposition—said we were in favour of wire-tapping, either limited or otherwise. How the Toronto Daily Star was able to concoct this story, I will never know. But I want it to be known quite definitely, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Liberal Party, that we made no such statement and took no such stand at any time.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): The hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer) was supporting Robert Kennedy who supports it.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. Provincial Secretary has anything to say, let him stand up and say it.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to announce that at the committee on agriculture meeting, which is called for ten o'clock on Wednesday next in committee room number two, the Stinson report on the tobacco inquiry committee will be discussed.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I submitted a question last week but the Minister was away, and I was away when he was here; since he is here now may I ask the question?

It is to the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett), to whom the Ontario Northland Railway Commission reports. The question is: Has the commission taken steps to give added service to northeastern Ontario by including trains No. 41 and No. 44 in its operations after April 26, 1964?

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. I might say I am sorry I was not in the House last Thursday but, as was said, I was here Friday and he was away at that time.

I am not too sure whether I am clear on his question. He asked: has the commission taken steps to give added service to northeastern Ontario by including trains 41 and 44 in its operation? I think the hon. member knows that 41 and 44 are Canadian National trains. They originate and terminate at North Bay, and I understand they will be running seven days a week. If that is the question, that is as far as I can answer it.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Speaker, may I explain? Trains 46 and 47 were also CNR trains; they operated from Toronto right through to Timmins. The last run of 47 was, I believe, on Friday night, and 46 on Saturday night. There is going to be only one passenger service operating from Toronto to Timmins as of yesterday—train 49 going north and train 50 coming south. Those are the only two passenger trains which will be operating; 46 and 47 are off the boards. I believe there is another number of train, but it is that fast express and freight, so actually there will now be only one passenger service operating from North Bay to Timmins, and Timmins to North Bay.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Speaker, now that I understand the hon. member's question, we are putting in a bus service to meet 41 and 44 coming from the north so that they can get into Toronto the same day and meeting them at North Bay going north, in order to speed up the service. I think we have explained that several times in committee and in the House. I do not think it needs any more clarification than that. This is a new bus service so people can leave the north and get this train and be in Toronto the same day; the same applies going back to the north.

Mr. Troy: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the hon. Minister think that service will be sufficient to handle the traffic? I notice there are toilets on the bus, too.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Speaker, I have indicated several times before that if we find this service is not adequate, our hands are not tied; we can put on more passenger trains to meet this train provided we find a necessity for those trains.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: Twenty-fourth order, House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Chairman: On vote 402:

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, may I ask of the hon. Minister of Economics and Development the cost of the preparation of the report concerning the Windsor economic conditions?

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Economics and Development): The cost is approximately $12,000, primarily, for the consultants who did the study.

Mr. Newman: Were the various individuals on the committee paid at all? I am referring to the members representing the union and those representing management.

Hon. Mr. Randall: There was nothing paid to the members of the committee, just to the consultants.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister a question in regard to that study done in the Windsor area? He will recall that a considerable amount of badgering went on for a fair amount of time before the government was persuaded to make this study. Can he give me any specific actions which have flowed from the study now that it has been completed? I mean, what can the hon. Minister advance as a substantial result from that effort?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I think, to be fair to the study, it was completed, as you know, early this year. We have not had time to make any definite recommendations as to what should be done. The prime recommendation was that there should be an amalgamation of municipalities. I might say we have heard from a number of municipalities which are not in favour of that; that matter is now being discussed with the city of Windsor and the surrounding municipalities.

In the meantime, working conditions in Windsor have never been better. Whether the study has put the finger on some things which were not happening but which people imagined were happening, I do not know; but I would think that the study will, very definitely in the next six months or so, indicate to the people in Windsor and perhaps to the government that some steps should be taken to assist Windsor in becoming highly commercialized—such as it was previously. I might say, also, that there are a number of new industries going into Windsor, and have been going in in the last year.

I would think that the clarification of that economic report is such that if there was any doubt on the part of industry about getting good treatment from labour and from the city officials, that has been removed. I think that the Windsor Economic Council has cleared the air on some doubts people had about opening up a plant in Windsor. I would also like to say that, in view of the good fortune the federal government have been able to bring about through the export of automobile parts, in my estimation Windsor stands in a better position to take advantage of that export of automobile parts than any other city in Canada.

Mr. MacDonald: Was the result chiefly a psychological result, from which has flown action on the part of the individuals within the communities themselves?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I think you are right.

Mr. Newman: One of the recommendations was that special consideration be given to the location of government and institutional facilities in the general area. We are very fortunate today that the automotive swing has gone the other way and employment conditions are better than they have been for a long time. They are not as good as we would like to see because we still carry approximately 5,500 people in the unemployed category. A lot of this unemployment, or some of it, could probably be eliminated by the establishment of governmental and institutional facilities. What is the hon. Minister's opinion concerning such facilities and their effect upon the economy of an area?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Well, I am not an authority on that. I think it is out of my jurisdiction to recommend where any of these facilities should go. A set of those same recommendations has been made to Ottawa, with reference to Blind River and Cornwall for federal institutions. I would think that all governments will be aware of what they can do to assist the municipality, if they were going to build such institutions, and to put them where they could serve a community perhaps better than they could here in the centre of the province. I would think that what you have to suggest was in the minds of most people who are preparing or setting up government departments of any stature whatsoever. They will go to those areas.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, the federal government has instituted tax incentives, depreciation allowances, home purchase subsidies, and auto parts incentive programmes to relieve this type of situation. What is the provincial government prepared to do in case the pendulum swings the other way and the economic conditions become unfavourable?

Hon. Mr. Randall: That is a $64 question. All I would like to suggest to you is that the province has gone as far as I think it should go with the federal government in meeting some of these recommendations. We have met the federal government on a number of its concessions. Some, of course, do not lend themselves to the province taking participation in these areas, but I would think with our liaison with Ottawa, we will watch those allowances or concessions very closely. I do not think at the present time we need to start planning for greater concessions when the economy is growing the way it is now—if we are not complacent about our present position and I certainly do not think we are complacent in this province.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, does the hon. Minister believe that the federal programme as instituted has some merit—the idea of giving incentives to an area that does not have the same rate of growth as other areas?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I think it has some merit. On the other hand, I think it has some pitfalls. A company can be, let us say, enticed into an area and then once those concessions are removed after a period of three or five years, it could find itself operating in a very uneconomical area. That is the position we should watch very carefully, to make sure we do not coax the industry into an area and then find after these concessions are removed that it is not economical to operate there, that skilled labour is not available, as well as many of the other things that industry needs to be competitive.

Mr. Newman: But the hon. Minister does approve certain types of incentives to enhance the growth of a community, does he?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I would say so, yes.

Mr. Newman: I would like to bring to the hon. Minister's attention an editorial in the Windsor Daily Star of April 25. I would strongly recommend that he familiarize himself with it, because it is most critical of the attitude the hon. Minister has taken in his original comments on Thursday. Rather than read the article, I will simply suggest to the hon. Minister that he familiarize himself with it. It is self-explanatory and if he reads it maybe his attitude toward incentives may change.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Thank you. I have not seen the article. I will be glad to get it.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Chairman, I may be remiss in this question, because I did leave a little early Thursday night. I am not sure whether it was specifically asked of the hon. Minister. Hansard is not yet available.

You have under vote 402 the automation foundation on employment. In the text of your opening remarks there was no specific explanation of the interrelationship between this and the federal survey, which is presently under study, or any explanation of the interrelationship between this and the study of John Deutsch which he announced last week. I wonder how they fit together?

Hon. Mr. Randall: When you were out of the House the other night the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts) made quite a lengthy statement on it. The federal-provincial study is now on, with reference to setting up the automation foundation. I think you will find a full explanation in your Hansard.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 402 agreed to.

Vote 403 agreed to.

Vote 404 agreed to.

On vote 405:

Hon. Mr. Randall: Vote 405 we are going to leave to the end and take before vote 411.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): You are going to take housing at the end, then?

Hon. Mr. Randall: We are going to take housing at the end. We asked for that the other night.

On vote 406:

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, with regard to vote 406, I wonder if the hon. Minister might make some further explanations as to what the future course of the Ontario Development Agency is. I am curious to read now that it is admitted that in the first year there were some $300,000 in losses. The government's argument is that it recognized from the outset that these were marginal industries and that this was a gamble that was worthwhile. The hon. Minister also laid heavy stress on the fact that one of the main contributions of this agency was on the level of what might be called more effective management—management know-how.

If I may go back and just cite the case—it is the only case with details available, if we appear to be threshing old straw—of Fairfield in Owen Sound. Clearly this was one in which the government interceded in the belief that the main requirement was greater management efficiency. In fact, when I pursued this issue in some depth a year or so ago, and pointed out that the company in question had gone bankrupt in Preston, had moved down to Jamaica; had gone through two or three stages of management there, ultimately had been put in the hands of some management consultant firm, and then was brought back to Owen Sound, as I understood the government's explanation, it had cleaned out the corporate shell and had put in new management. Indeed, when I pressed the then Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Macaulay) rather strongly on this point, he at one place, as Hansard for last year will indicate, said that we were to have nothing to do with it until the elder Fairfield was out of the picture altogether and the company established a management group that included some representatives from the city of Owen Sound.

Now, unfortunately, we do not have the irrepressible spokesman for Owen Sound with us this afternoon. That may be good, or it may be bad, I do not know which. But the thing that puzzles me is that when the government moved to meet the obvious need for more efficient management in this company, and apparently convinced itself that it had taken the necessary action to make this a reliable economic concern, results within less than a year proved it was wrong.

Taking this as the one case history that is before us, what went wrong? Was this company wrong in its whole effort of attempting to manufacture, as its tradition has been, from partly waste materials and partly new materials? Was this the main difficulty in efforts to make it an economic, viable unit, or did it once again end up with inefficient management? If so, how do you explain this when it had the industrial commissioner and two or three of the top industrial people of Owen Sound on the management committee?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Chairman, I think the question being asked by the hon. member—is it about the Fairfield Company or the ODA in general?

Mr. MacDonald: The ODA in general, but Fairfield is the only one for which we have been given any sort of detailed picture. I am taking it as an example of the general explanation the hon. Minister gave us of ODA.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Well then, to go back and review the reason for taking on ODA, it was the first loan made by ODA when the agency was first set up. We did not have the advisory board that we had throughout the year after ODA was set up. As you know now, we have a new advisory board consisting of seven men instead of 15—very well qualified people.

Going back to Fairfield's story, I agree with the hon. member the gentleman had two failures prior to coming to ODA. Recommendations were made by the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Sargent), who was mayor of Owen Sound, and the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher). In all honesty they felt they were doing the city of Owen Sound a service, and I think in looking over the correspondence that they were. They were entirely sincere in asking the government to move in and help this small industry. The town had 12 per cent of its labour force unemployed. The townspeople themselves agreed to put up $15,000 of their own money and I do not think you can write people off if they are willing to put their own money into it.

The recommendation of the agency was that the company should get itself a better manager than Mr. Fairfield. That was not taken care of until perhaps around May after it had gone through its first allotment of money. Then the agency insisted that things were not improving, in fact were getting much worse, and that the company should replace Mr. Fairfield. That, I think, without looking up the dates, is when Mr. Ivor Wagner, the industrial commissioner and a very qualified man apparently, took over the management of the company. The company also asked us to send up a technical adviser, which we did. It looked at that time that it could weather the storm. And then Mr. Fairfield, in the capacity of a salesman apparently, went out and took an order from the federal government for socks that he was selling for less than cost. Under those circumstances, the company just could not survive.

We do not think that can happen again, although we would certainly not want to make any bets on it, because actually what we are doing is betting on the integrity of people. If they live up to the agreement that they say they will live up to, we now have the machinery to make sure that they do, whereas with the first loan that we made to Fairfield, we did not have that machinery. The other two cases were almost in a similar category. We did not have the machinery to follow up the ODA programme such as we should have when the agency was first set up.

I would think that from Fairfield we have learned a very valuable lesson. I could read a report of almost three pages of what came out of the Fairfield case, but I would like hon. members to keep in mind that while $135,000 was lost in Fairfield, almost $100,000 was paid out in wages to the people of Owen Sound. Many of these people, according to the hon. member for Grey North, were on relief. So all was not lost. I have some figures here pointing out what was gained in taxes, not only by the municipality but also by the province. We are not in the business of trying to take care of the tax collector in a roundabout way but I think some of the criticism of Owen Sound is not justified under the circumstances. I would say that in the future we will certainly make sure before loans are advanced that the management meets the conditions of the agency's agreement, which was never met up in Owen Sound—it was too late.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, if we are dealing with Fairfield alone for a moment, Mr. Chairman, before the hon. Minister gets to the general position of ODA, I must say I appreciate his explanation but there are just two points in it that provoke comment. One, he states that Mr. Fairfield was left in the picture until May. I have a little difficulty in making this add up with the comment of his predecessor in the House, because it was in March, or at the latest, early April when we pressed this point. The Minister, sir, said he would have nothing to do until Mr. Fairfield was out of the picture altogether. Now maybe the hon. Minister's explanation is that he was out of the management but he was out on the road selling. Is this it?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I think, backing up Mr. Macaulay's statement, Mr. Fairfield was taken out of the position of director but then the directors made him the general manager of the operation. I think that is where the difficulty occurred.

Mr. MacDonald: It sounds like a senatorial appointment.

However, let me make one other comment on this. Let me go back to the hon. Minister's phrase. He said: "We bank on the integrity of people and if we find we have misjudged then we have learned our lesson." The fact of the matter is that when a little investigating was done at the Ottawa level to discover exactly what the economic relationships of this company were with the federal government, or to put it more accurately, what its contracts were with the federal government, it was found that the company had requested it should be permitted to be freed from the contract that it had been granted. The reason it wanted to be freed was, so they said, because it had so much other profitable business that it could turn to.

Now clearly, in light of what has happened since, this was unwittingly or otherwise, a very serious misrepresentation of the situation. Indeed, I think, Mr. Chairman, misrepresentation went one step further back. The federal contracts called for 100 per cent new material going into the socks that the company was going to make. Fairfield has always operated on the basis of putting in a lot of old material, reworked material, and apparently what happened—though there was some interesting verbal footwork to try to keep this covered up—was that it accepted the contract, ignored the fact that new material was required—it was going to be making socks in its traditional fashion, partly made of old material—and the federal government stepped in. It was not freed of the contract, it had the contract cancelled. So the whole reputation and dealings of this company are such as to make us a little fearful as to how careful was the government's examination.

The hon. Minister explains the government did not have an advisory committee at that stage and implicit in his remarks is that the Fairfield case slipped through because it did not have an advisory committee. If that be the case, I just hope that its advisory committee is a little bit sharper in the future because it had plenty of warning about Fairfield before the company arrived this time in its cap-in-hand fashion. It had been going cap-in-hand to governments all over the western world for quite some years now.

Vote 407 agreed to.

On vote 408:

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): On vote 408, Mr. Chairman, to the hon. Minister. In the estimates I notice an amount of $760,000 for northern Ontario development and foundation research, special services and projects. Could the hon. Minister give us some information as to what projects are being discussed or being considered?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Yes, there are the studies on gold mine tailings, on peat moss, and the air service for northern Ontario. The economic council is working in co-operation with it. I think most of these are listed in the annual report that we gave to hon. members Friday.

Mr. Troy: There is apparently some research going on in regard to the use of asbestos in paving, I believe. Is it this department or The Department of Highways that is doing it? Has the hon. Minister any information on that?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I understand that it is The Department of Highways.

Vote 408 agreed to.

On vote 409:

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister a question in regard to vote 409. You have set up, I think, ten regional development associations in this province. Over the last number of years we have always asked the Minister regarding how many industries settled in our towns and villages across this province. I think in your opening remarks, you said there were 178 industries established in the province of Ontario in 1963. Could you give me the number that have settled in the towns and villages? There has been a great need for industries in these towns. They have been working to get an industry and nothing seems to happen. These towns and villages certainly need some industries in order to keep them in existence. I wondered if the hon. Minister could outline to me what his plans are, or has he plans to assist these towns and villages to get an industry to locate in those towns that certainly need some assistance?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I can get you the names of the towns. I do not have them here. I will dig them up and give them to you before we are through. Insofar as the regional development plans are concerned, I announced in my presentation that we were going to have an international meeting in Toronto this year on regional development. We think we are as well advanced in regional development as anybody in the Dominion of Canada. In fact, many of the other jurisdictions have been here to find out what we are doing. As far as we are concerned, we do not think we are doing enough. We think a lot more could be done, but the effort has to be co-ordinated.

Regional development is not only a problem here; it is a problem, I think, over most of the world. From my own experience, I can point out to you that four or five years ago, in any city in any country in Europe, they would almost give you the Crown jewels if you would go there and build a factory in areas where they had unemployment, where people would not move to the cities which were short of labour. We have somewhat the same position here, in many areas.

I think that one of the great problems of regional development is to find out how we can get industry into the smaller centres. The incentive programme we talked about earlier this afternoon is perhaps one way, but incentives cannot last forever; otherwise you are placing one manufacturing industry in an uncompetitive position against another. You may be able to subsidize them to get them started, but certainly you cannot continue to subsidize them for all time to come, and that is one of the problems. We believe in getting industry out of, let us say, the Golden Horseshoe area to move into smaller towns where they do need one or two good industries.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister a question with regard to England. I think they have a plan over there, which I am not too familiar with—maybe you have made a study of what is taking place in England. I understand that industries which could exist in towns and villages are encouraged to go there. Maybe you plan something along this line; can you enlighten us?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I think they have had some success, but I know they have also had some failures. We intend to bring somebody from the U.K. to sit in on this international meeting, because I think they are probably more familiar with it than most people, inasmuch as most of England, as you know, was badly damaged during the war and they decentralized a lot of industry and put it into some of these satellite towns. I know, in a few instances, they have had some pretty bad failures. Even with the backing of government money, they have eventually thrown in the sponge and the business has gone under.

Answering your other question, new industries went into 74 Ontario municipalities last year. I do not have the breakdown of the towns, but I could get it and give it to you.

Mr. Spence: I would appreciate that.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, how can the hon. Minister reconcile his last statements with his original remarks when he introduced his estimates? In his original remarks he said that this government, as far as possible, should seek to create development where it is most efficient. Investments must be concentrated in areas and industries with the greatest growth potential. What the hon. Minister has mentioned to my hon. colleague is just exactly the opposite to what he originally said in his introductory remarks.

Hon. Mr. Randall: No, I do not think so. Just take your own money. If you are going to put your money into a plant, would you take it and put it up in the bush where you are a long way from your customers, or will you put it where you are close to the source of supply, where you can cut down your cost of transportation and where you have available labour? These are the things which have to be considered. All I am suggesting is that you do not take industry and earmark it and say, "You have to go 500 miles north of Toronto if you want to start to make shoes, or bicycles or washing machines." We think industry has to have the right to settle where it can get the best return on its dollar. All I am suggesting is that we would hope to encourage industry to go out of the complex we have here in the Golden Horseshoe; certainly I do not think this government should insist that industry and investors should take their money and put it in an area where they may consider it to be uneconomical to operate.

Mr. Newman: Well, Mr. Chairman, how is the hon. Minister going to encourage industry to go into these smaller communities?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I think the communities themselves have a lot to do with it. They create a very healthy climate such as we think we have created in the province of Ontario. I think industry will go there anyway. Your own city of Windsor is a good example of that. You are creating a healthy climate down there now, because of changes in federal legislation on exports. The motor car industry has improved itself and it is attracting supplier industries; I think the same thing would happen in small towns.

I think there are lots of things they can do in small towns to invite industry to come in. In fact, we had a gentleman here from London the other day with a programme to attract industry. One of the things we suggested was: "Why do you not point out you are not just talking about industry, you are talking about gracious living for your employees and your executives?" If you were coming out of the city of New York, it would be very nice to be able to settle in a town like Tillsonburg or Blenheim or Delhi, towns down there where you can get some country living, gracious living, and at the same time you are still on the main line railway track and have lots of transportation by road. These are things, I think, many of the municipalities do not spell out when they are trying to encourage industry to come and settle.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, everything is still a matter of dollars and cents, and the hon. Minister still has not explained how the provincial government would encourage growth in the smaller communities. The federal government has already taken certain types of incentive programmes to encourage growth in certain areas, but this government has no programme at all. You are just fortunate that economic conditions have been fairly good, and that the federal authorities have taken steps; but this government has taken no steps at all to encourage these local areas.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I do not think that is quite right. We have the regional development programme. We work with the industrial commissioners in the various small towns. We have on our plate, now, three or four towns which are begging for industry, which are talking to industry. Our people in the agency are working with them. We give them every encouragement.

Insofar as what the federal government have done, they have picked out specific areas where they have had a high number of unemployed—and again I think there is a lot of disagreement; nobody entirely agrees with these concessions which have been made. They cannot be made on a long-term basis, and on a short-term basis they could be fatal for a company in a very competitive market. I do not think the federal government intend to continue those programmes indefinitely.

I still go back and say that, under regional development, I am quite sure we are going to be able to assist industry to go into smaller areas. But on the point you made, and I want to emphasize this, I do not think this government or any government should tell the investor where he has to put his dollars; otherwise this will not be a free enterprise economy.

I do not think we will encourage too many people to come here and set up industries in the province of Ontario unless we let them make the decision as to where they are going to settle. We can encourage them to go out of the industrial areas, but we certainly should not force them.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the remarks of the hon. Minister in connection with encouraging industry. From what I can gather, this is a verbal encouragement and not much more than that. I would suggest, sir, that several things come to mind. As I listened to you speak previously of the need for co-ordination in connection with regional development services and as I listened to your last remarks, sir, I am wondering if you did not raise this question in a number of people's minds: Is there close co-ordination with the federal programmes? You think perhaps the federal government might drop some of its programmes. Surely there is a responsibility in connection with your department to keep very closely in touch with them and be aware of whether they are going to drop their programmes or not?

With respect then to the point made by my hon. colleague from Windsor-Walkerville, Mr. Chairman, I would feel that the provincial government should take more responsibility in manpower study. I am thinking of a retraining programme.

As I say this my mind goes back to a study in the United States, by their Senate committee, of Hazelton — an area which was depressed, which is in the coal mining district, and which was desperately needing supplementary industry. The state took the responsibility of providing retraining programmes, of encouraging advertising on a broad basis—that if industries would come in there would be a retraining programme; labour would be retrained in order that it would be skilled labour for a certain industry.

I feel, particularly with the provincial government's responsibility in training, that this would be the kind of pinpointing which would be very inductive to industry to move. I suggest again that an overall study of industrial opportunities, with a tie-in to tax deductions would be an aggressive approach.

I understand the hon. Minister is doing studies on transportation. Surely he has been deciding where there is an area which seems to be blighted with respect to industry; is where the economic situation may wither in some way. Perhaps if we could build better transportation into such areas and advertise it, encourage vocational schools to set up there, this would be an encouragement to industry. Not that I agree wholeheartedly that you have to tell an industry: "You must go there"; but at least it should be more than verbal encouragement.

I wonder if the hon. Minister would be good enough to comment on those points.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Yes. I was in Pittsburgh a few weeks ago and, as the hon. members probably know, there has been more money spent in Pittsburgh, to make it attractive for industry to come and settle in the Pittsburgh area and solve their unemployment problem, than in any other city in the United States; yet they still have a very high ratio of unemployed in Pittsburgh. I think, when I was there in February, it was running between eight and ten per cent.

Pittsburgh has a programme, as we have in the province of Ontario, of trying to get industry to come into its area. They have a training programme similar, I think, to what the federal government is running here in co-operation with the provinces.

We are co-operating with the federal government on retraining programmes. We will be doing more of that, I think, in the future. But I would like to point out that these designated areas were not designated because of municipal taxes or lack of municipal taxes, or anything along that line. They were designated because of the unemployment in those areas. The programme of the federal government was primarily aimed at assisting unemployment in these designated areas; and for no other reason, at the time they put it into effect. There may be other reasons from here on in.

For instance, we know there will be 250 miners laid off in Bancroft on July 1 when they start stockpiling uranium. That presents a very major problem to this province and also to the federal government. What are you going to do with 250 men who are miners, who are not trained, and who will not need training until July 1 to work in a factory? These are the problems with which we are confronted; and they are the problems I think I spelled out in my presentation of the estimates on Thursday.

We are primarily concerned with areas which are going to lose their industries—whether it be in mines, whether it be a factory, or whether it be in the fields—and doing something for these people before it gets to a point where they become unemployed in great numbers. So when the hon. member says we are not doing anything, I think we are doing a great deal in this province, perhaps more so than anybody else, because the facts speak for themselves.

We are down to 2.5 per cent unemployed seasonally, adjusted at the end of last month. We are not a bit complacent about it, because it can go up that fast just as quickly; but I think this province is doing as much, if not more, than any other province in Canada to make sure that our people are gainfully employed. Our big problem is that we have spot areas where you just cannot pick up a factory and put it down overnight and employ people. But certainly we are going to have to look at means whereby we can bring those people into areas, properly trained, to fit into a new segment of society if necessary, and give them gainful occupation.

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate the remarks of the hon. Minister. I think that Bancroft is a good example. He referred first of all to a retraining programme in co-operation with the federal government. I cannot help feeling that his suggestion that the federal government is taking a major responsibility in this—I might be unfair to him in that subject, but it seems to me that—take the regional development services; this should be a major role of the hon. Minister's, to be looking at this kind of retraining.

I mean we have seen situations where they might encourage a lot of people to take welding or something else, if we know that this is going to be a needed occupation in the future and so on. My hon. friend says we know that it is not. Well, it is the province, after all, which has gone in with the federal government; I would think it has taken a long hard look at what occupations it is retraining people for, and what the future opportunities are.

I ask that because you have the danger of an industry closing in Bancroft. The hon. Minister says, "Well, this is a question we have got to face." I appreciate this; you can see there is going to be a problem there; but I ask the hon. Minister, just so that we can pinpoint the constructive steps he will take; what steps is he going to take in Bancroft—the concrete approach that he would take in connection with regional development purposes? Could he outline for us what steps he is going to take with respect to the 250 men who will be unemployed in Bancroft?

I ask this, sir, because he says that the interest of the federal government in designating areas was because of unemployment. Surely the answer to unemployment is that he not only gives retraining but also job opportunity in connection with secondary industry, so that his concern is similarly the concern of the federal government and there should be a close relationship. I think it would be most helpful for us to see that it is no longer a theory but is actually translated into practical terms. The hon. Minister has been good enough to cite the example of Bancroft. Could we ask him now to outline for us the concrete steps he is going to take in Bancroft?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Well, let me say first of all that we do not have any magic wand. These situations come, and they are going to continue to come. If you look back at Elliot Lake, they had 31,000 people working there a few years ago and now it is down to 9,000. They are the hard core of the people who have homes and youngsters there and who do not want to move away. They are the people we are left with. They are the people we are worrying about now—to find out how we can get an industry or something in there to keep these people working when they are not mining uranium.

But I ask myself: Where have the other 21,000 people drifted to in the last few years? They drift into other areas and find the kind of work they want, the kind of work they find in mining. I imagine you will find a good many of them in the Timmins area right now, and I think you will see some leaving Bancroft.

We are making a survey of the needs of people for employment. We have a survey going on now in our department. I would think that, out of that, we will find out what we can do with a barber who does not want to be a barber, or a miner who can no longer mine. I think you also realize that somebody suggested they should put the federal pension building up there in Elliot Lake, and that would take care of everybody who was unemployed. I am sure it would help the merchants up there but it certainly would not take the miner and put him behind a desk pushing a pencil. He would still drift away and want to do the work he is trained to do.

These are some of the things, I think, which will very definitely have to come out of these regional training programmes we are talking about. And I want to emphasize that we are working with the federal authorities, and the vocational schools and training schools we have in this province; and I think when the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) goes on with his estimates he can point out the many things being done to retrain people for gainful occupation.

But I think, even 100 years from now, these spot problems like Elliot Lake and Blind River are still going to come about, and quite often an industry may be wiped out. We have negotiations going on at GATT right now. If we believe what we say we believe, there is going to be a lowering of tariffs and undoubtedly some industries are going to get hurt. If they are going to get hurt we have to make sure that we have positions for those people to move to from the area where they are hurt.

I think that this government is doing as much as any government. In fact, we think we are doing more; and we are going to continue to do more to make sure that we keep that low level of employment.

Mr. Thompson: Well, I appreciate the enthusiasm of the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrobe) in connection with your remarks. But I am still asking questions, because I know you are a man of practical experience, a man who likes to see things in ones, twos, threes, and fours.

You have been good enough to mention Bancroft. From your last remarks, the first thing which came to my mind was your saying, "Well, men from Blind River and Elliot Lake moved out." I ask: Is it your suggestion that, with the situation in Bancroft and the impending unemployment there, the men move away from there? If it is not that situation, I ask: are you doing a survey on unemployment? I ask: Apart from the survey, what concrete steps, what one-two-three-four programme have you for the people of Bancroft?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I would be delighted to answer that. In the first place, we made an economic survey of Bancroft over a year ago through our department, and we forwarded that to Ottawa; so they are familiar with it. In the second place, we received a delegation down here who recommended what could be done in the lumber business up there and also with a large chemical plant. And we have approached the presidents of these companies and asked them if they are still interested in moving an operation into Bancroft; that is still, to the best of my knowledge, being looked at although it does not look very encouraging for a number of economic reasons. I am talking now about the chip board industry, that is primarily what they were looking at. Thirdly, we have talked to the Minister of Industry at Ottawa on two occasions, we have had correspondence with Prime Minister Pearson about the uranium business, and as you know, in the Ontario Research Foundation we have had, in the last two years, research going on in further uses for uranium.

These are some of the concrete steps we have taken with regard to Bancroft. These are some of the many that were taken with many areas. I do not know what else we could do at the present time. We know there is going to be a spot problem there and these are the steps we have taken now which have been open to us. If anything else comes along, we are going to look at it. I would think we would be in Bancroft again before July 1, certainly long before they turn the key in the door, and I am not too sure that that may happen.

We are hoping there can be some solution worked out for the uranium mining industry in this country. Negotiations are going on now with Ottawa, and as you know, it controls the supply of uranium. It has nothing to do with the province, particularly in the disposition of this metal. I am quite sure that having taken those three steps, we have done all we can to implement some kind of programme for Bancroft. The next move, if we cannot get an industry in there, will certainly have to be sending somebody up to see how we can move these people into industry where their services can be used.

Mr. Thompson: I realize, and I would like to say this, Mr. Chairman, to the hon. Minister, that in many ways there is not an easy pat answer with respect to world markets for uranium and so on. But as I understand it, the hon. Minister has been in touch with Ottawa in connection with Bancroft. He has made tentative negotiations with a lumber company and a chemical concern, which apparently have not jelled. He has written to the hon. Minister of Industry. He has not considered public works of some kind but he has thought that perhaps if things do not start developing that he may have to go up and have another look.

Before the hon. Minister's time we heard of a situation in Elliot Lake where men became unemployed. I remember the panorama of vision that took place on the part of not one Cabinet Minister but a whole collection of them. And then what happened? Gradually we saw the disintegration of that community. I think this hon. Minister is probably being more cautious, judging from everything he has said, and from saying that he had this regional development service. If I was to go to Bancroft tomorrow and talk to those 250 miners, I would not have one constructive remark to make to them. I would have to tell them that I am sorry, from what I could gather there were some negotiations in connection with lumber and chemical industries, which do not seem to have worked—we will give them marks for trying on that—and there have been letters to the Ministers of Trade and Industry in Ottawa. But reassurance to those men, I do not see.

I took that example because the hon. Minister was good enough to take the example of Bancroft. I would hope, when we think of Elliot Lake and other grandiose plans which did not seem to materialize, that the Ontario Regional Development Services will come through with concrete action. I say this because last year we listened to a most energetic Minister who gave us a whole series of surveys that were going to take place. We have been very interested to see concrete steps that are now being proposed and we still await that.

Mr. W. E. Sandercock (Hastings West): Mr. Chairman, I would like to compliment the hon. Minister on the great effort he has made in connection with the Bancroft situation. We have been here at different times with delegations and he has met us very courteously and has done everything in his power to try to do something for that village which we know is in a bad situation. There have also been delegations to Ottawa. I am sure everyone that I know who is interested in that village is doing everything he can to get some kind of an industry there to help the people out. I would certainly like to compliment the hon. Minister on what he has done, and I know he has not left a stone unturned.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, after listening to the hon. Minister, it seems to me that we in northern Ontario cannot hope very much for secondary industry other than in connection with the natural products that we have in our area—that is, industries having to do with lumber, or industries that make tools and equipment for the mines, and our agricultural industry. Certainly, it seems to me too that the one industry that we should be going all out to encourage is the tourist industry.

But the thing that we need before we can possibly compete with southern Ontario is the market in our own area. With only the large extent of northern Ontario right from the Quebec border to Manitoba in our own section—maybe 500,000 people—there is not much opportunity at all for us to get any industry that can manufacture goods. We would have to sell them in southern Ontario or other places, so why should a manufacturing company go up north when it has to send the products all the way back south? We must then get all the help we can from this department for our tourist industry and in helping out the agriculture industry. We have now found out that northern Ontario is a wonderful place for growing potatoes. We are finding New Brunswick farmers coming up there and developing that industry.

As far as saying that we must move industry from southern Ontario to northern Ontario, I think it is ridiculous. As the hon. Minister says, industry is only going to settle where it has an opportunity of competing with other manufacturers and it must be in an area where it has a market.

I hope the tourist committee that the department has and the other committees considering our problems will help us out. The hon. Minister knows just as well as I do what our great problem is. But the big thing is population—we just do not have the people.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Just adding to the remarks of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Trotter), we had this automation foundation conference last year and following that Dr. Deutsch of the economic council has suggested to us that we pool our efforts and, I hope, pool our money and do a good job of setting up an automation foundation, which I think will go a long way to answering some of the problems that we foresee coming, such as in the uranium industry. If we could have foreseen this a year or so ago, perhaps if the automation foundation had been formed then, a lot more could have been done. So I say we are moving along the line of doing something as quickly as we can.

I may point this out also that into The Department of Trade and Industry come a number of people who say, "I want to establish a plant in this area." We always suggest to them that they go out of town. If we can, we try to get them into areas where they can lend something to the community and be of service to the community. For instance, we have a needle trade coming down here. They want 300 people in the needle trade and we cannot find any professional people to put to work in the needle trade. This is one of the major problems. I would think northern Ontario is an area we could suggest. There is a lot of European background in northern Ontario and perhaps that is where they could get the people for the needle trade. This is a case where I think we can persuade people to go north, if they are in a light industry such as manufacturing fabrics and in the tailoring industry.

These are some of the things that we are trying to do to get industry to move into areas where at the moment to you and me it looks uneconomic. Perhaps it will not be uneconomic to somebody with a light industry. I think we know what Bata did a few years ago, after World War II, in the shoe business when it came down here. These are things that we do try to persuade people to consider when they are establishing—to get them out of this area and get them into areas where they can operate on an economically sound basis. So I think we are moving in that direction and we are trying to do all we can to make sure that we diversify industry into as many parts of Ontario as we can, and it is in our interests to do so.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. Minister is talking around the subject very nicely. I am sure that when delegations come to visit the hon. Minister, he gives them the most comfortable chairs in his office, he makes them thoroughly welcome, he exudes his charm—he is a charming man—and I am sure that they get the impression that he is trying to do everything he can. But I think what my hon. colleague from Dovercourt was getting at, and my hon. friend from Nipissing, is that we would like to know what you are doing in a concrete sort of a way.

For instance, is the hon. Minister in favour of fixed assessments? There have been two or three private bills before the House dealing with fixed assessments. Is this the policy of the government that there should be fixed assessments, and, if so, on what basis is this being determined? A couple of years ago, Mr. Chairman, the government decided that there would be no more fixed assessments. They were wiped out. The government took those sections out of The Municipal Act. Now the back door has been opened a little bit. Every now and then the occasional private bill sneaks through and the hon. Minister sits and says not a word.

Has the government policy changed on fixed assessments or has it not, and if it is available to one, why should it not be available to all? What are the ground rules? I think this is important. Has the hon. Minister any approach in regard to Hydro concessions? This has been talked about on many occasions. I would like to hear whether or not the hon. Minister is interested in offering Hydro concessions.

What about the use of the ONR? I pointed out to him in my remarks at the beginning of these estimates that his predecessor had promised a two- or three-point effort into the operations of the ONR. Is the hon. Minister in favour of using the ONR as an economic instrument to encourage industries to locate in certain places? We agree, Mr. Chairman, that you cannot force industry, and we would not want this government to force industry, to go into fixed locations but there are things which can be done in addition to talking. Depreciation incentives—has the hon. Minister any programme of depreciation incentives?

It is all very well to say that a certain municipality should talk about the luxurious living executives are going to have, but there has to be a little more done to encourage industry to go into the municipalities which need these industries very desperately. So many municipalities are like the dog chasing his tail: They need more assessment to bring their services up to date so that they will attract more assessment.

Where do they start? If they have not got more assessment, the Ontario Municipal Board will not let them put in more water works or more sewers to attract industry. And if they do not have the facilities to attract the industry, the industry will not come in and they will not have the assessment. So round and round we go in a great circle.

Has the hon. Minister, with his colleague, the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner), anything to say about that? As I say, it is fine that these conversations are going on, and we are sure that when these delegations come in, as the hon. member for Hastings West said: "I am sure that the people are received in an amiable fashion and they are made welcome." But, what is the hon. Minister able to say, in a concrete fashion, that he is doing?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I do not know. I think you had better turn your hearing aid up because we have already pointed out that we had a gross provincial product increase of 6.9 per cent here last year. Our unemployment is down to 2.5 per cent. We are bringing in industry at a greater rate than ever before; we are trying to get them to go into areas where they are not now located—

Mr. Singer: How?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I am sure I have lots of recommendations for Mr. Pearson but I do not think he would listen to me.

Mr. Singer: What are you doing?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I think Mr. Pearson is going to run his government, and he is going to co-operate with us and we are going to co-operate with him. You say: What are you doing? I think we are doing many things but it would take hours to talk about all the things we have done.

Mr. Singer: That is what these estimates are for.

Hon. Mr. Randall: All our missions overseas, our trade missions, are selling goods from small towns all over the province of Ontario. Two hundred-odd men have gone from small towns into new markets they were never in before; they have opened up a whole new vista of possibilities for their products—from small towns as well as from the large cities. We have investment missions going to the United States—we have had four this year and I think we will have 12 before the end of the year is out—inviting American industry to come in here and open up plants because it is a good place to open up a factory.

Insofar as recommendations on taxes and greater depreciation are concerned, that again, as you can appreciate, is tied up with the federal authority. If the federal authorities are going to move in that direction the province will have to move with them; but you only move in that direction when it is absolutely essential—and in some places it is not essential, it is detrimental. I do not think you can go on giving concessions to one industry against another, or one man in an industry against another one in an industry.

I think we are doing everything we can in this province to find and build a steady employment record, and create a healthy economy for industry to thrive in. And I think the record speaks for itself. We could sit here all day and say, "What is the government doing?" and I would have to make a list as long as a wet week. I will bring it in, and give it to the hon. member; but I do not think we have to. I think the record speaks for itself: That we are doing anything any other provincial government is doing, plus.

What the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs and the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) will do, I do not know; that is their department and I have enough trouble running my own, Mr. Chairman. I am doing everything I think I can do to improve the climate for industry to come and settle in this province here and make a dollar. And let me spell something out for you: The only time industry is interested in going anywhere is if it is profitable; if it is not profitable it is not going to go. If you look at the figures at the end of last year, and the figures to date, I think you will find that industry finds Ontario a pretty good place in which to operate.

There is a good family income here. There is a good employment record. There is a good climate as far as the government is concerned. We are close to markets, close to sources of supply. I do not know what else we could add to that but I think that industry is proving, itself, that this is a good place to operate. When we get to the point where we need all these concessions you talk about, I am quite sure that we will come up with our share of them. Right now we do not think it essential that we should come up with a number of concessions for industry which does not require it.

There has been a lot of discussion as to what we should do about the federal tax bill, and what they have done in the United States. There are two schools of thought: Some think we should follow, some think we should not. I do not think we should at the moment. There are others who agree that we should not follow at the moment. But, as far as the province is concerned, I think the province is doing an excellent job of encouraging industry to come in here. I do not know what else we can do that we are not doing to make it a better climate for industry to live in. If you have any suggestions, the door is open; I would welcome any suggestions you might have. If you think you have suggestions which would improve the climate in this province, bring them in to me. I would be delighted to get them.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, I would make a suggestion right now, of a general nature. It seems to me, from everything which has been said so far in this discussion, that there is simply no co-ordination at all of the various policies in this general field. My suggestion would be that this department should be responsible for developing coherent plans and implementing them itself, if necessary, or at least co-ordinating the activities of other agencies.

The hon. Minister has frequently referred to the fact that there has been a significant increase during the past year in the provincial gross product, and that unemployment on a seasonally adjustment basis is at a relatively low level. I think it should also be borne in mind that his own department, in one of its recent economic surveys in the monthly magazine—I have just forgotten the name of it but the economic bulletin, or whatever it is—pointed out that a province such as Ontario inevitably benefits disproportionately when there is an upswing in the business cycle because of the large amount of manufacturing in this province.

The other side of that coin, of course, is that if the cycle goes down we suffer disproportionately for exactly the same reason. The hon. Minister himself, in his introductory remarks on these estimates and also today, has indicated problems we can anticipate in the future. As far as I can see, although the hon. Minister has identified some of the problems, there does not seem to be any co-ordinated effort by the government to do anything about them or to lay the ground work to do something when action is required.

He has, for example, talked about the possibility of a general lowering of tariffs, which is, I think, a position he favours subject to certain conditions. In the overall picture it would be to the benefit of Canada if we could have a general lowering of tariffs throughout the world but, as the hon. Minister has pointed out, this will create quite significant dislocations within our own economy; particularly in the economy of Ontario, with its heavy reliance on secondary manufacturing.

There will have to be adjustments, as the hon. Minister himself said. We are going to have to contemplate moving labour and capital out of declining industries into rising industries.

I believe that the hon. Minister has quite a competent research staff within his department in one or two different branches. I have no doubt they are giving some study to this matter. But when one gets down to specific details as to the kind of programmes which are being developed, I must say one gets the impression of widespread confusion. Each little facet of an overall programme is somebody else's responsibility.

Training and retraining, Mr. Chairman, is essentially the responsibility of The Department of Education. I do not know what consultation and/or co-ordination there is between this department and The Department of Education, but I certainly have the impression that—we will get into it in more detail when we get into the education estimates—the training and retraining programmes being undertaken right now are certainly not going to meet the requirements of the situation if any large-scale transfers of labour become necessary.

As far as moving workers is concerned, there are practically no programmes at all. I suppose that comes under the National Employment Service.

Now NES effectiveness in that field, I may say, leaves very much to be desired. But if it happens, and it appears from what the hon. Minister says that it may very well happen, that in Bancroft it will simply be impossible to attract any new industry to employ the people who are going to be displaced in a very few months, have we any plan to move them out into other areas, giving them retraining if necessary? Are we going to assist them in moving? Are we going to help with their moving expenses?

Unfortunately, if they have to move, they are undoubtedly going to suffer some significant losses, those of them who have invested in houses and so on are not going to be able to sell the houses to anybody. Is there any sort of plan developed even for that one limited adjustment that may have to take place?

It is fine to say, "We know there is a problem, we are looking at it, we are going to be back there before July," but July is not very far away. Surely a programme could have been worked out by now, in consultation with NES—if it can be induced to give real attention to the problem—and with The Department of Education with respect to retraining. That is just one facet, but if we start looking to the future and consider the adjustments that are going to become necessary if there should be a general lowering of tariffs and as automation progresses, such programmes are going to have to be on a large scale. There are other countries in the world that have large-scale programmes to take care of these adjustments. Here, we apparently do some study and that is about all.

The hon. Minister said a moment ago that what the other Ministers are doing is their business, he has enough to do looking after his own department. That is probably true, but then what the other Ministers do, very much affects the problems that he is thinking about. A couple of years ago when we had a more impulsive Minister in the portfolio now held by this hon. Minister, we were told in a Budget speech that the provincial government was going to proceed with certain incentives to industry in the taxation field, following upon certain incentives that were granted federally. That is the last we ever heard of them. They never got beyond the Budget speech. I am not saying they were well considered. It would appear from what happened that they were very badly considered. A little bit of consideration indicated that they were not practical or would not produce the result that was contemplated.

It is that sort of impulsive, unco-ordinated behaviour that I think is creating the complaint on this side of the House. We would like to see some evidence of co-ordinated behaviour. As far as I can see, from what I have heard and what I have read, this department's sole function, in the whole realm of location of industry, is to a certain degree in the research field, which is useful, and in providing public relations and information services—if I may call them that—communicating with industry as to possible areas where it may be able to locate and encouraging it to locate in areas where we would like to see it go. I am not saying that function is not important. I am just saying that is one of the functions. The only other function the department performs, as far as I can see, is to guarantee loans to certain people who cannot get them through the regular channels, or cannot get all the money they need through the regular channels. That seems to be about the sum total of this department's activity in the whole general area of location of industry.

I would suggest to the hon. Minister that that may be good enough right now when things are pretty good. But the hon. Minister himself has indicated that he is aware of the fact that we cannot take for granted that the present favourable economic situation is going to continue indefinitely. I think that we on this side of the House, at least, would like to have more evidence that this department is doing the job I think it should be doing—that is, anticipating the problems that will arise—and developing plans that may affect many government departments and co-ordinating plans that can be put into effect as required, and is working with the federal government in the development of those plans.

At the moment, there seems to me to be a complete hodge-podge of little plans. This department has one or two or three, The Department of Education has one or two, and the hon. Provincial Treasurer may be giving some thought to using taxation as an incentive, I do not know. I have not seen any evidence of it if he has, but he may be. We have these little efforts, spread throughout the government, not very well co-ordinated with each other, or with the various activities of the federal government.

The hon. Minister asked for suggestions, Mr. Chairman, and one suggestion is that in the coming year the department should give major attention to developing a co-ordinated programme to deal with problems that I think we can reasonably anticipate will develop in the next one, two, three or four years. I would say also that somebody has to take some responsibility somewhere for the specific problems we have right now, such as Bancroft. If we cannot get a new industry in there, then something has to be done to help the people move out. I do not think we can have a repeat of Elliot Lake. It is true that people drifted away. They got somewhere or other, but it meant very great hardship to many individuals. I think one of the functions of government should be to minimize these hardships and facilitate transfers and adjustments that become necessary because of changing economic conditions.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to follow through again on suggestions. I would agree with the hon. member for Woodbine. I not only feel, Mr. Chairman, that there is not co-ordination between the national effort on this and the provincial effort, but I have a feeling that perhaps the hon. Minister does not think the national approach of research is really on a sound basis. I notice you refer to the fact that it is suggesting areas that need assistance and the basis for this has been that of unemployment. I thought you were inferring that you had other bases for deciding the need of assistance. I also felt you were inferring unemployment is a fluid picture and you were thinking of it in a longer-term approach. If I could, I would appreciate clarification on that.

Hon. Mr. Randall: There are areas where you have unemployment and there are areas where you are going to have unemployment, such as Bancroft. I think both are problems. I think the federal government recognizes that, the same as we do. I think you must remember that when the government came into power it appointed a Minister of Industry, Mr. Drury, who, if you know something about his problems, is busy assembling a staff. Two of his people are in our place today. They are down every day in the week. We are working very closely with Mr. Drury and his staff and with Dr. Deutsch and his staff.

I have had three meetings with Mitchell Sharp's department on trade and commerce. I think there can be no suggestion whatsoever that we are not co-operating with the federal authorities. As I pointed out in the estimate speech, there are 54 foreign offices run by the federal government around the world. They suggested that instead of opening any further Ontario offices, we should take a desk or an office in one of theirs and co-operate with them. We have agreed to do that. We are still talking about where we want to put manpower in their foreign offices.

In the matter of unemployment, the matter of assisting industry, the matter of taxation with these federal-provincial conferences, and the matter of retraining of people for new jobs through the automation foundation that we are working on, there is a great area of co-operation. I think it would be unfair to say that we were not co-operating with Ottawa. I think if you called the people up there, they would tell you they are looking to the province of Ontario because we are further advanced than many other provinces in some of the things that Ottawa would like to do on a national basis.

On the other hand, some of the problems in the other provinces are entirely different to ours and I think most of us recognize this. Their economic circumstances are different. But we believe what we have done here is indicative of what can be done in other provinces, provided they can get industry in there.

Just before I sit down I think an hon. member asked me a question about where these new plants went last year, or did they all settle here in the city of Toronto or this area. The answer is, "No!" The eastern Ontario region got 11 of these branch plants and other areas got five of them; in northwestern Ontario they got six branch plants; Georgian Bay got six; the Lake Ontario region got four and three manufacturing arrangements; northwestern Ontario got five new plants and one manufacturing arrangement; midwestern Ontario got 14 branch plants and 12 manufacturing arrangements, which put more people to work since they got something new to manufacture.

In the Niagara region alone they got 18 new plants and eight manufacturing arrangements; Lake Erie got 13, and three manufacturing arrangements; St. Clair region got eight, and two manufacturing arrangements; and in the Metropolitan area they got 88, and 40 manufacturing arrangements—which I think is par for the course. Almost 50 per cent of these new manufacturing plants and manufacturing arrangements were spread out across the province of Ontario; this is the thing in which the department has acted. I think it indicates that we are endeavouring to spread industry across the province.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to follow. You mention this co-operation with the federal government, and I would appreciate clarification from the hon. Minister. Could I ask: With this close co-operation do you agree with the federal government's designation of areas which need assistance?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I say, within reason. I think even some of the towns do not agree with the federal government. I think Brantford took exception to the fact that they were designated as an unemployment area.

Mr. Thompson: I would like to know: Do you agree with the federal government or with the municipalities?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Let me say I am not opposed. I think in many areas they can use that kind of assistance, but I would be very careful that this long-term assistance does not create hardship in an industry. Take the implement industry, for example: I do not think the employees at Massey-Ferguson would be helped if Cockshutt Plow, were, let us say, subsidized for the next 10 years, and then it was found that people were being laid off at Massey-Ferguson and taken on at Cockshutt Plow and had to move from one city to another.

I think that in getting industry started, you certainly must give them all the help you can; but I would be very leery of coaxing an industry into what I would consider to be an uneconomical area two or three years from now, when they pull the rug from under them and those incentives are no longer available.

This is what has happened in many areas in Europe and it has created some hardships. I think we can learn a lesson from Europe, so that we do not get too far out on the rug and then find, when you pull that rug from under them, that they cannot compete. This is the thing we want to watch so that we do not pull the crutches out and see these industries in trouble a few years from now.

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate the point, sir. I gather from the hon. Minister that he is in agreement with the federal government's approach with respect to the designated areas for assistance, and he is in agreement with the areas which the federal government has so designated.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I do not say that. I said that I am in agreement in some areas. I did not say I agreed with all the areas in it, because some areas were left out. We have heard already from one or two small towns which said, "We should have been included in that, and we are not included."

Then, as you read in the press, some designated areas did not want to be considered designated areas. All I say is that I think the federal government has done what they thought was in the best interests of those areas. I have no objections to it but I just think we should be very careful about spreading it.

Mr. Thompson: I would like to say that surely, with this whole approach and your talk of co-operation, it is not a case of just having no objection to what they are doing. I would think there would be an active approach to it.

You suggest that there are some areas in which you are in disagreement with the federal government. Could you clarify the areas about which you are in disagreement with the federal government?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I am not in disagreement with any area. I just say, in the general principle, there are some areas I have already gone on record as saying did not want to be designated.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. Is the hon. Minister still referring to the Brantford area? This is the third time he has referred to areas which do not wish to be designated.

Hon. Mr. Randall: That was the one which was in the headline first.

Mr. Nixon: Perhaps, if you would permit me, on a point of order I should inform the hon. Minister that the mayor of Brantford, when the designations first occurred, was in the process of running for membership in this House. And his first reaction was that he did not agree with the designation, but it soon became apparent that the whole area was gratified to have this designation. It was explained that the designation was the result of careful scrutiny of the employment figures over a number of years, and that there was a plan for the designation and Brantford did adequately qualify. The whole area is really taking great advantage of the designation.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, I would just like to move into another area of this subject.

I would commend the department for the splendid report, the economic survey and the subsequent report on the Niagara region. I was not in the House, Mr. Chairman, when the hon. Minister of Economics and Development made his opening remarks prior to the presentation of his estimates, and I do not know to what extent he went in dealing with this very elaborate and concise report. I would ask him to make some comment on what action the government might intend to take in regard to some of the very disconcerting problems which arise from the report.

I am particularly interested in the one section, "Urban expansion and land use planning." Many hon. members will remember for many years in this House in the past, I have raised the question of the great concern for the declining fruit producing acreage in the Niagara peninsula. And, of course, as many times the problem was sloughed off by the previous Minister of Economics and Development and, at times, sir, the previous Prime Minister. But I am sure that this report does point out we should have some concern in regard to this problem.

It points out, and I just want to make a few brief remarks on what the report finds in regard to the ever-increasing decline of fruit producing acreage. It says:

The average rate of tender fruit land converted to other uses between 1934 and 1954, a 20-year period, was 80 acres a year; and between 1955 and 1958, a three-year period, it was 320 acres a year. Up to the end of last year, 37 per cent of the original 41,000 acres of tender fruit land had gone.

One table in the report shows that between 1951 and 1961 there was a net loss of 2,180 acres for peaches and sweet cherries, the great bulk of it being peaches. During the same period of time, with the single exception of grapes which managed to hold their own, there were significant declines in the acreage planted to other fruits. Plums and prunes lost 2,425 acres, and apples 2,350 acres, while pears and sour cherries showed smaller decline.

Mr. Chairman, I believe if there was a section of the province which needed immediate attention it is this section of the Niagara peninsula.

I feel that when we talk about the need for industry in particular sections this is one area which does not need more industry but needs some real planning to preserve the tender fruit producing lands and to develop a buffer zone of farm lands, if we could call it that, between the one part of the Golden Horseshoe and the American border. I would ask the hon. Minister to comment. As I said, I was absent when he made his comments prior to the presentation of his estimates and he might have made some reference to this report and the problems contained therein. If not, I would like the hon. Minister to inform the House, particularly myself, of what action, if any, the department intends to take in regard to this most concise and important report.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Well, frankly, Mr. Chairman, I am not entirely familiar with all that is contained in this report. There are many reports put out. All I would suggest is that we are interested in the problem along with the agricultural group and the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart). We have had a number of discussions with The Department of Agriculture through the Ontario Economic Council, where we have an agricultural committee composed of men who are engaged in the agriculture industry. One of the members of the agricultural committee of the economic council is very familiar with this problem and it has been discussed at economic council. I understand that they are discussing it with The Department of Agriculture but what plans have evolved from that I am not prepared to say. Since the hon. member has raised it I will be glad to have a look at it and give him further information on it.

Mr. Sandercock: Mr. Chairman, we have a factory in our riding that I am very proud of, the Bata shoe factory, which employs around 1,200 to 1,300 people. The remark was made here a few moments ago by the hon. Minister in referring to this factory in Batawa. This factory is built out in the country and we are very proud of it. It is a great factory. It has all sorts of facilities there to look after its help—picture shows and cafeterias and all such like—and we are very proud of it. The hon. member for Woodbine made the remark "sweatshop." I am telling you, Mr. Chairman, that I have been through that factory from top to bottom, in every department, I know practically half of the people who work there, and I have never heard the word "sweatshop" ever mentioned. I resent that.

Mr. Bryden: What is the base wage paid there?

Mr. Sandercock: There has never been a person come to see me or to complain to me about the wages that are paid in the Bata shoe factory.

Mr. Bryden: Well, what are they?

Mr. Sandercock: They live in the most beautiful homes in the country—a lot of them.

Mr. MacDonald: Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, we could find out what the base wage is and then that will end the argument as to whether it is a sweatshop. I had a little discussion last year as to whether Fairfield was a sweatshop and discovered that employees were starting at 65 cents an hour and getting up to 75 cents. Mr. Wagner and a lot of other people jumped to the defence of this company. But it was obviously operating on a sweatshop basis—one of the first companies that The Department of Labour, when it implements a minimum wage, would have to take a look at. Sometimes people suffer in silence for a long time.

However, Mr. Chairman, there is one brief comment I want to make on another observation made by the hon. Minister a few moments ago. I think it was rather interesting that when he was giving a breakdown of where these new industries had located in the province of Ontario in the last year that he finally got to 88 for the Metropolitan area. Now, 88 was approximately 50 per cent of the total.

A year or so ago rather a startling figure, in terms of getting the overall picture in the province of Ontario, became available when it was indicated that half of the manufacturing in the province of Ontario was found to be located within 35 miles of Toronto city hall. If 88 of the new industries, representing about half of them, are now being concentrated in Metro alone, the conclusion that the hon. Minister missed—and I draw to his attention—is that the concentration is getting worse rather than better. He uses the term “it is par for the course.” Well, half of them in an area going out 35 miles would have been par for the course, if by par for the course he meant maintaining the same balance. But if half of them are now being concentrated in Metro alone, the concentration is getting greater and greater and greater, so his efforts really are not achieving any greater distribution.

However, what provoked me to rise, Mr. Chairman, is that there are two phases of regional development services and the regional development associations that I wanted to raise with the hon. Minister.

My first one is by way of a question that I would come back to and have the hon. Minister comment on, and that is to what extent are the regional development associations today giving any attention to our basic industry of agriculture? I raise this because a few years ago when the first meeting of the Regional Development Association of Northwestern Ontario was held, I was informed that some people who attended had a great deal of difficulty in getting acceptance of the fact that there are areas in northwestern Ontario to which agriculture is extremely important. As a matter of fact, if you get into the area, Mr. Chairman, that you yourself would be very familiar with, from Fort Frances through Emo to the town of Rainy River, this is one of our concentrated areas of agriculture with a magnificent co-operative movement. There are other pockets around Kenora and Dryden and elsewhere, but you have this major pocket. There was some difficulty in getting the regional development association even to consider that this basic industry was part of its responsibility in the development.

However, this was not unique. When the first meeting of the Regional Development Association of Eastern Ontario was held, because it was an outgrowth of the united chambers of commerce in eastern Ontario, it held a three-day meeting and it made the mistake of inviting Grattan O'Leary to be its banquet speaker at the end of the conference. It was a mistake for this reason, that Grattan is a fairly forthright individual, even among his fellow Conservatives, and he drew their attention to two things. One, that during the course of the three days there had been very carefully documented briefs presented to at least half a dozen of the hon. Ministers who came down in quite an impressive display of VIPs from Queen's Park. Each one of the briefs had been presented to the appropriate hon. Minister and he had got up and in effect said “No.” So Grattan O'Leary's comment was, “Well, what is the point? Why have people go to all this work and do the research and present you with the needs of the area when the reaction of the Minister is almost a reflex reaction of ‘no’?”

Now I come back to the main point I was making a moment ago. He drew attention to the fact that they had met for three days and there had not even been a whisper of consideration of the industry that is still the basic industry of eastern Ontario, namely, agriculture.

In that connection I want to raise with this hon. Minister, in the hope that I can get a little bit further than I was able to do with his predecessor, one aspect of the agricultural industry that would help eastern Ontario. As the hon. Minister is at least generally aware, if not in detail, the milk industry, an important aspect of the whole agricultural industry, has been faced for some years with the problem of a surplus. This has tended to wreck the market in the four different groups within the milk industry — cream, cheese, and concentrated and fluid milk—certainly at least wrecked their pricing procedures. However, there is one obvious answer to the problem of how you cope with a surplus, and that is to develop the potential of that branch of the industry for which there is a market. The one for which there is an obviously greater market is cheese, and the cheese marketing board is doing a very good job in terms of developing a continuity of supply which would help to exploit a fuller potential in the British market.

But I want to come back to another aspect of the industry right here in Canada. I raised in this House problems with which I had been provided some basic background, in connection with the Black Diamond cheese factory in the area of Belleville. Black Diamond is the sole remaining Canadian-owned cheddar cheese manufacturing company or processing company. Its great problem, however, Mr. Chairman, is that it is severely limited in terms of developing its markets and providing an outlet for this surplus milk that could be directed toward cheese, rather than these other flooded markets, because of the fact that it cannot get into the United States. It is estimated by experts that if it could get into the United States, it could sell literally untold millions of pounds of Canadian cheddar cheese, which today has achieved a position among the gourmets of the world that is pretty well unrivalled. Yet the fact of the matter is that Black Diamond operates on a quota of something like half a million pounds. Talk about a flea bite or a rat bite or whatever be the appropriate bite for cheese, I do not know—perhaps a mouse bite. Half a million pounds of cheese is all it can get into the United States and why, Mr. Chairman? Well, it is very simple. We have permitted the entry into Canada of Kraft, part of a big worldwide company. Kraft has become established in Canada. Mr. Chairman, I was told by people who are in a position to know, that Kraft has successfully lobbied the Liberal, the Tory, and I presume the Liberal government again in Ottawa, into complete inactivity in terms of making representations to the United States to open the legitimate market for Canadian cheddar cheese in the United States. In some mysterious way—and I have an unholy suspicion it has to do with election funds—Kraft has been able to lobby into inactivity the Liberal and the Conservative governments at Ottawa, so that you can never get any representations made at Washington with regard to a fair deal—just a fair deal. While we let Kraft come into Canada and establish and exploit the Canadian market to the full, they keep the door closed in terms of Canadian cheddar cheese going into the United States.

I will come back and try to wrap up this whole point with the hon. Minister. First, to what extent are the regional development associations considering, or acknowledging, that the development of the basic industry of agriculture is part of their concern in the various parts of the province? And, specifically, now that we have a new Minister in this department, is he acquainted with the whole Black Diamond cheddar cheese problem in terms of export to the United States? Has he looked into it and, if so, what has he found? If he has not looked into it, would he consider doing so in the hope that he can outdo his predecessor, who looked into it and found it was tough and then said, "This is a federal matter" and backed away from it?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Well, in the first place I am not familiar with the background of the Kraft industry the hon. member talks about, but certainly I would be delighted to have a look at it to see if I can lift any doors to get more cheese exported from Canada. I can assure the hon. member that when I first went overseas I checked most of the stores in Europe and we did find Canadian cheese in Europe.

The hon. member mentioned the poundage; I cannot say whether he is right or wrong. I had an inquiry from somebody here as to why we were not selling Canadian fruits and cheeses in Florida. We made an inquiry the other day and they tell me they are down there and are available, so we are having that checked further to see how much is available in Florida, because the question was brought up.

A lot of Canadians go there in the winter time. They would like to buy Canadian cheese, and it is not available, so we are having a check made in Florida to see where it is available and how much is available. Perhaps the question the hon. member raises here today is a good one and we can do something about it.

Mr. MacDonald: Maybe it is being smuggled into Florida.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I will be delighted to take a look at it. Perhaps I can go to Florida to have a look at it.

Mr. MacDonald: What about the regional development—

Hon. Mr. Randall: Well, just let me answer one question at a time and I will bring the hon. member up to date.

We talked about the 88 plants in the Metropolitan area, and perhaps I should have enlarged on that. The 88 plants in this area—and I still agree with the hon. member, we want to get as many out of this area as we can and spread them across the province—but that Metropolitan area includes Ontario county, Halton county, York county and Peel county so they are not all based in this area here. Just how many did come in to the Toronto area, I do not know at the moment; but I could find out.

When I joined the economic council, one of our first meetings was up in Fort William-Port Arthur. A question was raised up there about chaff off grain which was being shipped to Manitoulin Island. The freight rates went up and they could sell it no longer. I came back and we started an investigation of it; these are just some of the things the northern Ontario development group are doing through the economic council and the Ontario Research Foundation.

We have nine special projects to be studied by the Ontario Research Foundation. These include possible end uses of mine tailings, fertilization, economic feasibility of the needle trade industry, the economics of increasing beef cattle production in north-eastern and northwestern Ontario, elevator grain screenings for cattle feed, co-operative action in growing and marketing garden produce, the reduction of iron ore by jet smelting processes, peat moss production, and uses of coarse fish processing. Close liaison has been maintained with the research foundation on reports, and these programmes are being studied. Also, I think we have a programme going on in the Ontario Research Foundation on the use of clay in the Lake St. Clair region.

Most of these regional development people are very closely allied with the ARDA group, and with our own agricultural people. I would think there is as much effort being put on agricultural growth and assistance to agriculture through the regional development people as in any other group. Certainly we want to expand that; and again I say it is one of the things we would like to check with people from other countries when they come here this year, to see what they have done. Perhaps out of it we can evolve a whole new programme.

But something is being done, as you can see. I think the story is that in Manitoulin Island we have one of the largest beef raising areas in Canada right up there in northern Ontario, and it can be improved. They are having trouble getting cattle feed, particularly in the winter months; and this has brought up a study in which I think we are going to come up with some answers.

Mr. MacDonald: I would like to thank the hon. Minister for his comments.

The second question I wanted to raise with him, of a general nature, has specific reference to northern Ontario. Let me go back to the observations of the hon. member for Nipissing. He said that it is difficult to establish new manufacturing industries in northern Ontario because of their distance from the market. Obviously, this is the basic problem. If half of the manufacturing is situated within 35 miles from the Toronto city hall, there is a pretty cold, hard economic fact which militates against the establishment of industries in northern Ontario—unless they happen to be related to the basic resources of northern Ontario which are there and you cannot put the industry anywhere else if they are an extractive industry based on it.

This brings me to the point I want to raise with this hon. Minister. I suggest if he is serious about developing the industries of northern Ontario, he has to take a look at the forest industry. As far as mining is concerned, the tragedy of mining is that the industry begins to disappear from the time you start to mine, because you begin to destroy the resource and it does not reproduce itself. Unless the community has the extreme good fortune of Timmins, as appears to have been the case in recent weeks, the day is going to come when it will likely become a ghost town because of the fact that its basic resources disappeared.

This is not true of forestry. Forestry is a resource which can be reproduced, can be regenerated. We can have it for future generations. However, again I go back, for example, to the organizational meeting of the Northwestern Ontario Regional Development Association. I am told from very reliable sources that some pretty tough talk went on at these meetings, from people who are interested in developing secondary industries in northern Ontario. But they could not get the resources.

The resources have all been parcelled out in great empires through leases. They could not get working arrangements on any long-term basis with those who held the lease, and perhaps were not using certain of the species, to make that species available for whatever purpose the secondary industry wanted them, let alone being able to get a new tract of lumber on a new lease completely to themselves.

They, in effect, said to the government spokesmen who were there, "We are not going to invest a few million dollars in an industry if you cannot give us a long-term assurance of supply". There is a man up in northwestern Ontario—

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): I think the hon. member's talk is very unsound and I think—

Mr. Bryden: Who cares what the hon. Minister thinks? Why does he not wait for his turn?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Why does the hon. member not talk sense?

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, this man comes from northern Ontario and it is possible you know what makes northern Ontario people tick. If you do, I invite you to try to muzzle him because he does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. MacDonald: Less than one year ago—

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, will the hon. Minister sit down so that I can proceed?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Well, the hon. member talks all the time.

Mr. MacDonald: At least I trust that when I have something to say, I just do not open my mouth and let the words flow out meaninglessly.

Mr. Chairman: Order! Continue.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, you yourself know one of the top industries in the city of Port Arthur, whose owner last year publicly proclaimed the fact that he had never been able to get from this government—

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Who was it? Have they got it now?

Mr. MacDonald: The name just escapes me at the moment. I do not know whether they have it now. All I know, Mr. Chairman, is that there are dozens of industries across northern Ontario, but this government has never been willing to sit down to reconsider the division of these resources and make them available for the secondary industries which want to get in there. You can talk from now until doomsday—

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Circumlocution of falsities.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, do you want me to interrupt him regularly every time he gets up?

Mr. Chairman: Order! I would ask that the member who is now speaking be given the floor and listened to with attention.

Mr. MacDonald: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I hope you are effective.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I will be talking in a minute.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, there have been repeated pleas for the provision of these resources so that they can develop secondary industry. For example, during the election campaign, I had a very interesting visit to the little town of Matachewan, up in the Timiskaming area. The hon. member is not here again today. He must be running his hardware store and making his third or fourth million up there.

However, up in Matachewan—

Mr. Singer: He needs you to help him run it.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, somebody up there referred to him as being a vigorous critic on the ONR and he never raised his voice once on behalf of the ONR during all the estimates.

However, Mr. Chairman, let us get back to the issue. Here is the town of Matachewan, which is situated right in the midst of forest resources. These forest resources, I believe, were originally with the E. B. Eddy interests and been transferred down through the years.

There has never been, I was told by the mayor of the town, or one of the top businessmen in the town, a single stick of timber cut by the licence holder for years in that area—not a single stick. He is trafficking in the cutting. He sublets certain cuttings that can go on to people who can come in. Here is a town that used to have a few thousand population. It was a flourishing town. It has become, in the delightful phraseology of those who are up there now, "disorganized." It has had to revert to an unorganized territory because they simply could not meet their taxes and they had to go back to being an unorganized territory.

You have the women's auxiliary of the Anglican Church and the Catholic Church holding bazaars and what-not to raise enough money to pay for the street lights in the town. This is the kind of thing that has happened in the little town of Matachewan, set right down in the forest resources of northern Ontario. Yet the resources are not being used to rebuild the economy of that area. They have been sat upon by a licence holder, I repeat, who has not cut himself a stick of timber almost within the last generation. All he has been doing is trafficking in the cutting, by subletting cutting rights.

I say this to the hon. Minister, that if he wants to build the economy of northern Ontario, the basis upon which it can be built is the forest resources, because this is a renewable resource. This is the sound long-term economic base. He is not going to be able to do this, be able to provide the employment for the young people of the north so that they do not have to come south and perhaps get in the end of our unemployed lines when economic conditions get bad again, unless he is willing to sit down with the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts), perhaps through the Cabinet, and be willing to reassess the great natural resources of northern Ontario and make them available, in limits that are no less than are needed.

I am not suggesting for one moment that any company should have its limits cut below what is plant capacity. All I am saying is that their excess limits shall revert to the Crown and be made available to those who want to be able to use them by building secondary industries; or alternatively, that some steps be taken by the government to sort out the species from the limits that are being used by a company now in operation, to make those alternative species available for those who are interested in using that resource for the building of secondary industry.

Has the hon. Minister considered this whole important aspect, the most important aspect for northern Ontario, either himself or in conjunction with his hon. colleagues in the Cabinet?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Chairman, I say the hon. member's point is well taken. I think it is something that certainly should be surveyed and investigated, to see if we cannot improve the economy of northern Ontario. If this is a bottleneck, I would certainly be glad to look into it and discuss it not only with the economic council, but the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests or anybody else who is involved. There has been some discussion with our people about the situation. I think that same situation may exist up around the area we were talking about—Bancroft—with reference to a chipboard plant. I investigated that and I found that it was being used but the chipboard was being made down in Trenton. So it was a matter of carting it from that area down to Trenton, and not putting a plant up in Bancroft. However, if these areas exist, certainly I am interested in looking at them and making any recommendation to the government that will assist the secondary industries.

Mr. Troy: You should speak to the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, a little while ago there was some discussion with the hon. Minister regarding location of industry, particularly with a view to attracting industry to some areas of the province that are considered to have less than sufficient development.

I would like to raise the matter with the hon. Minister from another point of view for a moment, and that is the question of an industry moving from one location to another. I am quite prepared to accept the hon. Minister's proposition that you cannot say to an industry where it is going to invest its money. Investors will invest where they think they will get the best return. We are running into a fair-sized problem of movement of industry and there is a little more involved than merely what an entrepreneur does with his own money. In some cases, there is inadequate consideration of municipalities that may be involved and of workers who may be involved. It is my suspicion, at least, that in some cases, private industries have found it profitable to make a move, because they have shifted some of the cost onto other people.

We know of an outstanding example that was quite a cause célèbre in this area last summer, and that was Amalgamated Electric. It did not move very far. It did not even get outside of the congested section of the province. It moved from inside the city out to Markham. I am not saying the move was bad in itself. I think it is inevitable that manufacturing will move from the centre of the city out into other areas, and I think it may be beneficial in many respects. Some of the benefits that Amalgamated Electric got from its move came from dumping the employees out in the street and getting out from under important obligations to them.

I may say that another move that has been made in the last year or so relates to a company with which the hon. Minister was associated at one time. I think it should be noted that that company—I do not know if the hon. Minister had anything to do with it or not—treated its employees in a manner that one could admire. It certainly did not try to get out from under any obligations to them. It worked very hard to find alternative employment opportunities for those who did not want to move, and this happened to be the majority of them. It gave an opportunity to any who wanted to, to move to the new locations. From anything I have seen of the move of General Steel Wares, no one could take any reasonable objection. But in the Amalgamated Electric move, there certainly was a basis for serious objection.

The government has refused to accept any responsibility in this field. I took the matter up with the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree). I got absolutely nowhere with him. When the move took place, I tried to raise it in the public press suggesting that this was a government responsibility. It was particularly a responsibility, I thought, of the then Minister of Economics and Development, whose constituency was affected. The people affected lived mainly in his constituency. I am going to suggest to the hon. Minister of Economics and Development that a policy should be developed and laid down with regard to industries moving, not to tell them where they may move or where they may not move, but to ensure that when they do move they discharge all their obligations and do not shift part of the cost of the move onto other people.

In the particular case of Amalgamated Electric I do not think the city of Toronto suffered severely, it is a pretty big municipality that can stand that sort of thing. But sometimes when these moves take place the municipality which is abandoned is in very serious straits after having invested substantial amounts of money in municipal services for the benefit of the industry concerned. The new municipality to which the industry may move may find itself faced with substantial investments. All these things are costs of the move that the industry does not undertake.

I am particularly concerned about what happens to employees. Amalgamated Electric was certainly a sad story in the history of Ontario. People who had served it for many years simply were dumped out on the street, most of them were even cheated out of what they thought were their pension rights but apparently were not sufficiently guaranteed, and most of them got very little in the way of severance pay. I do not know if the company was trying to escape the union that existed there. If it was it was disappointed because the union followed it out to Markham. But the point is that the union could not do a thing for the people whom the company left behind in Toronto. I would like to know if the government has any policy—I know it has no policy now—but is it contemplating developing any sort of policy to protect all interests concerned when this sort of move takes place?

Hon. Mr. Randall: No, I do not think there is any stated policy. I think you are going to find good employers and bad employers. The hon. member has stated perhaps two circumstances where the employees were treated the way he would like to see them treated, and others where perhaps they should have been given more consideration.

I was trying to find, in this economic report I gave previously, where I suggested that as these tariff changes come about perhaps there will have to be some rationalization of industry. As it happens, I think out of that will come some of the things the hon. member talks about: That if industry is going to move out of an area for any reason there should be probably some "pre-work" done to plan what happens to the employees, such as we did at the company where I was previously employed. I think most employers would do that.

At the moment the government does not have any legislation to prevent that happening, and I do not think at the present time we contemplate it. I would think that, if that happens, in many instances we can work with the company to try to persuade them to be good citizens and take their employees along with them. I am not too sure, about the company the hon. member mentioned a few minutes ago, that most of the people are not back up there working because as I understand it, they are certainly operating full blast.

Mr. Bryden: They have recruited people in Markham.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Whether they have any of their old employees or not I would not know.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, before we leave the point I would like to suggest to the hon. Minister that the development of policy should not wait until this becomes a really large-scale problem. There is a considerable amount of movement going on now, and I think it is going to increase. Technological change in itself, apart altogether from developments that may take place in the tariff field, is inducing more and more in the way of movement of industry. I think some companies move their plants because they have obsolete plants in high tax areas; they simply move out into lower tax areas and, while they are at it, get up-to-date plants.

This is good. They should be doing that; but I think that the problem is now serious enough that, without waiting for any overall tariff adjustments which will undoubtedly intensify it, I would suggest to the hon. Minister he might start considering a policy to deal with the matter which could be applicable now. It will mean we will have something if it becomes really a major problem.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I would like to go along with the hon. member for Woodbine because the community of Windsor certainly was the prime example of the effects of a major industry leaving a community. It meant $14 million a year lost in annual revenue. I think that this department should give serious consideration, immediately, to a study because there is still the fear that other industries may be leaving the community if they find it financially not profitable to stay. They certainly do have some obligation to the employee before they do leave the community, as well as to the community itself.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister a question in regard to industries. We have councils of towns and villages, and the chambers of commerce give of their time and their money in order to contact an industry which would be interested in settling or establishing in that town or village. Would it be the right procedure to contact the office of the hon. Minister? Would he give them a lead on industries which are interested in establishing here in the province, to contact them? Is that the right procedure, or what suggestions has he along that line?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Yes, we would be delighted to have them come in to see us. We would also be interested in letting them know of any prospects we have who may want to settle in the province.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, also under this heading I would like to ask the hon. Minister another question. As he knows, there has been a great discussion about the surplus of flue-cured tobacco. I know from time to time new markets have been found for some flue-cured tobacco. I wonder if the hon. Minister has anything new to tell us in regard to future markets to get rid of this surplus flue-cured tobacco which is on hand.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Well, I think that question could be better answered by the hon. Minister of Agriculture. I think he has done a pretty good job of solving the problem to date, of helping to solve it. As you know, The Department of Economics and Development under the former Minister visited Japan about a year ago. I think out of that, with the hon. Minister of Agriculture, we did make some sales to Japan. I had hoped to do some, let us say, investigating on this trip to Russia which I cancelled out on, but perhaps before the end of the year—any time I go anywhere I take these problems with me to see if I can open any doors. I think that pretty well is what we can look forward to doing at the present time. I would think the hon. Minister of Agriculture has that pretty well in hand.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister another question? In regard to these offices which he has in Europe, are there displays of agricultural products there at all times, such as tobacco and fruit and vegetables?

Hon. Mr. Randall: No. There has not been, because there has not been a show place for it. The offices are small, as the hon. member will appreciate; although I understand in Dusseldorf we now have some appliances on display. I am pretty sure when we get the chance to visit over there we can find out if we can change the goods around from time to time as you change a store window. That is the programme we envision.

Ontario House will be opened on June 4 and we intend to have a whole bottom floor set up as a showroom there for displaying manufactured goods and agricultural products.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I had noticed the hon. Minister referring to the trip to Japan. I also noticed the hon. member for York South was referring to the need to try to get cheese sold in the United States. I noted, too, the hon. Minister's deep interest in trying to get an export market.

I had been interested in West Germany and the approach, I understand, they have taken. That is, they wanted to move into Egypt, and I have read of this example, in connection with some secondary industry, that they went to Egypt and got what they considered one of the best designers in this particular area, from Egypt itself. They brought him back to their research area and then had him decide how to adapt design and policy and style to fit the Egyptian market. I am wondering, sir, in a sense, whether the hon. Minister has considered doing that, whether he has actually gone out in the way that, for example, the West Germany government has to pick top people and bring them back to work in Canada so that our industry then gets the best advice with respect to style and design and so on in getting right into another market?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Yes, I think it is an excellent idea. You certainly have to make your product fit a market, otherwise people will not take it.

I think we mentioned in our estimates report that we have now 25 co-op buying groups working throughout the United States and Europe. These are people we have brought over here from those markets to tell us how to package a product and what we had to do to sell it in their markets; because they are the people who have to go out and sell it.

As an agent for, say, 12 small companies in, say, the haberdashery business—certainly if the clothing is not designed to sell in that market this man is putting his own investment on the line. He wants to make sure when he leaves here that we have changed the product to fit his market. I think that is essential wherever we go.

On food products, I think it may be such that you do not change a food product because you want to give it the romance and glamour of being an import. If you change it too much it looks like a home-grown product and gets lost; and I think, if you go into a supermarket, you can realize how quickly anything imported can get lost on the shelves. I think keeping the Canadian label, and making sure it stands out as an import product, will probably increase the sale of imported foods.

But on other items I agree with you. I think we should either bring the people over here or go over there and find out what designs are acceptable. I have done that in my business and found it works.

Mr. Thompson: Could I just follow up on that? Would you then—I am thinking of your research centre, the $9 million research centre—it would seem to me if I could suggest this, and I think you probably have yourself, and I just want to reiterate my support on it—that a real role of the provincial government in assisting industry is in research and in connection with retraining. I am not sure with respect to tax reductions for research, whether there should not really be a close liaison with skilled staff. You mentioned that; do you think this is a good idea? Does this mean, sir, that you may be looking, for example, to move into, I could take it, France? You might be thinking of starting to move Ontario industry into this area, and would be looking for research specialists you might attract to come here?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I am not sure I follow you. I think what you mean is, are we trying to get Ontario plants to go and open up a plant in France?

Mr. Thompson: No, no. I am sorry. I am thinking that I feel this, sir, with all respect to the hippopotamus and the sale of "buy Canada" and "buy Ontario," that I think in a sense if we had the style and the quality in goods that we could compete in France, or in Egypt, or in West Germany, or anywhere. If we can compete there then I am sure we will not have much trouble with respect to the Ontario homeowner considering that with Ontario quality and style in goods it is worthwhile buying them here. I just have a certain apprehension that there is a feeling of high tariffs behind the philosophy of this fat overgrown hippopotamus.

I suggest that one way to help to show that we are keen and aggressive and competitive would be if we tried to get into the foreign markets. One way that the Ontario government could help is with research. In particular, one way it could do this is by getting top-notch research design staff from certain areas for the Ontario government. Looking at a co-operative group of industries trying to break into a new field, they would say: "We will go over and we will pick out some top-notch design personnel and we will bring them over to work in our research. We will pay them and they will work with us in conjunction with these industries, so that then you will be able to move into this export area." I suggest, sir, from background reading I did some time ago, that this is what they are doing in West Germany.

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I would just like to make a few comments about the development associations. Most development associations find it rather difficult to plan a programme on a long-term basis because they are never sure of the financial support being forthcoming from the municipality. I was just wondering if the hon. Minister has ever considered setting up a fund to cushion this situation, and give these people enough funds to get over this problem, say, for a year or two years, until the funds would be forthcoming.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Chairman, answering the hon. member's question, we are looking at that now with reference to increasing the grants for some of these projects that the Ontario regional development groups are working on. Their big problem is, we granted them $15,000 apiece but they cannot match it. That is where they bog down. We are looking at this on the basis of where we can improve that grant from our end without them matching it. We would like to see them match it dollar-for-dollar, but if they cannot, that should not be any drawback to getting that particular organization working in that region. There are various regions perhaps where they cannot match the grant we give; we are looking at it.

Mr. Gaunt: Thank you.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could try again to pinpoint an approach that you take. Several minutes ago you mentioned the needle trade and suggested that this might be something that could be developed in northern Ontario. You said you suggested it because of the European background of people there and I assume behind that is the feeling that they would have an acquaintance with the needle trade industry. Just so that we could have some knowledge of your approach on this, where do you go from there? Could I ask you if you have a study or if you have available facts on the skilled kind of labour in the north and the background of European people, or is this just an assumption you have?

Hon. Mr. Randall: That was just an assumption. At the moment, as I said, we are making an economic research study on the type of people going to be required. This was one trade that came up the other day when a manufacturer said he wanted to come into this area and needed 300 people and the 300 people were not available. I think you will realize the needle trade has been a depressed industry for a long while, but is now working almost around the clock. This again is another problem which came up almost overnight. The reason I mentioned the European background is that I think history has shown they are very industrious with their hands. Certainly the experts in the needle trade are professionals and it seems to be the consensus that in any area where we could find those kinds of backgrounds we could probably find skills that either could be trained quickly, or we could find skills that are available but have not been used for some time.

Mr. Thompson: I would follow up because this seems to me a concrete example, sir, to show what you are doing.

Reading the estimates of last year before you became the Minister, I had understood that there was a manpower study being done of Ontario. I assume that this is the manpower study that is being continued. Just to clarify your approach with Ottawa, how do you tie in with Professor Deutsch's approach on the study of manpower? Is he not making an assessment of individual trades?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I do not know how far Dr. Deutsch has gone. As you know, he is just assembling his staff. He has been down to see us a couple of times but we are associating with him through our own Ontario Economic Council. It is hoped that Dr. Deutsch can act almost as a clearing house for all economic councils across the country. We have been perhaps a little more advanced than they have up there because they had, as you know, formerly a productivity council which has now been disbanded. Since Dr. Deutsch took over he has been calling on the various provinces, talking to the chairmen of the various economic councils across the country. Many have different names. We call ours the Ontario Economic Council, and he came to us first. He has made a few visits. We have opened the books and shown him what we are doing, and given him all the information he wants. We will correlate our programmes with him when he gets under way. At the moment, as I say, if you check with Dr. Deutsch, you will find he is busy assembling staff, which is his major problem.

Mr. Thompson: I would assume that the National Employment Service should have some kind of knowledge of the available skills of people in Ontario. What I want to know is, do you not at this time know where there are 300 people skilled in needle work?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Without checking the facts, I would say, no. I do not think they know where there are 300 people available; if they are available, they are all working. What we are looking for is 300 people who are not working. I think that is the nub of the problem—where can we find 300 people in this area or some other area that we can fit into the needle trade?

Mr. Thompson: The national employment service in other countries, such as for example, Sweden, it seems to me carries out a closer study. It, after all, is a central funnelling body for workers going into industry and leaving industry and getting other jobs. Would you want to see our national employment service gathering together the facts?

Hon. Mr. Randall: We have contacts with them, yes. I think there will be a co-operative effort on our part and through the economic council to work with the national employment service. That is where most of the statistics will come from. I think when you compare it with Sweden you are talking about a population of seven million people in a very small country. I think they certainly have had the statistics available to control the movement of people, perhaps more so than any other country we can think of. Just the other day, they were talking about nationalization of industry. They are merging a lot of their small industries. As you know there is going to be quite a dislocation of people, I think, in Sweden over the next few years. So perhaps they are going through some of the things we have been going through on this continent in the last few years too, where a great deal of mergers have taken place and people are available for other work in the same industry and have to be trained for something else. I think with the programme we have set up, and working with the national employment service, we will evolve a plan that will cover the situation, when we get the information we are looking for and do not have today, but which I would think would be available.

Mr. Thompson: Sir, I do not attach any accusations to you; you have taken over this as a new job. But it seems to me, in an industrial province such as Ontario, when we as yet have not had these facts on the capabilities and the skills of our employment force, it shows that someone has been asleep at the switch and, frankly, I would say it is both the provincial and federal governments. However, as we know, the training of people is, I assume, a provincial responsibility, although some of our hon. friends here do not recognize it.

I, sir, would ask this question: we have established that we do not know if there is a surplus of people—let me put it this way—you cannot find the people for this needle trade; now at a later date you are going to have a much closer analysis of the skills of our work force, so you know at this point we are blind about it, searching for a needle in the haystack, if I could refer to it this way. However, sir, I am wondering, with this, would you have a situation where you might need certain skilled people in order to draw others to this industry? I am thinking of a skilled foreman. Has there been an examination of this and if you do need a certain type of skilled foreman or designer, will you go over to hunt for that kind of person and bring them to Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I think that is already being done through the immigration services, both federally and provincially. I think one thing we have to look at in immigration is that it is as if the roof is leaking and it is too late to fix it because it is raining; when it is not raining, you do not have to fix it.

I think immigration is somewhat on that plane. When we have great numbers of unemployed, nobody is too interested in bringing anybody into the country and immigration drops off, as we know it has done over the last several years.

Now in certain areas, like the province of Ontario, where we could use skilled workers, the problem is to find them, because things are pretty good in the places from which we want to bring them. A lot of people are reluctant to leave Europe now. A few years ago, yes, they were anxious to leave. But today, they are all working steadily, the standard of living is increasing and moving up and a lot of those people are reluctant to take off and leave their homes and come over here. Our problem is that of trying to put our finger on the key people you talk about.

Many corporations have gone overseas and through our immigration services in Ontario House and the federal house, they have been able to recruit a number of skilled people and bring them over. The aircraft industry here and the machinery industry are two industries that have, I believe, worked with us in the last few months to bring over skilled workers.

I happen to know of a very fine machine shop here that goes to Sweden and Norway and Denmark when they want to find machinists. They have been having difficulty getting people to come over and take jobs in this country. Even though the wages are higher, their standard of living over there has improved, so it is more difficult to get them to move.

Mr. Thompson: What about nurses?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I will leave that to the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond).

Mr. Troy: I hope, sir, that when your department induces people or arranges for them to come over, they do not have the experience that a Scotsman in my riding had. He was brought over here, he was a skilled worker in a curling stone plant in Scotland.

On one of your trade missions one of the manufacturers was asked if he would find out if somebody who was skilled in the making of curling stones would come over here. Just about a month ago he was told "your job is finished." He brought his family over, bought a home and that was his experience. I do not know, but there is some expression that is used in curling that somebody was way off the broom in that one.

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, might I ask the hon. Minister, in view of some of his answers this afternoon, what liaison he has with the provincial Department of Labour in the retraining programmes, and also The Department of Education?

Hon. Mr. Randall: We are certainly interested in anything they are doing in The Department of Education, and also in The Department of Labour, similar to other departments. These hon. Ministers have programmes. We are aware of what they are doing. We co-operate wherever our services are needed. Certainly if we can make any recommendations to assist their programmes, we do.

I think one of the things we are instrumental in doing through the economic council and through the trade ministry is to make the departments aware of the needs of Ontario industries, whether it be manpower or skilled manpower. We are working, I think, with each of the departments you have mentioned. We have a very close liaison with them.

Mr. S. Lewis: Perhaps one suggestion that might be made arising out of the debate is that the adult retraining centre give a course in the needle trade! I am rather concerned about some of the replies that you have given because what we have now, for instance, in the Metropolitan Toronto area, is a retraining centre retraining well over 1,000 people, close to 50 per cent of them women, for skills which apparently, on the basis of the embryonic studies now made, will be obsolete when they finish their retraining course. And yet the hon. Minister says that there are industries in the province which wish to establish in certain areas, but they lack skills. You cannot find the 300 people in one instance. You may not be able to find the 20 or 50 people in another instance.

I find it rather anomalous that in the one area where retraining specifically is being applied, it is being applied to essentially obsolete skills; and in those areas where the skills are needed there is no hint of retraining whatsoever. I therefore ask again—might there not be some advantage to a co-ordinated committee between Education, Labour and your department, in a formalized fashion, to see precisely where the retraining should take place?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Yes, I think you have a good point. Let me also point out, on the economic council, that it is made up of government, industry and labour and these problems are talked about at the economic council. This problem of the needle trade was not known to us until the man decided he wanted to move a plant here about a month ago. So it is a trade that, overnight, we found that we could probably use 300 people if we had them.

I can assure you we have taken steps to advise the people in The Department of Labour that these skills are needed. Certainly if they are training 300 barbers, it would be nice to turn round and train them to use the needle and get in the needle trade very quickly. Perhaps we do not need barbers, but we certainly need people in the needle trade. I think we are elastic enough that we can change our programme in those areas if we find that these people are needed. As I say, in the needle trade, we just found out about it a month or six weeks ago and we are moving on it.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, is there not a basic pool of skill in the needle trades right here in Toronto? I know people who left the needle trades because—I was going to say the wages were so poor—but I should say the remuneration was so poor. They took what wage rates they could get but in view of the short periods for which they could get work, it was not worth it. I know a fellow now who is a skilled man in the needle trades, a top skilled man, who is delivering milk because he finds that he can get a better living that way. I do not know if some of these people could be induced back into the industry. I do not know the particular phase of the industry in which this new employer operates, but it certainly is an industry that requires very high levels of skill. I think that we have a pool of that kind of skill around here, although we seem to have dissipated a lot of it. I do not know if skilled people can now be located.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, could I ask, leaving the needle trade, I understand the plastics industry is a very dynamic and developing industry in the 20th century.

What kind of retraining programme is developing for people wanting to move into the plastics industry?

Hon. Mr. Randall: My knowledge of the plastics industry is that it is fairly well automatic. You buy a machine and you pour the beads in one end and the finished product almost comes out the other. In fact I do not think it requires the skilled training needed in the needle industry. Most of the plastics parts, even the massive parts today, are coming out of machines that run up as much as 24 hours. They can almost build a table with beads.

I do not think the skills in the plastics industry—we need perhaps a supply of tool-makers to make the necessary moulds and dies used in the plastics field, but once the beads are poured in one end it is almost like pouring it out of a teacup. The finished product comes off and there is very little finishing required, so that it is almost an automated industry. I think if you want any examples of what I mean it lies in the fact that we do not have any Japanese imports of plastics because we can turn them out cheaper here than they can turn them out in Japan, and we do not have the freight haul. That is one of the things we found out in our business, that we could compete against any low labour area, let us say, if we automate it to the *n*th degree. In the plastics industry they turn out miles and miles of garden hose, as you know, every day by just keeping the wheel turning and pouring in the beads. It is almost a hopper feed, so if there is any skill required in that industry it is primarily in the making of moulds.

Mr. Thompson: Well, I have been interested because when we were on the manpower committee last year we had a representation from the plastics industry in which they were suggesting that—I am talking of tool and die designers—but they were suggesting it would be greatly appreciated if the government would consider setting up a design centre for them to encourage research and activity there. The thing, I think, which interested us on the committee was the enormous, rapid growth which had taken place within the plastics industry.

The point I am really after is that I wonder, when we think of the needle trade industry and we think of Ontario—a vast technological field and I appreciate there are opportunities for people now—if it may be useful to encourage them to go into it. It would seem to me our interest should be looking ahead to some of the needs we see in hard skills. To me, one of the things we have been slack on in this province is that for a long time we relied on the flow from Europe of technical people. We did not realize we had a soft spot in our own fabric, that we were not getting the proper training for young people to fit into an industrial age.

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister is obviously perceptive and informed in the field. I wonder, has he any idea when the first major manpower study connected with the new plans for automation is likely to come down—the study which would, in effect, cover the areas which were suggested in the select committee report of last year?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I could not give the hon. member a date at the moment. The federal-provincial studies on that are just getting under way, but I can assure the hon. member that we were going to go ahead on our own, as the hon. Prime Minister said the other day, and it was only through the intervention of the federal authorities who said to slow down until we go it together. So now we are really waiting to see what they want to do along these lines before we make any further commitments. But we are ready, willing and able and they know it.

I would think that within the next three or four months they should have their programme jelled, and we should be getting together with any of the other provinces interested in this foundation of an automation programme.

Mr. S. Lewis: Is there any thought in the hon. Minister's mind of retraining facilities beyond those presently utilized in the province? Is he anticipating, as a Ministry in conjunction with the others, the setting up of any network of retraining facilities which in effect would be ready to go when the manpower study came out?

Mr. R. J. Boyer (Muskoka): That is The Department of Labour.

Mr. Bryden: That is the trouble; it is everybody's business. It is The Department of Education, actually.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I assume the hon. member is referring to an industry which we think may be available to use manpower in the future?

Mr. S. Lewis: Right, yes.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Well, I cannot say yes or no—except that we are putting together this research complex out here at Sheridan

Park. I would imagine, if we do a lot more of our own industrial development out there, of new products for the future, that certainly as those products get under way and are being developed, we will have to think of the types of skills which should be available in order to put them into a plant and turn them out in the production line.

I think, just to give you one example: We talked about the plastics industry a minute ago. There is a lot of misconception about plastics. I think we started out with what we called Bakelite—you could drop a plate on the sink and it would splatter into a million pieces four or five years ago and today you can take a plastic and do almost the same with it as you can do with steel or aluminum.

The chemical companies themselves have developed plastics to a very much greater degree of usability and tensile strength than they ever did before. This, of course, has meant a constant changing of the equipment to produce those parts in factories, and it has been a costly programme. These are some of the things which I believe have created obsolescence insofar as skills are concerned, and perhaps have eliminated people from plants who have had to find other occupations.

I would think, in answer to the hon. member's question, that when we get the research centre going with this research we are talking about, that is one of the things we will have to keep our eye on. If we are developing a product which requires new processing and new skills, we will certainly have to make sure the bodies are there, available for it.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I have tried this twice before, let me try it once again before we leave the vote. Does the hon. Minister have an attitude on fixed assessments? An approach?

Hon. Mr. Randall: The only attitude I have is that I realize they do not have fixed assessments in some provinces and perhaps that is an economic advantage. In this province I learned, when I came into the government, that they abandoned fixed assessments two years ago. I listened to the conversation on Hershey Chocolates, I think the first two or three days in the House, and I realized there were some for and some against. As far as I am concerned, I think any economic advantage to the province of Ontario I would like to see. But on the other hand, Mr. Chairman, the hon. Provincial Treasurer has to make some of those decisions. Unless I can persuade him to change his mind, I will have to go along with what he has recommended.

Mr. Singer: I did not know the hon. Provincial Treasurer—

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would say that the hon. Minister is a most skillful tight-rope walker. I did not know that was one of the skills he had acquired along the way.

However, I want to ask one or two more questions about the fixed assessment problem. If we can believe the information given to us by the people who were sponsoring bills to provide for fixed assessment in special cases in this province, notwithstanding general law to the contrary, one can only conclude that there are certain instances where subsidization of industry will encourage a particular enterprise to locate in a particular place. Now that was the only justification given.

Hershey Chocolates, we were told, had to have their fixed assessment in Smith's Falls because they were promised it and they would not have gone there if they had not received this incentive. Similarly with the enterprise which located at Cochrane. If it was not true, then there was absolutely no reason for the fixed assessment at all. If it is true, then I would suggest that it provides at least a prima-facie case for looking into the question of direct subsidization of industry, particularly in regard to encouraging it to locate in some of the underdeveloped sections of the province.

The trouble with a fixed assessment is that though it provides a subsidy for industry, the entire subsidy is paid by ratepayers in one small municipality. I am not necessarily against subsidization in certain instances, but I think if there is going to be subsidization it should be spread much more widely than that. I do not think that the ratepayers in a municipality which is already having economic difficulties should have the whole cost thrust upon them.

The hon. Minister expressed a very cautious opinion an hour or so ago—I think quite rightly—that you have to be careful about which industries you subsidize, because you can get into a discriminatory position. On the other hand, if there is a role for subsidization, as there must be if there was any justification in these bills at all, then I think it should be looked at from the point of view of an overall provincial policy rather than a concession given by an individual municipality. Is the hon. Minister prepared to give any consideration to that, to have any of his staff look into the possibility of it as a policy?

After all, tax concessions, which have been used with not too great effect I believe, are a form of subsidization; accelerated depreciation for certain types of industries or in certain types of localities, is also a form of subsidization. What about this whole question of subsidizing industry, particularly with regard to inducing it to locate in less developed areas of the province? Has the hon. Minister's department given any consideration to it, or are they preparing to look into it as a possible line of approach in helping to solve the problem of unfavourable location of industry?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Well, let me say this: I do not think we have any intentions not to look at any government which will assist a town in getting industry. This is not new; it is being used in many areas of the United States. For instance, in Arkansas I know that they have very great concessions for industry to go down there, even 100 miles away. It is working a hardship on the areas where they move out leaving a lot of people behind—we just talked about it a minute ago. It is creating employment in a new town that is prepared not to worry about the settlement but to make sure it gets the payroll on Main Street every Friday night. So there are many things that enter into this programme of concessions.

Let me suggest that I talked to a manufacturer not too long ago in a small town and the only thing he was screaming about as unfair was that his freight rates were higher. It cost more to ship from his town to Montreal or Toronto than it did to ship from Toronto or Montreal. I said, "You went up there in the first place because you said you got lower taxes, you got lower-cost land, you got a lower-cost building, and you had many advantages, perhaps you got lower labour costs. Now you are asking the government if we will subsidize you on your freight rates. If we do that you might as well come right back to Toronto here and start all over again where we do not have to give you a subsidy."

No matter where you go with these subsidies there is no end to them, you can keep on going. I think the sooner we recognize that it has got to be an economical operation where everybody holds his place and pays his full cost the better it will be. On the other hand I recognize that in some areas we should give consideration to any possibility of getting industry into a small town, but as we keep pointing out, one concession leads to another. In the near future we should look at lower assessments or fixed assessments. I am prepared to take it to my hon. colleagues, and either have it accepted or turned down.

Mr. Bryden: I think most of us are against fixed assessments because of the undesirable competition they produce among municipalities, but some municipalities are still struggling to maintain the system notwithstanding the change in the general law. I think it should be dealt with from the larger point of view.

Vote 409 agreed to.

Vote 410 agreed to.

On vote 411:

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, earlier in this debate I asked a question about a couple of industries that the former Minister of this department had reported on September 21 last year were coming up to the North Bay area. I have not seen them yet. Is there still some information on file about these industries or when we may expect them?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I understand there are still negotiations going on with those industries. I cannot name them but there are discussions going on and there is still a possibility that we will get them into North Bay.

Mr. Troy: Thanks very much. Hope springs eternal.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, with regard to item 6 under vote 411, could the hon. Minister give us a bit of a breakdown of that figure of $240,000 which is for a number of related objectives—sales missions—export clinics, and so on. Could he give us a breakdown for each item listed there?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Yes. On trade missions the figure is $66,000; the group buyer plans I talked about where we bring the buyers over here and set them up, $15,000; export clinics, $7,000; under Canadian engineering services, we set up $20,000 for selling engineering services abroad, a new part of our programme this year; the MO shows we set up, $25,000; Made in Canada labels, $5,500; small business management and training, $1,000; research for new industry, $10,000—we are looking at a number of new industries, new complexes that we think can be set up in this province. We are doing a study on those—seminars for industrial commissioners, $1,000; municipal education programme, $1,000; United States trade crusade, $65,000. We are spending a lot more of our efforts in the United States as I pointed out a few days ago; achievement awards, $1,000; consultant fees and expenses, $15,000; for unprovided expenses, $7,500. That totals $240,000.

Mr. Bryden: How is it envisaged that the $65,000 will be spent on the item of U.S. promotion? I am not quite sure what the term is that the hon. Minister used, but I take it it is for promotion of Canadian goods in the United States. How does the hon. Minister plan to go about that with $65,000?

Hon. Mr. Randall: In the plans to implement necessary programmes we have trade crusade luncheons, we have six business opportunity missions going over, we have direct mail campaigns for these missions, we have arrangements set up at chambers of commerce and boards of trade in various cities to bring in possible applicants who would like to establish a plant in this province—

Mr. Bryden: If I may just interrupt the hon. Minister, is this a project mainly designed to encourage Americans to come up here and establish plants or is it to encourage Americans to buy our products, or is it both?

Hon. Mr. Randall: We combine three things: we combine trying to get Americans to come up here and set up plants and to get them to buy Canadian goods, and to take out a licence to manufacture Canadian goods or to get a licence to manufacture their goods in this country—a combined programme.

Mr. Bryden: It seems to me that for $65,000 that is rather a tall operation. I have some doubt whether or not the hon. Minister can really do very much with that amount of money in relation to what he is planning. What has been his past experience in this area of operation?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Our experience has been rather encouraging for the small amount of money that we are spending in a market of 200 million people. For instance, we held a meeting in Pittsburgh on June 24 and out of that we got 15 manufacturing arrangements, four branch plants and 21 marketing programmes started. In Cleveland we had 11 manufacturing arrangements, nine branch plants out of that, and 17 marketing arrangements. In Cincinnati, we had 22 manufacturing arrangements, ten branch plants and 12 marketing arrangements. And in San Francisco we had five manufacturing arrangements, six branch plants and ten marketing possibilities of Canadian products over there.

When we work with a chamber of commerce or a board of trade they only bring the people that they think have a genuine interest in what we have to offer, so we are not talking to hordes of people. We are speaking to groups of maybe 40 or 50; in most cases I do not think it runs over 50 people. Most of them are very selective and they only come if they are interested in the message that we have to sell.

May I say that we do a pretty good pre-sell job before they get there. They are not coming there to be wined and dined, they are coming there to do business. We have the order pad in hand and we are ready to set up any kind of programme. Sometimes it lasts for three days. We have a very thorough programme for three days in these areas and make sure we cover the market before we leave and cover all the possibilities. I agree with the hon. member that we could use lots more than $65,000 but that is all I could get in the budget.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, could I ask the hon. Minister then, is this what he means by export clinics, or is this something different again? Is this part and parcel of the total picture? Are the export clinics held here or outside?

Hon. Mr. Randall: No, the export clinics are held here to get more people involved in exporting out of Ontario. In other words, we get some of these men who have been overseas to come back and tour with us, and stand up and tell their story before groups of businessmen. I think they can tell it better than we can, because the listeners say, "Well, you're politicians." But you get an amateur businessman up there who has made his first trip to Europe and come back with an order, and I think what he has to say makes a greater impression than we do on others who have not gone overseas or tried to get into the export business.

For instance, export clinics have been held in London, Fort William, North Bay, Ottawa, Barrie, Kitchener, Vineland, Chatham, Peterborough, Toronto, and we have had over 1,438 people to these clinics; so 1,438 have received this first-hand message as to how you can export and widen your markets.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. Minister indicate the sales missions he has in mind for this fiscal year?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt?

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that the committee of supply rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Mr. Speaker, just before the hon. Prime Minister moves the adjournment, I think for the record all hon. members would like to join me, as one of the Toronto members, in congratulating the Toronto Maple Leafs on winning the Stanley Cup on Saturday. This is certainly something which crosses all party lines because I firmly believe, Mr. Speaker, that most of the hon. members were supporting the Maple Leafs in these playoff games. It is a credit to our capital city and, without a doubt, they are the finest hockey team in the world today. Good luck!

Mr. L. A. Braithwaite (Etobicoke): Just before the House rises, I would like to remind the House that one of the main reasons for this win on Saturday night was one of our honourable citizens from Etobicoke—Red Kelly. I think the House should take notice of that.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the House that one of the reasons for the win is that so many of the hockey players come from northern Ontario.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): In this mood of jocularity, Mr. Speaker, I think I can move the adjournment of the House. Tomorrow we will complete these estimates and proceed with the estimates of The Department of Education.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 6.05 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, APRIL 28, 1964

The House met at 2 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are pleased to welcome to the Legislature today in the east gallery, students from Frank Oak Vocational School, Toronto, and in the west gallery, students from Earl Haig Secondary School, Toronto, and St. Peter's Separate School, Toronto.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Mr. D. A. Evans (Simcoe Centre), from the standing committee on labour, legal and municipal bills, presented the committee's seventh report which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bill with certain amendments:

Bill No. 99, An Act to amend The Police Act.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY ACT

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Legislative Assembly Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Speaker, this bill provides that upon the request of a member there shall be paid out of the monies that have accrued to him at the time the request is made, any part of his indemnity not exceeding $300 per month and any part of his allowance for expenses not exceeding $150 per month.

THE TOURIST ESTABLISHMENTS ACT

Hon. J. A. C. Auld (Minister of Tourism and Information) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Tourist Establishments Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. A. C. Auld (Minister of Tourism and Information): Mr. Speaker, in brief explanation, the amendments provide that the tourist establishments to which the Act applies are confined to those providing sleeping accommodation or to camp sites providing services.

Presently the regulations require preliminary approval of plans to construct a new establishment. The amendments in this bill will authorize regulations to require approval of material alterations to accommodations.

A provision being repealed gave authority to municipalities to pass bylaws in matters to which the regulations apply and required municipal inspection of tourist establishments.

The last change is that the penalty for breach of the regulations is increased from no minimum and a maximum of $100, to a minimum of $10 and a maximum of $500. An additional penalty is provided of $10 for each day a tourist establishment is operated without a licence up to a maximum of 90 days.

THE HOTEL FIRE SAFETY ACT

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Hotel Fire Safety Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is generally to simplify the matter of inspection of hotels and tourist establishment structures, and things of that nature, with respect to safety from fire.

THE PENSION BENEFITS ACT, 1962-63

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Pension Benefits Act, 1962-63.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. members will recall that The Pension Benefits Act, 1962-63, was introduced and received unanimous approval of this Legislature on April 26, 1963. The Act regulates and sets minimum standards for employee pension plans. It should not be confused with a provincial public pension plan, as it has been almost continuously ever since it was introduced. Its purpose is to improve and strengthen the private pension plans of this province by widening the coverage, by ensuring solvency and above all by stemming the loss of pension rights due to job change.

The Pension Benefits Act as it now stands does three main things. First of all, it requires employers who have 15 or more employees to establish standard pension plans providing certain minimum pension benefits. Thus employees in any but very small companies would receive minimum portable pensions related to their service after January 1, 1965, under the bill as it presently stands.

In the second place, if an employer provides benefits above the minimum, these must be portable when the employee has reached age 45 and when he has completed ten years of continuous service. By portability we mean that the employee has a right to pension benefits from his employer's contributions, as well as his own, and further that these benefits cannot be surrendered or commuted for a cash refund except to a very limited extent as set out in the Act. You will recall that was set at 25 per cent. I might add that the portability is Canada-wide, and indeed it is world-wide because the employee's pension is preserved for him no matter where he may go.

Finally, the Act establishes a general supervision over pension plans through the Pension Commission of Ontario. This supervision includes such matters as funding, solvency and investments.

Mr. Speaker, I made it clear when the Canada Pension Plan was first announced last July, that we would support an agreed national pension plan and furthermore that we were fully prepared to amend The Pension Benefits Act to conform to such a national plan. The discussions between federal and provincial governments during the intervening months make it appear that we will have a universal pension plan with uniform benefits and contributions right across the country. Our workers here will be covered by a public plan and there is not the same need now to compel employers to set up standard plans as we did under this Act.

The Pension Benefits Amendment Act which is now before you has as its purpose the repeal of all the provisions concerning the standard pension plan. Henceforth there will be no compulsion on an employer to establish and maintain a minimum pension plan.

The other parts of The Pension Benefits Act are retained. This means that from January 1, 1965, existing pension plans must comply with the portability rules as they were defined for supplementary pension plans. Existing pension plans must also meet the standards of solvency and certain other requirements as set out in the Act.

The rules concerning portability as set out in the Act and as carried on in this amendment, will in future apply to all pension plans regardless of size. In the original Act, the rules on vesting of pensions—that is vesting the employer's contribution in the employee—and the locking in of the employees' contributions only apply to employers of 15 or more employees. This limitation was put in for administrative reasons, as we discussed it here last year, but with the repeal of the standard plan it is possible to extend the advantages of portability to employees of small firms. This has an added advantage in that the making of reciprocal arrangements with other provinces on portability at this level, apart from the national plan, will be considerably simpler.

To indicate what this extension means in practical terms, out of about 7,500 Ontario pension plans, 4,500 are for employers with 15 or more employees and 3,000 are for 15 employees or less. Practically all of the very small pension plans are underwritten by insurance companies or by the federal government annuities branch, so that the making of the necessary amendments that we are proposing in this Act will not be difficult. The employees of these 3,000 small plants will benefit from this change.

To remove any misunderstanding, I would like to emphasize that The Pension Benefits Act is not retroactive. It requires no pension plan to make any change whatsoever in the conditions governing the pensions or refund benefits arising from contributions made before January 1, 1965. Therefore, no one need fear that the benefits to which he is already entitled will be changed in any way by this legislation.

Over 7,500 employee pension plans, whose membership includes one-half of the male paid workers and one-third of the female paid workers are operating presently in Ontario. Constitutionally the regulation of these plans falls to the province and I do not need to recite here the various ways in which portability of pensions and the solvency of these pensions funds adds to the freedom and security of the worker. We went through this and debated it very fully last year and we are all agreed upon it.

But this amended Pension Benefits Act adjusts to the events of this year; it will help to achieve these goals; it broadens the area in which this Act will still be effective, and it does not in any way interfere with the development of a nation-wide public plan.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I wish to announce to the House that, as chairman of the executive committee of the Metropolitan Toronto and Region Transportation Study, I have, with the vice-chairman, the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett) today entered into agreements with three transportation consulting agencies for the purpose of:

1. Undertaking a survey to determine the public acceptance, costs and economic feasibility of establishing an experimental rail commuter service to operate between Burlington and Ajax, and

2. Conducting an overall scientific survey of transportation characteristics and requirements of the entire region extending from Hamilton to Bowmanville and stretching as far north as Barrie.

It will be recalled that the transportation study organization was created just over a year ago by the government to investigate and report on an overall transportation policy for the metropolitan region which I have described.

In the first stage of its operations it carried out a study of the potential use of the 15 railway lines radiating in all directions from the downtown area of Toronto. A report of this study was distributed to all hon. members and widely publicized. This study reported that use could be made of 280 miles of railway lines in the area for the purposes of public transportation providing suitable terminal facilities can be made available. And, more particularly, that about 80 miles of these lines and rights-of-way could be adapted for fairly frequent rail commuter use or rapid transit as well as general railway use, with varying degrees of modification.

It should be pointed out that this new study, involving the possibility of an experimental rail commuter service, should when completed and evaluated provide the study organization with information necessary to determine not only the physical feasibility but also, most importantly, the economic feasibility of introducing such a service to this highly populated region.

In no way can it be construed as a commitment to introducing such a service in the near future. It is merely a further step in attempting to determine what use, if any, can be made of these facilities, as they may become available, in bringing about an efficient overall solution to the transportation problems of the region.

We are proceeding with this extra study in co-operation with the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railway companies, to provide precise information on the cost of carrying out necessary modifications and providing other necessary operating facilities in the light of public requirements and acceptance of this form of transportation.

The survey of transportation characteristics will include a study of regional land use, population, employment and other factors which can be used in a computer analysis for evaluating all forms of travel in an integrated transportation system operating throughout the region. It is expected that this data will establish formulae to determine where transportation demands will arise in the future and how they can be served most efficiently. Furthermore, it is anticipated that the results also will provide general data which can be used as basic material in possible transportation studies of other regions.

The portion of the survey covering the area within the Metro boundaries will be carried out in co-operation with the Metropolitan Toronto Planning Board.

The surveys to determine rail commuter acceptance and traffic characteristics will involve many thousands of residents within the region. Together, they will form the largest and most comprehensive transportation study ever undertaken in Canada.

I would like to ask all hon. members who represent ridings within the study area to do everything they can to encourage the fullest co-operation of their constituents in carrying out this massive project. It is realized that residents in some parts of the region have developed an antipathy toward surveys, mainly as a defence against the intrusion of salesmen using unscrupulous selling tactics. As many thousands of telephone and home interviews will be required over a prolonged period, it is essential that we receive the unreserved co-operation of all those who may be contacted so that the project can be completed expeditiously. All information gathered in the household surveys will be kept confidential and used only for statistical purposes.

This is an important phase of the overall study which would result in great benefits to the entire 2,000,000 population of the region and, possibly, other regions of the province as well as contributing greatly to maintaining the high standard of transportation which the economy and the people of the province demand.

The results of these rail commuter studies and recommendations arising from them are expected to be known late in the fall, and the results from the other survey will be ready for analysis by the end of the year.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The twenty-fourth order, House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS AND DEVELOPMENT

On vote 411:

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Mr. Chairman, regarding The Department of Economics and Development, I would like to bring before this House a matter of extreme urgency to all of us insofar as the levels of our lakes is concerned and how they will affect the economy of Ontario.

You probably all saw in the morning Globe and Mail, the story of the low level of the water on Georgian Bay and Lake Huron insofar as it affects shipping, shipbuilding and every aspect of our economy in that area. I would like to bring this before the House and ask the consideration of not only the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall), but the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) in taking immediate action. As the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Boyer) will bear out, these lake levels at the present time have cost the Hydro—

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, how does this particular subject come before us under this vote?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, I submit it is trade and industry.

Mr. Chairman: Continue.

Mr. Sargent: As the hon. member for Muskoka will bear out, this lake level problem has cost us an increase of $12 million in our Hydro rates to date. That is a matter of fact from one of the hon. member's fellow commissioners. It also will cost us, shortly, thousands of jobs in our area in the shipping business because we cannot get our ships into our harbours to unload grain. It could be carried as far as the ridiculous point that the people who are losing many millions of dollars in their businesses could take joint suit against the government. It could cost millions of dollars for the cottages embracing Georgian Bay and Lake Huron. I would ask the House to consider asking the hon. Prime Minister to summon, by asking the joint commissions, the governors of the states of Michigan, New York and Illinois, to tie in with the federal government, a sort of a liaison, to bring about an immediate crash programme to solve this problem.

Now it will be argued that this is not a provincial responsibility. I do not know how true that is. But I do know the problem is ours, Mr. Chairman. This is going to cost thousands of jobs; it is going to cost millions of dollars in our economy, and I think it is a matter of urgency that you call a high level conference to devise a crash programme to find an immediate solution to put the water back in Lake Huron and Georgian Bay that is being drained out into other sources.

And I think, Mr. Chairman, it is so important to us on Georgian Bay and Lake Huron that we deviate from this vote to ask the hon. Prime Minister if he would consider taking such steps.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, this whole matter, of course, is under very close investigation. Look at the situation as far as the Great Lakes are concerned. While we in Ontario, border on the northern shores of the Great Lakes, also involved are seven or eight of the United States. The water, sir, drains out of Lake Michigan, enters the Mississippi river system and eventually empties out into the Gulf of Mexico. Of course, the other drain through on the Great Lakes system is to the St. Lawrence river and out through Quebec. There are many jurisdictions involved. This matter is presently receiving a great deal of study and I can assure you that this government has no intention of sitting by idly and watching these events take place without making all the moves that we can in order to do what can be done.

But I point out to the hon. members that this is a problem of immense magnitude. It is not simply a problem of, as the hon. member says, putting this water back into the Great Lakes. It is not that simple. There are enormous forces of nature at work. I can recall in 1952, for instance, when there was a select committee of this Legislature set up at that time to deal with the reverse of this problem. They spent a year studying what could be done in order to reduce the level of the Great Lakes because at that time docks were floating away and the exact opposite of the present situation was the case.

Various governments and government projects were blamed for that. Some people are looking now at the St. Lawrence Seaway and the deepening of it as one of the reasons why the water is draining out of the Great Lakes. At that time, there had been a new dam built down the St. Lawrence and this dam was supposed to have dammed all this water up through the Great Lakes, which was carrying away docks and all sorts of things.

I only use this to illustrate to you the very large problem that we are dealing with. I notice in the London Free Press of a day or so ago that there are very intense investigations apparently being made by the American Army engineers, to whom I believe falls this responsibility in the American government set-up. They are looking at the possibility of some form of water control at the northern end of the St. Clair river, where the water drains out of Lake Huron. The amazing thing is that these water levels are down throughout the whole lake system. In other words, there is no one particular spot where it is not down.

Some people advance the theory—and of course, this is certainly borne out by our experiences with water apart from the Great Lakes, when we think of the water situation in southwestern Ontario, the Chatham area and down into Windsor and north into Huron county—that we have had something like one-third of normal rainfall for the last three years.

This is pretty general over the whole drainage area of the Great Lakes. This is one explanation advanced for the low water levels. This is one of our own measurements of rainfall which indicates to us that the water just simply has not been falling. Wells are dry, and the water table is down. But that is not necessarily the whole problem.

I can assure hon. members of the House that we are very aware of the magnitude of the problem. That is why the emergency water programme that was discussed in this House last week has been brought in. It does not deal with the water levels in the Great Lakes. It deals with the water levels of farmers' wells and the general level of water in the water tables throughout the province. But these two problems are not unrelated, even though the cure for them may not be the same.

It may be that the only way to solve the problem of the levels of the Great Lakes is to introduce additional water from some other source into the whole Great Lakes system. That water can fall out of the sky and replenish the streams and the rivers, which in turn will replenish the lakes. We know from our own records that the rainfall has been very low. Perhaps in Owen Sound there was a lot of snow. But south of there, there was an amazingly small amount of snow this winter. As a matter of fact, the snow was gone from that whole central region of western Ontario shortly after Christmas and never did come back. There was no spring run-off this year because there was no snow. This has two effects. One, it affects the farmers' wells. Two, it has a very direct bearing on the ultimate water level of the Great Lakes.

I can only assure the House that we are aware of this problem in all its ramifications, in both of these areas. In one we are taking immediate action and the other, in my opinion, is a long-range problem because it involves so many jurisdictions and it involves such an enormous area.

We have had some discussion here about the possibility of diverting water from other watersheds into the Great Lakes system. If you look at the magnitude of those schemes from an engineering point of view, you are looking at ten or 12 or possibly 15 years research and work before they could happen. It is a long-range problem. But I can assure you that we are doing, and will continue to do, what we can to ensure that it is studied and that we find a solution.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the hon. Prime Minister—

Mr. R. J. Boyer (Muskoka): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. The hon. member for Grey North has referred to Hydro in connection with low water levels. I want to assure him and the House that because of Hydro's stabilization of rates reserves, which are held to overcome difficulties such as we are in at the present time due to low water levels, that we have been able in Hydro to draw on those reserves to meet this situation and to pay additional costs of coal so as to maintain electric supply and to keep the rates at their present level.

The hon. member has said that there has been an increase of rates on this account. This is not the case. There are still funds in this reserve. He has stated to the House that one of the commissioners has told him that there has been an increase in rates, or will be an increase in rates, and I would like him to name that commissioner.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, in answering the hon. member for Muskoka, he is correct in this regard. He is aware of what the 13th power bill is. It was at a deficit this year and the reason there was no 13th power bill was because of the increased cost to Hydro from the lower lake levels. I think you will agree on that. The inference was that the over-all Ontario costs for the low lake levels were causing a $12 million increase to your budget.

Mr. Boyer: This is coming out of the fund.

Mr. Sargent: It does not matter how you arrive at it—

Mr. Boyer: The hon. member has misunderstood the situation.

Mr. Sargent: It is $12 million. The point is, I would like to thank the hon. Prime Minister for his concern, but I would like to ask him—and this is to finalize this—to what extent the province is involved in these studies. The people of our whole area are looking to you to lead in this matter and bring it to a head, and not look to Ottawa to solve it. It is affecting us here, and I would very much like to ask you to tell us to what extent the province is involved in solving this problem.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: If you are referring to the problem in your own area, we brought in an emergency water programme last week, during the estimates of The Department of Energy and Resources Management, and it was set out right there what we are doing.

Mr. B. Newman: (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, on vote 411, the previous Minister (Mr. Macaulay) conducted a series of export clinics throughout Ontario. These involved a considerable expenditure of funds. Directly across the river in the city of Detroit, just this past week, was an American Society of Tool Manufacturers Engineers show. At this exhibit of manufacturing tools, only two Canadian companies were involved. Only two showed up and took part in this show. There were likewise two who acted as representatives for European manufacturers. There must be something kind of peculiar when you have the largest tool exposition in the world, so close to the largest province in Canada, yet the best we could do was to attract two Canadian manufacturers to participate in the clinic or in the show, to come along and look for business that is so sorely needed, especially business in the U.S. This certainly could have had a marked effect on the balance of trade.

I would like to know what this hon. Minister is doing to encourage our own Ontario manufacturers to partake in such an exposition. This would have been a cheaper thing to promote—simply writing letters informing various manufacturers of this opportunity, rather than actually conducting the clinic yourself. Mr. Jack Kent of the Windsor Daily Star, writing in a column, chastises Canadian industry and probably rightly so. He mentions the absence of Canadian firms and suggests that either our firms are not interested in U.S. business, or are afraid of the U.S. market, or are too busy to bother about it. Whatever the reason, the Canadian manufacturers should keep a sharp eye open toward this tool show in succeeding years. Some Canadian firms are finding a lot of good business in the U.S., and there is a growing trend toward a more open-door trade policy between the two countries.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister, is his department doing anything to encourage the Ontario manufacturer to partake in such expositions?

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Economics and Development): Yes, Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to answer the hon. member on this. First of all, I think he touched on two things. The clinics we hold are export clinics to advise manufacturers how they can get into the export market. Attendance at the exhibitions in the international field up to now have been pretty well assigned or controlled by the federal trade Minister. I think you will recall there was one held in Philadelphia last fall. In that show, over 50 Ontario manufacturers participated.

I do not know how many tool manufacturers participated in the show in Detroit, but I would just say this to you: We have set up in our budget this year $100,000 for foreign exhibitions and this is to give us an opportunity to join with the federal government in participating in some of these offshore exhibitions. We have a very keen interest in them. I agree with you that we should be in as many exhibitions as we can, and what we try to do here is encourage the manufacturers to display their goods. I think if you talk to the federal people about what they have done, you will find they have had the manufacturers ship their goods to Ottawa, they have crated them for export in many instances, and they have taken them over and sent federal people over to run the exhibit where the manufacturer could not afford to have his own man on the stand. I have had some experiences myself. I would say that in this coming year we will participate in international affairs, we hope in co-operation with the federal government, because with $100,000 you cannot go too far.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, has the hon. Minister done anything to encourage Canadian participation or Ontario participation in this show by tool manufacturers? This was in the city of Detroit just this past week, and it certainly is a shame when we find only two Canadian manufacturers interested in such a project that could mean so much business here in the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I do not know how many manufacturers are showing. I would say there will be a lot of Canadian manufacturers visiting those exhibits. Certainly we will give every bit of encouragement to manufacturers to participate in these American shows. Frankly, I feel this is where we are going to get our biggest return in the export market, because we are already pre-sold on the kind of goods we are manufacturing in Canada. We do not have to make the product fit the American market. It is pretty well designed after American designs, to compete with Americans in this market. I think very definitely we will be able to convince a lot more of our manufacturers to participate in these international shows, particularly in the United States.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, if I may pursue this one step further. Has this department done anything to encourage participation in this show that has just taken place?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I cannot answer that. We try to get manufacturers to participate in every international show. I would have to dig this one up and try to get the information for you, but I would say we have not made any specific drive to get people into this particular tool show. I will be glad to make some inquiries, and see what effort was made along these lines and whether we contacted any manufacturer, and let you know.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, surely the hon. Minister would know such an important thing. The largest tool exhibit in the world would have merited a little better answer than what the hon. Minister gave us at this time. He should know whether any encouragement was given on the part of his department to industry throughout the province of Ontario to attend this.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I think, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is probably not aware of the hundreds of exhibitions that take place in the United States year in and year out, month in and month out, and we are certainly not aware of all the exhibitions. I appreciate that this is a large one and anybody manufacturing tools or machinery equipment should be in it, but 3,500 shows are held throughout the United States in the course of a year and I do not think any manufacturer could participate in all those shows.

We have a pretty good machine tool show here ourselves, as you know, once a year in the Toronto exhibition grounds. It takes the entire Coliseum building. I think that our Canadian manufacturers are doing a pretty fair job in getting into foreign markets with their equipment. We will certainly never be able to cover all the shows. I think if we had two manufacturers at the one in Detroit, perhaps next year we will have 200.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, if I may point out once more, this is not just an ordinary exposition, this is the largest tool exposition in the world. This is not just some small exposition that may have been conducted in some centre farther down in the U.S. Over 40,000 engineers and technical people were at the affair. Certainly this government should have done something to encourage local—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I do not care. The hon. member for Kent West (Mr. McKeough) can do all the heckling he wishes. I am interested in promoting Ontario and Canada in the United States. And if I can promote it by making a few remarks in this House and having a few of the disinterested Tory members heckle me, that is quite all right. They do not suffer from the unemployment that my community does. I want to see my community just as well off as other communities in the province of Ontario. What is good for the larger metropolitan areas is also good for the city of Windsor.

If by hollering a little in this House, we can encourage a little more action on the part of The Department of Economics and Development, I am here for that purpose.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Your level of interest is so low that boredom easily sets in.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 411 agreed to.

Vote 405 and vote 412 are combined.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, when the hon. Minister introduced his estimates, there was much talk about housing. In my reply, I tried to extract from him what programme we really have for housing and what programme he has announced.

True enough, some of the newspapers patted him on the back and said, "Here is a bold new plan for housing." But, Mr. Chairman, in the five years I have been here, every year has begun with a brand-new bold programme for housing. The latest one we had came from the hon. Minister's predecessor. It was a 12-point programme hailed as the greatest thing that North America had ever seen or the world had ever seen. The hon. Minister's predecessor, the hon. member for Riverdale (Mr. Macaulay), promised that in a year the problem of housing was going to be solved in Metropolitan Toronto.

Mr. Chairman, just two days ago I had a call from a gentleman who lives in the city of Toronto.

He advised me that he was earning $50 a week; he had five children and he urgently needed accommodation at a rate he could afford. He was paying a rental that was far above and beyond his means.

He had made application for an apartment in the Lawrence Heights development some considerable time ago and he asked if I could help him to obtain some accommodation in that development. As I do in matters of this sort, I communicated with the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority, which is an agency of this government. They advised me that this gentleman's name had been on the list for two years, that they were fully aware of his need for housing and that they sympathized a great deal with his request.

However, Mr. Chairman, after two years of being on that list, this gentleman had received the rating of No. 180. In other words, there needed to be 179 people dealt with before this man could get reasonable accommodation for himself and his family at a rate that he could afford.

So I say, Mr. Chairman, where is the housing policy that we hear so much about in this House year after year, that the government unleashes all its publicity agents so to pat itself on the back and say, "What great fellows are we, look what we are promising?"

This is the government that can bring out the same housing plan, or the same building announcement, a half a dozen times with a different lead paragraph and say, "Look what great fellows are we, we have another programme or another plan." But there is not a single thing really, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. Minister's predecessor did to advance the cause of housing in Metropolitan Toronto.

As I read the hon. Minister's speech, it is all so surrounded with ifs, ands and buts and maybes, that it still leaves me with a great deal of doubt as to what end the hon. Minister is aiming toward. He says, for instance, and I am reading now from Hansard, page 2391:

Under the programme contemplated, the province could assume full jurisdiction for planning, directing and administering the housing programme—

Now does the hon. Minister mean that the province is prepared to assume, or is it just thinking about assuming? I grant you, Mr. Chairman, that there is a problem with the federal jurisdiction, the negotiations that have been going on there, and whether the federal government is going to act in certain ways. But this hon. Minister is not prepared to say that even if the federal government enacts the legislation, that we suggest it should, or we hope it should, or that we will do certain things. There is not one positive statement in his housing programme that indicates that he is going to do anything at all. It says the government "could assume full jurisdiction." A paragraph later, he says:

For example, having decided on the need, location and size of project required, the province could invite builders to submit proposals on a competitive basis for houses—

Does the hon. Minister mean the province intends to invite builders? When are they going to start on this intention if that is what they mean? Or are they just thinking about it again? Another paragraph, the one immediately following:

Another method could be the purchase of houses in existing subdivisions wherever economically feasible.

Well, it could be. It could be any one of a thousand other things as well. Does the government intend to buy any houses in existing subdivisions? What does "economically feasible" mean? Has the hon. Minister any tests for the economic feasibility of a plan of this sort?

It is not too long ago, Mr. Chairman, that I brought an application before a certain planning board in this metropolitan area and suggested that a method could be evolved if certain of the planning standards were changed somewhat whereby lower cost housing could be produced. And I solicited, amongst other planning experts, the planning staff of this province to get some assistance in this idea. But the chief planner who came out of The Department of Municipal Affairs—and he came under very violent objection, he had to be subpoenaed—came into the witness box and said, “I have no thoughts on the matter at all.”

Is this hon. Minister, for instance, using the facilities of The Department of Municipal Affairs, the planning aspects of it, to do something about co-ordinating a housing effort? Or does he know what The Department of Municipal Affairs is doing insofar as housing is concerned? What are the views of the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs? (Mr. Spooner's) planners insofar as housing is concerned?

How big should a subdivision be? How big should the lots be? How is he going to proceed about integrating subsidized houses into some subdivision? Is it important that a lot have 50-foot frontage? Could it not be 40 feet to enable the production of a cheaper house? What are the views and how long is it since he and his officials have met with the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs and his officials?

Is there any unified plan for housing coming forward; not from this hon. Minister, not from his predecessor, but from government? A plan that really means something? A paragraph later on he says:

Here is an indication of what we would like to do—

Well, it is all very fine for the hon. Minister saying “we could do, we might do, we would like to do, and if it is economically feasible, we will.” But surely when a man in the position of the gentleman who came to me the other day is unable to get decent accommodation for himself and his family, a man who earns $50 a week, who has five children, who has been on the waiting list of Lawrence Heights for over two years, and is told he has reached the wonderful status of No. 180 on this list; surely when there are facts like this they should be apparent to this hon. Minister, as they are to almost all of the Metropolitan Toronto members of this House. Surely the hon. Minister should say something more than ifs, ands and buts.

Very briefly, Mr. Chairman, I think we are entitled to know, at long last, is there a housing programme being brought forward by this government that means something more than these pious statements of goodwill that we have heard over lo, these many years? The hon. member for Riverdale a year ago said if the steps are taken in his world-renowned 12-point programme, there will be no problem in Metropolitan Toronto today. The problem is much worse in Metro today than it was a year ago. It is going to get much worse a year from now than it is today. I say this: pap, that is all we have, 12 pages of pap in the hon. Minister's speech insofar as the housing programme is not good enough. This government should give some leadership in providing a housing programme. It is just afraid to wrestle with it.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Chairman, answering the hon. member, I think first of all let me assure him there are more authorities in the housing field than Carter has got liver pills. Everybody is an authority on what you should do about housing. On taking over the portfolio from the former Minister, I first of all had to decide what we were worrying about, how major the problem was and then decide how we were going to do something about it.

These proposals I brought out in the submission a few days ago, with the recommendations that were forwarded to Ottawa since we took over the department, are based on the findings of our own director of housing and his staff. They were accepted by the late Mr. Garland as answering the problems of housing, not only in this metropolitan area, but in this province as a whole. I think perhaps you will find that the same recommendations will be accepted by many other jurisdictions.

We do not apologize for the past. I think there has been much done in the past, as I talked about the 12-point programme which the hon. member criticized the other day. A good many things have happened to the housing programme. Some of our own people have discussed this matter of people waiting for homes, waiting to get accommodation. One month they say there are 5,000 people staring you in the face; the next month they say we are building too many homes and should not build any more. With those problems we certainly were not going to rush out with a housing programme without a great deal of consideration.

Mr. Singer: Do not rush. A new programme every year on paper is much better than rushing.

Hon. Mr. Randall: We have a report here on the need for housing. The people who placed their names with Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority totalled 18,281, of whom 14,220 were rejected for other reasons, not because there was lack of accommodation. So you can see there is much to discuss with reference to housing, even in the number of people who make application for housing.

Perhaps you would be interested in a waiting list report that we have prepared and gone over very carefully. There is undoubtedly a pressing need for more public housing rental units in Metropolitan Toronto. However as we hear many conflicting stories concerning the degree of need, I have obtained some factual information from the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority, which as you know administers the rental housing for us. The present active waiting list of the authority numbers 1,800. The current rate of application is about 200 per month, of which 50 per cent originate in the city of Toronto proper and 50 per cent in the constituent municipalities of Metro.

Interestingly, the turnover in existing units in Metro is about 14 per cent, or 350 units per annum. In addition, only about one-third of the eligible applicants accept accommodation when it is offered to them. There are a number of reasons why accommodation is refused, such as: lack of transportation or other neighbourhood facilities, 21.9 per cent; rules and regulations unacceptable, 7.9; social stigma, 36.8—"I do not want to live with Joe";—dislike offer, 11.5 per cent; family reasons, 7.9.

Incidentally, in regard to the family's ability to pay rent in the Metro Toronto projects, unserviced rents account for approximately 22.5 per cent, whereas service rents, which include heat, water and janitorial and other services, account for approximately 27 per cent.

I think the reasons for turning down accommodation which I have listed are interesting and serve to indicate that no matter how badly a family may require housing, it still will exercise its prerogative to decide where and how it will live.

I think one thing that is overlooked in this housing field is the social and psychological problem that we have in moving people who do not want to move. I think it is analogous to the story of the Boy Scout who said he did his good deed for the day. They said, "What did you do?" He said, "I helped a little old lady across the road, but it was not a very good deed." They said, "Why was it not?" And he said, "Well, she did not want to go."

I think in housing the same problem happens. Quite often we worry about moving people in a hurry without giving it due consideration. Certainly in this city we have a number of housing problems we think we can solve with this legislation which I am quite sure will be brought down at this session up in Ottawa. It is already on the order paper in Ottawa. In fact, I am given to understand that perhaps this week it will get first reading. We believe in taking every step that we can take to prepare ourselves by setting up the Ontario Housing Corporation to do all the things that I said we would do last Thursday. I spelled them out, such as buying old homes, renovating them, getting builders to supply homes on perhaps a lower cost basis than we have been able to get in the past, and providing the kind of housing people want without jamming them into large housing projects.

I will go back to the one I dealt with after taking over on November 8, and that was Etobicoke. I think that one has been on the record for almost two years. How many manhours and how much money it cost to get it to the point where a month ago we got that housing programme settled once and for all, I do not know. I would say that the difficulty with housing is primarily because the federal government, as you know, put up 75 per cent of the money, the province put up 17.5 and the municipalities put up 7.5. Our position, as I have stated before, is somewhat like the ham in the sandwich. We have restrictions from the federal authorities—

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Could you make that corned beef?

Hon. Mr. Randall: The hon. Minister of Reform Institutions would like us to make that corned beef. For him, we will!

The federal authorities have restrictions on what we could do with the 75 per cent, and in many areas the municipalities could not do very much with their 7.5—they could not find the money. We recognize the problems of the municipalities. We also recognize that they do not want a housing unit shoved out there unless they are prepared to negotiate on it and on this basis we have prepared these recommendations. The hon. member is right, until The National Housing Act is changed in Ottawa, we cannot implement the programme I gave last Thursday. But I am quite sure we will carry on with the old programme at a greater rate than we did in the past, because now we recognize what some of these problems are and I think we have a better relationship with the municipalities.

I have talked to a number of people who have large numbers of housing projects in their municipalities. I think we have a good understanding of why we should have housing. In fact, they are more than cooperating with us to see that these projects, even on the old basis, will move ahead a lot faster this year than they did last. I am hoping, and, I am certain and would almost bet money on it, that The National Housing Act will be changed in Ottawa within the next few weeks and we will be in business on the basis I outlined. I would like to reiterate that this is the basis we worked out and recommended to the federal authorities, sir, which they have recognized will work in this province and perhaps in other provinces. If it comes through as we anticipate, we will have a very good and a very sound housing programme.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I think it is very interesting that the hon. Minister tells us about the difficulties in this field. If this was a very simple field even this government could have solved it. But it is not a simple field and that is the reason there has been so much agitation about it. It is not a simple field at all. All the things the hon. Minister says are in fact correct.

Nobody is suggesting that you build these massive group housing efforts any longer. Thinking has advanced far and beyond that. It has even seeped into the department. Even the department has begun to realize there are different ways of doing things. I am certain that if there needs to be any action out of Ottawa it will be forthcoming, and I share the hon. Minister's optimism in this because I am sure Ottawa recognizes its responsibilities well.

But even now we have not heard from the hon. Minister that these "could's" or "we might's" or "if it is economically feasible's" are part of positive programmes that this government pledges it will undertake if it gets the legislation. Not all of these things that he talked about require federal legislation or change in the federal legislation. Many of them can be done with the existing legislation.

His predecessor said he was going to do them when there was not even any talk about changing The National Housing Act. This hon. Minister is not even as bold as that. Really, what I insist this province is entitled to is a positive programme of housing—not a history of the difficulties, we all know the difficulties; not a new recital every year when these estimates come up, of the great things we are going to do, or the in-between recitals of the great new projects that suddenly have been announced.

The hon. Minister gave himself sort of an oblique pat on the back over the efforts in Etobicoke, but the Etobicoke matter had gone on for the better part of two and a half years and it is not settled yet. There is all this intermingling of authorities. There is the provincial authority and the metropolitan authority and the federal authority. How is the hon. Minister going to set up a programme that will cut through this red tape? Who is calling the tune? Are we going to listen for months and months and years before we get any of these things on the ground? Has the hon. Minister no suggestion in regard to these things? What happened to the housing advisory council? He is replacing it with a limited corporation which is going to take over.

I asked the hon. Minister if it was true that the committee that his predecessor set up had not met since the day he took office and he did not answer me. I presume the information I had is right. The committee has not met. He picked on two members of the committee, Mr. Soble and Mr. Dymond, two very capable gentlemen who would have, I am sure, some excellent thoughts insofar as housing is concerned. But with great sound and waving of flags, pet Tories were picked from all over the metropolitan area and put on this great housing committee.

A very charming lady out in my riding who is the head of the local Conservative organization was put on this committee. She got her picture in the bulletin and she thought this was great. But she has not even been called to a meeting. She is very capable and could have given the hon. Minister good advice if he would listen to her, but he does not let her come to a meeting to give any advice.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Did she tell the hon. member that?

Mr. Singer: I suggested to the hon. Minister there has not been a meeting since he took office. He has not denied it and I presume that my information is right. I say it is a shame to waste all this good talent that he has—all these people whom he put on the committee and whose pictures he put in the bulletin, yet now he does not give them anything to do.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I was trying to establish whether she was a good Tory.

Mr. Singer: Well, she was president of the Tory local organization, I presume—

An hon. member: Is there such a thing as a good Tory?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: There is the problem, Mr. Chairman. We need a programme, we do not have one yet, and I would like to get some assurance from the hon. Minister that some serious programme is being put forward. We have not had one in this province for a number of years and it is high time we did.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Chairman, I would be very glad to answer the question from the hon. member about the meeting. When he refers to the advisory committee, let me say first of all that we do not ask people which party they belong to before we ask them to go on the housing authority.

Mr. Singer: Oh, I am sure you do not.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I might tell you we have 39 housing authorities across this province and if you want to take a poll I think you will find that the political aspirations of each party are fairly well divided.

Mr. Singer: I was talking about the advisory committee.

Hon. Mr. Randall: And the advisory committee likewise. I will give you a report on the advisory committee because, fortunately, this is a working committee and sometimes we are better off with a working committee than one that meets too often.

The last meeting of the full advisory committee was held on March 30, 1963. At that time the committee reviewed studies which had been carried out over a period of several months by two subcommittees. It approved in principle the proposal that an Ontario housing corporation be formed, and instructed the finance subcommittee to carry out further detailed studies in order that the formation of an Ontario housing corporation could be formally recommended to the government. These studies were to include the administrative, financial, and legislative framework of the corporation.

The finance subcommittee carried out its study during 1963 in co-operation with officials of the housing branch, now a department of the Treasury. Mr. Ken Soble and Mr. A. E. Dymond met with me a month or two ago and, after reviewing the findings of the committee, recommended that I take steps to form the proposed corporation. These we have already done.

When the Ontario Housing Corporation comes into being, its board of directors will replace the Ontario housing advisory committee. This was the view and the recommendations of the committee. And the reason why the advisory committee has not met for a considerable time is not due to the fact that it had become inactive, but because its finance subcommittee was carrying out studies of considerable depth and importance. Meetings of the main committee are on the call of the chairman and, naturally, Mr. Soble wished to obtain the government's views on the proposed housing corporation.

I have no doubt the matter would have been dealt with more expeditiously but for the fact that there was a change of Ministers and Mr. Soble wished to allow me a reasonable time to settle in before bringing his proposal forward. He brought it in shortly after I took office and I introduced the bill here for first reading the day before yesterday.

I think you are getting some action in the housing field—

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Chairman, I would like to step into the area of housing in Metropolitan Toronto. I am curious—

Hon. Mr. Randall: The hon. member might as well; everybody else has.

Mr. S. Lewis: Well, I gathered that, Mr. Minister, but I do not have any of the entrepreneurial aphorisms to throw at the hon. Minister as to taking old women across the street, and "nothing succeeds like success." But I would like to offer some reflections on the housing situation in Metropolitan Toronto.

Let me begin, Mr. Chairman, by congratulating the hon. Minister for the basic content of his estimates and the manner in which he has handled them. The only one of the parts which caused me great concern, was this aspect which dealt with housing because it definitely had the conjunctive approach; everything was couched in "ifs" and "woulds". It tended to be totally predicated on the amendments to federal legislation, and that did cause some anxiety.

However, I would like to say to the hon. Minister that I for one am prepared to reserve judgment temporarily, after making some remarks. But let me tell him this—and I tell it to him without any personal animosity whatsoever—that we on this side of the House next year are going to hurl his words back at him relentlessly in the Throne speech debate, in the Budget debate and, if necessary, in what amounts to a filibuster on this subsection of his estimates unless something happens to the deplorable state of housing in the Metropolitan Toronto area.

I say, Mr. Minister, that the Opposition is in effect forced into this position, because apart from the hospital bed shortage in Metro Toronto, there is no area of greater social neglect on the part of this government than housing. If Franklin Delano Roosevelt was alive today and talking about a third of the nation ill-housed, ill-clad and ill-fed, the ill-housed facet would still apply to Ontario.

Mr. Minister, I gained my first political awakening in the field of public housing. I must admit that this is where reality struck home with a certain shock. The hon. Minister says that he feels we are moving on housing in Metropolitan Toronto, and he was a little sanguine in his remarks. He said he was not sure just how major the problems are, then quoted disturbing statistics from the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority, and then said to the hon. member for Downsview that he did not want to rush.

Well, I wonder what happens behind the statistical evidence. Just out of curiosity, I have gone through some of the actual individual cases—and I say to hon. members here that it is not anything that is privy to me. These cases are on file with the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority. They are available to all who wish to see them and, so as not to incriminate the families involved, I will isolate them with letters and give the hon. members of this House some background as to the nature of the cases on the list.

Family A: Man and wife, aged 29; five children, three to thirteen. Renting shack with four rooms; trying to install their own plumbing. Shack is oil space heated, dangerous and expensive; no basement; no kitchen. Stove is merely a plugged-in affair with faulty and dangerous wiring. The man's income is $300 a month.

Family B: Woman separated, aged 33; three children, 11, 12, 14; sharing small bungalow on farm property; total of 11 inhabitants. No chance of repair because the so-called house is marked for demolition; septic tank, inoperative. Income is $203 a month.

Family C: Man and wife, 34 and 29; four children, ages two to ten; occupying three small, unfinished basement rooms in a private house. No bath or shower; no proper light or air; no heat, basement continually damp and floods between seasons. Fire hazard. Children suffer from chronic bronchitis. Income is $300 a month.

Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that this last family resides in my own riding. I know that the children will have their health permanently impaired unless they move out of a situation which attacks the bronchial condition they have, and yet the public housing condition persists.

Then you have large numbers of additional cases on the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority files which, as you know, are elderly people who simply cannot get onto the waiting list of the Metro Toronto Housing Company Limited.

Perhaps hon. members would be interested to know that certain isolated cases go back to January of 1958 and that most are at least two years on the list. To give the 1,800 cases some interpretation, let me tell the hon. members of this House that at the beginning of April, 1964, in the one housing authority, there were 157 families looking for one-bedroom homes, 476 looking for two bedrooms, 628 for three bedrooms—I ask you to think of the implications for children—345 for four bedrooms, and 106 for five bedrooms. That total is 1,712 families, Mr. Chairman; since I got this figure it has apparently risen to 1,800, and they are coming in at the rate of 2,000 families per year—or 40 per week.

I would like to expand on it slightly. That survey is a little illusory because that is only low rental family housing. In the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Corporation Limited, which deals with housing for old age citizens, there are presently some 2,500 people on the waiting list. Two years is a conservative estimate of the waiting period. They are coming in at the rate of eight to ten a day, which means we will have over 2,000 cases plus, within one year.

The turnover is small. At the moment no space for old age citizens will be available until Thistletown is opened, one-and-a-half to two years from now at least. By that time we should have 5,000 to 6,000 people on the list. Let it be said, Mr. Chairman, that 80 per cent of these people are single and that three-quarters of that 80 per cent are single women.

The hon. Minister delights in his little aphorisms, and I remember him saying in his original speech, "You cannot argue with success." I would say to the hon. Minister: "Nor can you argue with failure." No matter what the hon. Minister says about the housing branch in the province of Ontario in the last three years, the situation in Metropolitan Toronto is a failure. It cannot possibly be described otherwise, and I do not think even certain Metropolitan Toronto Conservative members would suggest they do so.

The point is, and I refer the hon. Minister to his own remarks, that these are not simply welfare cases by any stretch of the imagination. Welfare cases only take up ten to 15 per cent of the inhabitants of public housing units.

I appreciated the hon. Minister pointing that out because too often there are too many prejudices related to it. Eighty-five to 90 per cent of the people involved are low income earners—by no means welfare cases—playing an important and functional role in society and with no opportunity for adequate housing. And if I may say to the hon. Minister, when he came to that portion of his remarks which was supposed to alleviate the public housing situation, there were certain profound weaknesses. Again I do not say it with any animosity.

Weakness number one, the most striking, was that the hon. Minister gave no suggestion to this House at all as to how the provincial government in Ontario intended to cut through the confusion of existing housing authorities in the Metropolitan Toronto area. We have one huge and persistent jurisdictional muddle bordering on fiasco. When thinking about it and reading about it the only analogy that came to mind was Parkinson's law—the hon. Minister will remember it—that work expands so as to assume the time available for its completion. That is the nature of housing in Metropolitan Toronto.

Seven officials are now doing what one did before, says Parkinson, and if you substitute the provincial government for official A, this little paragraph from that noteworthy treatise sums it up rather nicely:

A is actually working harder than ever. An incoming document may well come before each of them in turn. Official E decides that it is all within the province of F, who places a draft reply before C, who amends it drastically before consulting D, who asks G to deal with it. But G goes on leave at this point, handing the file over to H, who drafts the minute that is signed by D and returns to C who revises the draft accordingly and lays the new version before A.

And A, in the person of the provincial government, stands paralyzed before it all. When eminent people in the field of public housing get up to speak on the state of housing in the Metropolitan Toronto area they need graphs, they need legends, charts, maps, interpreters, to try to cut through the labyrinth. Indeed, when W. Harold Clark spoke at the meeting of the social planning council of Metro on January 28, 1964, in order that the people in the audience could comprehend, he devised such a map. The hon. Minister has doubtless seen it. His deputy Minister has doubtless memorized it. The nature of the material here is simply staggering.

Let me run through a couple of things quickly for the interest of the hon. members of the House. Let us leave out York township for a moment. I would like to point out to the hon. members of the House that there are four housing agencies in Metropolitan Toronto: The Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority, the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Company Limited, the Housing Authority of Toronto and the City of Toronto Limited Dividend Housing Corporation Limited. That is a considerable mouthful in itself.

One of them is appointed by and responsible to the province of Ontario; another appointed by and responsible to the Metropolitan council, and the others appointed by and responsible to the city of Toronto. The Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority operates as a management agency only for low rental subsidized family housing for the provincial and federal governments. The Metropolitan Toronto Housing Company Limited is a private company which manages and builds senior citizens' housing, owned by the municipality of Metro Toronto. The Housing Authority of Toronto is controlled by the city of Toronto and concerned with Regent Park North exclusively. The City of Toronto Limited Dividend Housing Corporation Limited is also controlled by the city of Toronto to provide moderate rental family housing such as the Moss Park project—that great irrelevant colossus that this government managed to produce and encourage.

All the individual housing authorities have different financing arrangements. All of them handle their losses differently. All of the maximum incomes for admission are different. All the minimum rentals are different, and the residential requirements vary. There is no sense of cohesion whatsoever and Parkinson's law triumphs.

Then you have a man like W. Harold Clark making a presentation to a meeting of the social planning council, you have him finally ending up in presenting us with a chart and a graph providing a legend by way of a delightful and satirical commentary, were it not for the fact that human beings are involved.

The final conclusion is simply this: In 1958 Metropolitan Toronto, with the encouragement of the provincial government, set an objective of 1,000 units of low rental family housing a year. That would be 5,000 units by 1963.

We now have reached 352 units, 7 per cent of the target according to W. Harold Clark. In senior citizens' housing, we have 1,106 units out of 2,500 proposed, or 44 per cent of the target. So I say to the hon. Minister that his words are simply sanguine. They strike a false note with the hon. members of the Opposition. Something is wrong.

To have proposed an Ontario Provincial Housing Corporation without suggesting how it will cut through the muddle of jurisdictional differences in Metropolitan Toronto is to have added simply another aspect of superstructure. I would think that the individual housing groups in Toronto, the individual authorities, would want to know.

Mr. Minister, having said that, I would hope he would be kind enough, as he has been so willing to reply on all other aspects, to let us know what his intentions are in this field, and whether the Provincial Housing Corporation will in fact be simply an added fabric of superstructure or whether it will have some relevance.

The second serious weakness which was alluded to by the hon. member for Downsview, Mr. Chairman, is that the hon. Minister predicates his speech on an amendment to The National Housing Act, an amendment particularly, I think, to section 16. But he gives no indication whatsoever to what lengths the province is prepared to go to add to, or to substantiate, the federal legislation. I add this because the curious thing about public housing and senior citizens' housing and all other similar aspects in the province is that even though mythology deems it otherwise, the province has done very little.

The hon. Minister may correct me, but I think I am right that on all the full recovery projects in Ontario dealing with housing, there has been no loss to the province whatsoever. And most of them, or at least more than 50 per cent of them, have been full recovery. On the land assembly project, Mr. Minister, the province of Ontario has made money. In the actual subsidization of housing projects, municipalities have frequently, because of operating losses and taxes, turned over more than the province. The only place the province was hit hard, if it could be described as that, is in the rent certificate programme which has now been abandoned because of lack of federal participation. Now, for a paltry $120,000 a year, for which the hon. Minister was able to provide 245 units, that is not a very substantive reason.

We on this side of the House would like to know what, precisely, the Provincial Housing Corporation is going to do on its part to supplement the federal legislation. Up until now, the Provincial Housing Corporation merely reflects the 12-point programme that Mr. Macaulay had, which I think will forever be known as Macaulay's miscarriage, or perhaps more accurately as Macaulay's miasma—

Mr. Singer: Or Macaulay's folly!

Mr. S. Lewis: Or Macaulay's folly, the alliteration can continue.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: Why do you not keep quiet?

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Why don't you?

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I realize that the hon. Minister of Mines has only been in his seat for 30 seconds and already he is itching. I know he wishes to reply volubly, but I would ask him to wait until I extend my remarks so that he has something on which to base his reply.

Having said that, in referring to Macaulay's miscarriage, I simply add that the new Provincial Housing Corporation, which has been set up as a reflection of the 12-point programme, does not go past that 12-point programme at all in our minds. There is apparently no semblance of reality to it, so one asks the hon. Minister for a definition.

The final point I want to make, Mr. Chairman, and I shall be very brief on this, is that one of the things that concerns this particular party in the Opposition ranks is the general vagary which the hon. Minister put before this House and the qualifications which became characteristic of the latter portion of his estimates.

No one denies the virtue of eliminating ghetto-like isolation of public housing units. No one denies the value of subsidized families in low rental accommodation one day being able to buy their homes. No one denies the value of buying up lots of land for ultimate resale.

And let me say, Mr. Chairman, that there is a vast number of people already concerned in this field. When the hon. member for Downsview says "even" your department is concerned, I think he does it an injustice. I do not think the sarcasm is merited.

I think that the monthly publication, Ontario Housing, is one of the best in its field. It provides for you and your hon. Cabinet colleagues a basis on which to work.

All the various aspects which animate the minds of men in the new areas of town planning, community development and urban renewal are there—the case against high-rise apartments; the suburbs of today becoming the slums of tomorrow, the lack of integration between home and community; the disintegration of the family unit, and family structure; the effects of shelter on the attitudes and values and approaches of human beings—all these things have, at one time or another, been dealt with; and although one might urge a select committee on it, doubtless more and more thought will be given to them.

But the one thing with which the hon. Minister totally fails to come to grips, and the third aspect I would like to criticize, is the problem of slums in Metropolitan Toronto and urban renewal attendant on those slums. Mr. Minister, you had before you very recently, I think it was in September 1963, a first-rate study in the Toronto Telegram by Peter Reilly, who then wrote for that newspaper, of slums on Widmer Street and Napanee Street in the city of Toronto. There was the extraordinary situation where ten families on welfare rolls were paying more in rent to the slum landlord than the slum landlord was paying in taxes to the city. In effect, the Ontario government was assisting in subsidizing a completely uneconomic policy—one which cost the taxpayers an unnecessary amount of money.

Then, in the Toronto Globe and Mail, Jurgen Hesse outlined the slum areas again somewhat later, with equally vivid descriptions. And throughout the province slums continue to be outlined. The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs, in a report in 1962, shows that in Sault Ste. Marie evidence of blight caused 55 per cent of the structures to be classified as "less than good."

Kingston: There are many homes which are overcrowded, seriously lacking in sanitary facilities. Dangerously exposed to fire hazards and in a state of disrepair.

Hamilton: Pockets of substandard housing in the poor areas, in the older sections of the city, where it is expected that the worst conditions would prevail.

Windsor: The central parts of the city, residential, commercial and industrial, are declining and give little incentive for improvement. Of over 25,000 structures 13 per cent are vulnerable to blight, three per cent are partly blighted and 9.7 per cent completed blighted.

And I am sure the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville knows a great more about this than I do.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt, if you do not mind? The percentage with reference to Windsor is incorrect, the decimal point is in the wrong place. I think the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville will confirm what I have just said.

Mr. Newman: That is right, Mr. Chairman, it should be 2,500 not 25,000; and point 97, less than one per cent, rather than 9.7.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Yes.

Mr. S. Lewis: Fine. I hope the hon. Minister will appreciate that I was quoting from a document on which the correction was not made—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Yes, yes!

Mr. S. Lewis:—but I think if one includes Sault Ste. Marie and Ottawa and Hamilton and the words of major critics in the field like Dr. Albert Rose of the School of Social Work, University of Toronto, plus the evidence of what newspaper reporters accumulated in the city of Metropolitan Toronto, then I think the case for the presence of slums in Metropolitan Toronto and the province has been made.

Of course, what is at stake, Mr. Chairman, is bad planning, unscrupulous landlords, penurious conditions, wretched morale and grinding misery; and it is not the kind of thing which a provincial government should be prepared to tolerate. So I would say to the hon. Minister that though he is certainly to be congratulated on the preparation of the estimates, and although we view with some little optimism the fruits of his labour over the next year; an analysis at every income level of the contemporary scene of housing in Metropolitan Toronto causes great anxiety—particularly in that primary area of low income where the pressures have accumulated beyond description.

We urge again that something vastly more concrete be done than the mere hints which have been given.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Chairman, I am delighted to see that the hon. member for Scarborough West is on my side.

I have already acknowledged that we have some problems in housing and the province has the responsibility. And I think the actions of the last few days indicate that we take those responsibilities seriously. If we did not, we would wait for the federal authorities to bring down their legislation and then wait for next year before we did anything. I think we have indicated that we are going to move in on these problems which the hon. member for Scarborough West has brought to us.

I would be interested to know if he has information as to how long these people had been on the Metro waiting list. There is a great deal of confusion about these waiting lists, which I have been able to have a look at and talk about in the last few months. I do not say these cases do not exist; I am quite sure they do; but I think there are always two sides to the story.

When it comes to building homes for senior citizens, this is a project which Metro Toronto undertakes. As an indication of that, I think we had in the press not too long ago a picture of this new home for 520 senior citizens in Etobicoke into which, the commissioner of welfare in Toronto tells us, if we go much further than this, we will perhaps not have people to put in them. I do not agree with him, but again here is a man who I think is in a position to know something about people requiring homes. He, again, has a different opinion to the gentleman I think you quoted a minute ago—Mr. Clark.

We think Mr. Clark is a very competent authority in many areas, but we do not necessarily agree with his arithmetic. I suppose it could be argued whether he is right or we are right, but on the other hand I say this points out the amount of confusion which exists among competent authorities as to what should constitute housing and how many people are looking for accommodation.

We have been advised by the housing authority not to build any more one-two bedroom accommodations. I think that is certainly something to which we should give serious consideration, because we are having problems with larger families looking for accommodation. I think your seat-mate there brought one to me the other day and we have had a look at it. We realize this can be multiplied many times over.

People may move into an accommodation with two children and, in a few years, they get four; then they get six; and they have to have somewhere to go. We recognize that some of the building restrictions, and some of the accommodation which should be provided in the future, will have to take that matter into consideration.

In answering your question as to what we are doing about it, I simply suggest again to you that we have formed a corporation to do all the things you are asking us to do and which we claim we are going to do; and with this housing corporation it can be done. I think we recognize, or we should recognize, that the federal authorities have accepted their responsibility in regard to the amount of money required for housing, and they are prepared to put up 90 per cent of the funds on public housing. Up to now they have put up 75 per cent for some of these projects. As I said a little while ago, now they are prepared to be the banker on a larger scale. If they are, I think we can perhaps relieve the municipalities of some of their responsibility.

Not all of it. We think they should have a share in it. But I believe it will also reduce the levels of government involved which, you have pointed out, are working in confusion. I do not say that unkindly. I simply say that in the Metro area, where we have four levels of government, everybody has a different opinion and it is a very difficult thing to get a decision. I have before me here a list containing Staplewood Farm, the Malvern project, Thistletown, O'Connor Drive. I could go on for hours and talk about our problems, but I do not think you want to hear about those. You have already heard enough about our problems. We want to tell you what we think we can do to cure some of these problems. I am not going to burden you with the difficulties we have faced, the aggravation which has been holding up many of the housing projects we have in mind, but I certainly think that, with this corporation, we have solved many of the problems which are inherent in a housing project getting underway.

We must remember that in the urban renewal programme, as you pointed out and the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs has pointed out, we have several programmes under way. The Ontario provincial government, in its housing division, has a responsibility to find homes for those people who are going to be vacated. They also have the responsibility to build new homes in that area, if they are going to build new homes, and we hope we will have the responsibility under this new housing Act to rehabilitate a lot of old homes, so we do not build, as I think you mentioned, organized slums.

Many of the points that you have raised, we have been going over month in and month out, trying to find the answers. I think the answer is in the housing corporation and having the authority to act as the full authority on housing in this province, which we certainly did not have and do not have at the present time.

Again, I can only say to you and to the hon. members of this House, that if this housing Act is passed, and I am sure it will be, I think a year from now I will be very pleased to take any criticism on the housing programme and I will deserve everything you say if it does not work out as we anticipate.

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Minister, could I be more precise in one respect? Did you say that the Provincial Housing Corporation had been set up to solve the problems of existing confusion? Can you tell the House what will happen to the present four—actually it is more than that—but let us assume four major existing authorities in the Metropolitan Toronto area? What precisely will happen to them? Will they be integrated into one, as most seem to wish? Will they borrow independently? Will they be disbanded? What will in fact happen to them?

Hon. Mr. Randall: The only one that we have any jurisdiction over is the Metro housing authority. The rest are municipal bodies. I would hope that by merging our director of housing and his branch into this new housing corporation, we can cut away some of the red tape that these various housing authorities have perhaps created. But the only housing authority that we have any responsibility for in this city at the moment, and which we have to work through, is the Metro housing authority. We have 39 such housing authorities across the province.

I think you can understand if you go into those various areas that we need responsible citizens in those areas to run those housing projects and we need one here in the city of Toronto. We do not need four or five, but if the municipality feels that it wants one to run a housing project of its own, and in some cases it does, that is within its jurisdiction. I think it has the authority to set up as many housing corporations within the municipality as it wants to set up. But we do believe that can be solved with the programme we have outlined.

Let me just suggest this to you. Our problems have not been entirely with the housing authorities. Our problems have been with the four levels of government—federal, provincial, municipal and Metro. The housing authorities have not given us the problem with the implication you have placed on it, but I would say to you that the more people we get out of the picture, the simpler it is going to be to get to the nub of the problem.

Mr. S. Lewis: I have used the word "authority" too frequently perhaps. I have perhaps given an incorrect implication when I said housing authorities—I am sorry. I meant in effect those housing groups which operated at the various levels of government.

I should have been more explicit in my terms. If in fact the housing authority that is specifically administered by the province is integrated with the Provincial Housing Corporation, then by no means have we eliminated a level of government. We still have the federal, the provincial, the Metropolitan Toronto and the individual municipal governments and the problem remains precisely what it was before. Is there any suggestion on the part of the provincial government that it could encourage the amalgamation of one major housing agency to handle building and management in the Metropolitan Toronto area?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I think there is a little misunderstanding here. We are involved at government level in the development of housing. The housing authorities are only involved with managing. If we look after development, which we will do through this housing corporation, I think much of the red tape we have heard about will disappear. These housing authorities are management groups, to manage a project as you probably recognize, but they are not particularly involved in the negotiations between us and say, Etobicoke, or us and the federal government. They do not get in our way at all. We are the development group in this province and we are accepting that responsibility. But the housing authorities are management people. They run a housing project and that housing project only.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to the exchange between the hon. member for Scarborough West and the hon. Minister and I do not think the hon. Minister really understands what the confusion was in Etobicoke, or the confusion that existed in Scarborough at Stapleford Farm, for instance. The Metro people said, and I sat on that council, that among other housing projects that they would like to embark on, is one in Scarborough, at Stapleford Farm, or one in Etobicoke, the Thistle town project. You had all of this multiplication of authorities and planning boards on the local level, on the Metro level, on the provincial level. The reason that it took two and a half years to even approach this stage—and the Etobicoke one is not settled yet, and the Scarborough one, I do not think—

Hon. Mr. Randall: Etobicoke is all settled.

Mr. Singer: It is all settled! Well I hope the hon. Minister is right and that it is not going to blow up in his face again. But the problem is this multiplicity of people who have authority to determine—not authorities in the sense that my hon. friend was perhaps misinterpreting, but in the sense of authorities that have the power to determine. Take your provincial bodies—there are one or two of them—and perhaps you are going to get them into the same room and make only one authority out of them. But you still have your Metropolitan council. You have your Metropolitan planning board. You have Etobicoke council. You have Etobicoke planning board. You have all of these residents who, when they object, have a variety of people before whom they can come and announce their objections and delay and delay and delay.

When the hon. Minister says this is a municipal problem, this is no answer at all. His colleague sitting immediately beside him is the man he charged in this province for the responsibility of municipalities. Municipalities have no authority that this Legislature does not give them. There are no innate rights to municipalities. If the municipal procedure is such that it slows down a project that has great good, surely the Cabinet as a group has a responsibility to cut away that red tape and if necessary to change those municipal laws. It is no answer at all to say, "We are only doing what we can." The hon. Minister is building walls around his department and his responsibility. I say that he has not even the understanding of the problem that his colleague had with his 12-point programme that suffered such a dismal failure. The thing that is needed on the government benches is that one Minister sit down and talk to another one. This is not happening and this is why we have no housing programme.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to suggest to the hon. member for Downsview that we hope in this proposal to build a programme and avoid these big building projects that we got into in Etobicoke. On the other hand, I think the matter of confusion and red tape is grossly overplayed. Even as a private builder, if you wanted to build an apartment house, I think as an attorney working for somebody else you would have to send perhaps 25 or 30 of your subdivision plans out to get them approved by Hydro and the gas company and the water board and many others, so this is not necessarily the major hold-up. The hold-up has been what we previously suggested—in negotiations between municipalities.

We think perhaps a lot of that can be avoided by not building these major housing projects, but by using a builder proposal we have outlined where the homes are already there or will be built by a private builder.

Some of the situations that have developed in the past in the way of delays can be avoided, I think. But as far as I am concerned, I have had no difficulty since taking office negotiating with the various reeves and the councils and getting a programme organized, and I do not foresee any problems in the future.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I must say with the greatest respect to the hon. Minister that he just does not understand. It does not matter whether the building runs 15 storeys in height, or whether you are going to attempt to integrate houses in existing subdivisions, the same local objection not only can exist but will exist and will continue to exist. It has in the past.

I suggest the hon. Minister get out the files dealing with Stapleford Farm and see how many times that was discussed. This did not deal with any great mass project; this was a very intelligent suggestion made in 1957 and 1958 that there be integrated into a new subdivision a certain number of subsidized homes. The same reaction took place that has been felt in relation to all the big projects. And the same delays took place.

There were all these different forums before which people could come and object. The council sat and argued for interminable hours and listened to countless numbers of delegations. When they were not listening, their planning board was. When that avenue of exploration got a little weary, then they went down to the Metro level—and there is a Metro planning board and there is a Metro council. Then when those authorities got a little tired with them they came up here to Queen's Park and made representations to the planning branch of The Department of Municipal Affairs. And after the hon. member for Riverdale got into the department, he listened to representations, Mr. Chairman. The circle got ever bigger — there were more people to talk to and more reasons for delay. It was not the size of the project or the concept of the project; it is just, as the hon. Minister said, that there is an innate objection to this kind of thing.

If there is nothing in his new legislation he contemplates which is going to eliminate this municipal red tape, we have not taken a step forward; we are running hard to keep up with the status quo.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Chairman, I should say if we are going backward that this looks like a pretty good record here. For 1964 the projects which should be under construction during the year are in Belleville, Chatham, Cochrane, Collingwood, Delhi, Dunnville, Fort Frances, Galt, Hamilton, Kapuskasing, Kingston, Lindsay, London, Metro Toronto (5), Midland, Oakville, Oshawa, Ottawa (4), Palmerston, Parry Sound, Port Arthur, Sudbury, Timmins, Toronto township, and Woodstock. If we were having trouble with municipalities, there would be nothing going on. I think this proves that we can negotiate with the municipalities and are going ahead with the housing projects in many areas.

Mr. Singer: That proves nothing more than that you are housing by headlines.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to give some information for the benefit of the hon. member for Scarborough West in relation to the remarks he made a few moments ago.

If he would refer to the report of The Department of Municipal Affairs for the year 1963, page 72 and subsequent pages, he will find a report with reference to urban renewal projects under way in the province.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Mr. Chairman, with all due respect to the hon. Minister and with deference to the hon. member for Scarborough West, I would say that we do not have the patience which they have in waiting for the heralded day when you really tackle the problem of public housing. I say that because we have listened year after year to proud enunciations about what you were going to do. And I am just going to table these because you might not have read them. We hope to hear this in your memory so that when you do come back next year you will set a new example in showing that you have taken action because the hon. Minister's predecessors unfortunately have let this go. The hon. members of the New Democratic Party have suggested they would wait until next year. I say that we do not wait until next year.

Mr. S. Lewis: On a point of order, I indicated only that next year, if nothing had been done in the interim, we would take certain action. I suggest to the hon. member for Dovercourt that the problems would be best facilitated without this kind of remark.

Mr. Thompson: I am going to try and take the action, which I assume is a critical action, right away. And I am going to label it.

Last year, the former Minister told us that:

In the coming year we will solve the problem of housing in Metro areas. We will produce an understanding between the new federal government, the provinces and our municipalities, which will open the way to the purchase, on a participating basis, of the existing housing and expanded programme of urban development.

Now we hear from the hon. Minister that we are going to have a co-ordinated authority, and so on.

The reason we are cynical is because we even notice that you are able to fool certain newspapers. You come out with what you suggest is—I do not know if you suggested it but they suggested it—a new approach, that is of buying old houses in certain areas of the city, as an approach to public housing. This strikes us with great irony.

I would like to quote, for example, from Hansard, March 15, 1962. This again is on the housing, because I want to emphasize that we have gone through this steadily, year after year. On this, I asked the question:

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that the hon. Minister—that was Mr. Macaulay at the time:

—is open for ideas. I presented an idea last year that I thought might be helpful in some of the downtown areas, particularly of Toronto. At that time I do not think the previous Minister—

At that time it was the Minister from Kingston, who has since retired.

I suggested that the previous Minister was not as fertile soil for ideas because he neither answered it nor paid any attention to what I was saying. So, in the hopes that I might have more fertile soil, I would like to read this from Hansard. This is in the debate of 1962. And I am referring to the progress in Sacramento, California, where they have a scattered type of housing project.

I do not know if the hon. Minister had an opportunity to study that project but I would say that I think they have gone into some of this rental approach that he is doing, and I congratulate him on doing that. But in connection with this scattered housing approach and these projects in the United States, they have about 10,000 of these projects. In other words, they take dilapidated houses in various downtown areas, take them over as a public housing unit—

I will not bother reading all this for Hansard, I will just summarize it.

In Sacramento they have found this really pays off because, by developing the public housing units, building up old houses on a rundown street, they raise the value of the real estate on the whole street. The housing authority found there that the cost to the housing authority had been $1,200. And yet two years afterwards the value was $1,700.

I think one of the reasons for the great delay in the building of housing units in Toronto has been that we have always thought of enormous blocks. I, frankly, see some disadvantages in some of these large blocks. Much as I see the value of Regent Park, I often feel that the inhabitants there, grouped together because of economic circumstances, must feel like goldfish. I would suggest that having scattered units—buying, in other words, individual houses in rundown areas and using these—might be a way not only of holding back the deterioration of streets in Toronto but also in fact, Mr. Chairman, of building them up.

In 1962, Mr. Macaulay replied:

I thank the hon. member. Would he tell me—I usually read in the summer the Hansard of the winter before. Would the hon. member give me the pages to which he is referring?

So, sir, we went back to 1961; and I would say that I was not the only one in my party who was striving to get this scattered housing approach. Back in 1961 we were fighting for this.

We go back to 1962, go to 1963, and then an extraordinary thing happens. The Minister comes out and says he is contemplating it. An extraordinary thing to me is that in the crusade for this—I do not know how he does it, he must have a wonderful public relations department—we see an editorial in one of the papers saying, “a new idea by the Minister to have this type of housing”.

If the hon. Minister gets credit for this, fine, as long as he does it. Our concern, sir, is that year after year after year we have brought up the situation of housing, we have given suggestions to the Minister and always, as the hon. member for Scarborough West has said, it seems to be either “maybe”, or “if certain situations happen”, and “this is still applying”.

I, sir, could quote examples, as I am sure every hon. member in the Metropolitan area could, of families who cannot get low cost housing. I think of last winter. I think of people who came into my office and my riding. I am thinking particularly of one family who came, a man and a wife who had five children. One of the children had to get treatment at the sick children's hospital. The man is a truck driver. He was living in a house in which, he told me, there was cardboard to patch it up, and he was searching to try to get some kind of low rental housing. I wrote to the city. I went through all the authorities and there was delay. I finally telephoned the mayor of Toronto to ask him if we could get this man into something since he has a wife and five children, one of the children attending the sick children's.

Believe me, if you were to phone the mayor, or you, sir, were to start trying to get some of these individual people into housing units, you become fully aware not only of the very human problem attached to it, but also the real lack of public housing.

I appreciate the hon. Minister talked about the senior citizens and showed us a picture. I realize that has been an enthusiastic drive. I think particularly of the former Minister. He was so enthusiastic he was going to build another senior citizens' place out in his riding.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): That was just at election time.

Mr. Thompson: Just at election time he was going to do that. In fact, it will not be built. But what I am expressing is the concern we all share in the Opposition with respect to families, particularly with two or three children. Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Scarborough West asks the hon. Minister to think of the children in this. This is not being sentimental. This is being realistic about the problem. Sir, we are cynical and we are highly critical of the performance of this government with respect to housing.

The hon. Minister can make a clarification that now he has a co-ordinated approach and we are going to see something. I would say we have to be shown. We stand here condemning what has been in the past. We have some hope that, with the new Minister, something will be done. But if he carries on with the philosophy and approach of the previous Ministers—it seems to be the Conservative approach to housing—very little will be done.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Again let me say that I will accept any suggestion from any hon. member of the House that will improve housing. We do not have all the ideas. We are open for suggestions. I would just like to point this out to the hon. members. Now, sir, they refer to the idea that the former Minister had down on Carlaw Avenue. This proposal was referred to the Metropolitan corporation, which would be the body responsible for developing the project. After giving the matter some consideration, Metro advised us that for economic and other reasons the site was not considered suitable and recommended alternate sites in North York and Etobicoke. I showed the hon. members, I think, a few minutes ago—

Mr. Singer: Would the hon. Minister not think that a Minister would have investigated that before—

Hon. Mr. Randall: —there is exactly what he had in mind and the project is now under way. So his ideas did work out. Not on the elaborate scale in the city but it worked out where it would do the most good for the most number of people.

I have before me here a copy of The Housing Development Act, 1962, and one clause (c) reads:

The acquisition, improvement and conversion for housing purposes of existing buildings situate in any municipality.

We have had this for two years and tried to get the federal government to change their Act to operate with us. Just now they are listening to the proposal we have made. We hope to have that, as I say, before the session of the Legislature is closed.

So we have had the ability to go ahead and buy up homes and renovate. We could not get the federal authorities to move with us. We think we are ahead of the federal authorities in doing some of the things that the hon. member has recommended. This pressure from the former Minister previous to myself is now bearing some fruit, Mr. Chairman. The things I suggest we can do with this new housing corporation if we had been provided with the enabling legislation two years ago. I would suggest to the hon. member that this change in the legislation will do most of the things that he is recommending with reference to taking old homes and renovating them, and even taking big homes and making duplexes of them. These are the things that we think we can do under this Act, providing the federal authorities come along and help us with the banking.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, since coming into this House I have never ceased to wonder at the way the members of the Liberal Party continually castigate this government for responsibilities which are primarily those of the federal administration. This is not to say that the government of Ontario has no responsibility here. It has, and it should have done much more than it has done.

We look forward to the new Minister doing far more and over this next year we will watch that with a great deal of interest. But never in any nation where housing has been solved to any degree has it been done without federal authority, federal participation in the matter of low interest loans, and legislation which makes rapid building possible. One of the reasons we are in the situation in which we find ourselves in Ontario today is the neglect of a federal administration in this field ever since the end of the war. An administration by first of all a Liberal government for many years, then a Conservative government for a short time, and now again a Liberal administration which now sits in Ottawa.

It is high time that our friends went down to talk to their friends in Ottawa, remind them of their promises prior to the last two federal elections, and tell them to get busy. I know legislation has been started; but legislation had better be stepped up and we had better see results from their friends in Ottawa. When that result comes, then I hope that this government will build upon the foundation, and will take advantage of every bit of legislation that is put on the statute books down there.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out one of the fundamental problems in the Metro area. It is the fear on the part of individual municipalities—and I pointed this out before in this House—of the costs that would emanate from low rental housing. The municipalities are afraid of unemployment, of welfare costs, of the kind of costs that automatically flow out of a low rental housing development. So while they do not always say this, and while they are able to trump up all kinds of excuses for delay, this problem is fundamental. Perhaps Commissioner Goldenberg, who is now sitting, will be able to answer this problem for us as far as Metro is concerned. It seems to me that until we have one treasury for the whole Metro area into which taxes flow and out of which will come the cost of welfare, education and all these expenses, that we are not going to get a solution in the Metro area to this problem.

The hon. Minister mentioned a short time ago that I had brought to his attention a certain problem in my own riding. I want to bring before the House this very problem which is typical, not only of my riding, but of every riding across this province. We have, perhaps, emphasized too much in Canada the business of limited dividend housing, designed to help the top bracket of the lower third of our income earners. It is a private development with guaranteed profits of five per cent. But the problem comes here. Those private developers who have built limited dividend housing face the fact that as families go in and, as the hon. Minister has pointed out, more children are born and the families become more and more numerous as far as children are concerned, then the profits start to dwindle because of damage and because of the surplus population within those developments. So the tendency is for limited dividend landlords, as well as others, to frown upon large families.

In my own riding, one of these developments took action not long ago. I have in my hand the notice which one of the families received; a family consisting of a man and his wife and six children. This is the notice. I will read it in part:

This office has today received implicit instructions from the board of directors of [this development company] that all apartments housing more than five persons must immediately be sent official notice to give vacant possession of their premises.

Pressure has been brought to bear on the company by the authorities. We quote:

for the prevention of overcrowding and compliance of health standards no apartment will be permitted to house more than five persons. When this number is exceeded notice must be given by the company to the tenants to quit the premises.

I checked with North York health and other authorities and found that no pressure of this kind had been brought to bear. However, this was used.

We regret to take this action, however, but we must give you official notice to deliver up vacant possession of your apartment by May 15, 1964.

You must realize that due to the above explanation this office has no other alternative. Please confirm with our rental office the date of your departure.

In that one development 20 families with more than three children each have received these notices. I brought this to the attention of the hon. Minister and he has co-operated with us. The developer himself has agreed to co-operate by extending eviction notices a bit. The Metro Housing Authority has been approached and the hon. Minister has been setting up some discussions which might help this particular situation. I think that with that kind of co-operation from the department something might be done.

But fundamentally the problem is that there are just not enough low rental apartments for the big families that the private developer does not want in his apartments. I know the old argument that so many of us perhaps have offered—that if private enterprise is going to take the profitable segment of the rental business, it should also take the unprofitable section, and if we believe in a private enterprise economy then private enterprise should supply the housing. But this does not work. The only way private enterprise will house the seven-children families, it seems, is by crowding them into one or two rooms and charging the high rent. It is the slum psychology and we just do not believe in that—not any of us, in any part.

We want to see even the large family have decent accommodation. We are not going to get that accommodation through private enterprise and so the state must move into this field. It must move into it with some imagination, and with some ability to comprehend the need, and to supply the funds and the drive and the initiative to do the job.

The hon. Minister has discussed in his presentation certain ideas that he is considering. One of them is the taking over of older premises which might be rebuilt and into which families of this kind might move. This is a long-term project. I saw some projects in the city of London, where the London County Council has brought out certain of the larger old apartment buildings, has refurbished them, fixed them up outside and, they say, put to shame some of the private developers on the same street until they had to do the same kind of thing. This has worked to some extent.

This might be an idea that could be explored. It may well be that developments of this kind where families have received eviction notices might be looked at by the hon. Minister from the point of view of buying them out if they can be acquired at reasonable prices. I would not advocate that the prices developers may ask should be paid, but if developments like this could be bought and then some partitions knocked out and larger apartments of four and five bedrooms developed, it might achieve very quickly the housing of some of these families who are unwanted today by private developers.

I bring this to the hon. Minister's attention. I know he is discussing this and is concerned with it but I think this is a field where action is needed and needed desperately today. Twenty families at least are waiting with bated breath to know what answer this government might have. We know there are many other families besides these who have the same problem. It is a problem that only government action can solve, but it needs to be solved very quickly if these people are not to be crowded back into slum situations at the rents they can afford. Then these people, instead of having three bedrooms for six or seven people, may have one or two rooms for each family for the same rent as they are paying. This civilization and province can hardly be proud of a situation like that.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, as everyone knows I am a very genial and kind-hearted fellow and I do not take as harsh a view of our hon. friends on the Liberal benches as my hon. colleague from Yorkview. As a matter of fact I welcome evidence of sustained interest in the housing problem on their part.

For years the members in the NDP group, and the CCF group that preceded it, hammered away at the government with regard to housing. In fact the expression, "housing by headlines", Mr. Chairman, of which the hon. member for Downsview now appears so enamoured, was actually coined by Controller William Dennison when he was a member of this House—a CCF member—in the period 1948-51. I reintroduced the expression into the vocabulary of the House two or three years ago and the Toronto Daily Star has subsequently picked it up as the title for an editorial. It is a good term, as it applies to the efforts of this government in the housing field over the past 20 years.

Mainly have we had headlines; only to a very limited degree have we had houses. Certainly we have not had houses or housing units in anything like the degree to which they are required. Now we have a new Minister. As far as this group is concerned, we are prepared to let the new Minister show his mettle. We are not going to pre-judge him before he has even had a chance. He has indicated certain new developments which he is initiating. I think those developments indicate a possibility, at least, that there will be a more active and integrated policy than in the past.

The first major development that he has announced is the establishment of a housing corporation, which it is hoped will co-ordinate housing policy and take some initiative in developing housing programmes throughout the municipalities in the province.

It is also interesting to note another comment that the hon. Minister made two or three times when he said that he and the new corporation accept responsibility for development in the housing field. I think that is a fair summary of what he said. It may not be his exact words, but he accepts responsibility in this field. If that is genuinely true, it is a step forward of major importance.

I can remember the predecessor of the hon. Minister just last year bewailing the fact that although he was all dressed up and ready to go, he could not get any of the municipalities to move, and that the burdens which the municipalities imposed upon him were almost too much for any human being to bear. One of the difficulties was that the hon. gentleman was so rarely in Ontario that the municipalities probably did not have a chance to speak more than two consecutive sentences to him.

However, we now have it accepted, I take it from what the hon. Minister said, that the fundamental responsibility for initiating housing projects is on the provincial government and its agency. If that is true, then it is an important step forward and it may help to break the log jam that has so long existed in the housing field.

On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, when I look at the estimates that are now before us, I am by no means reassured that we are going to have an energetic and aggressive programme of development in the coming year. We are being asked to vote for capital purposes in the field of housing $6,099,000. That is a bit higher than last year, Mr. Chairman. I believe last year we voted for $4.37 million. But then, last year was down from previous years. I think if you look at the record over the years, you will find that the House has voted as much as $7 million or $8 million for capital purposes in regard to housing, and $5 million or $6 million has been the normal figure.

One of the difficulties has been that the government has rarely, if ever, spent the money which was voted to it. I suppose if it gets an appropriation of $6 million, as it is hoping to do this year, and it actually spends it, that will be a step forward. But I am suggesting to this House, Mr. Chairman, that $6 million for capital purposes—and I realize that does not represent the total capital investment, that only represents a percentage of it and the smallest percentage at that—but $6 million for an entire fiscal year will be only a drop in the bucket in solving the housing problem with which we are now faced. I make that statement on the assumption that all of the $6 million is going to be spent. The past record of the government does not lead one to believe that it will, in fact, be spent.

I will speak mainly about Metropolitan Toronto, because it is the area with which I am most familiar. I would say to the hon. Minister, and to anyone else who may be interested in listening, that the housing situation in Metro Toronto has been and continues to be an organized mess. There is conflicting jurisdiction to the point where hardly anybody knows where to turn. Plans are announced regularly which do not mature at all, or mature years late. Some of them are completely perverted before they get into the final stage as, for example, the Moss Park project which I think can be described only as an abortion.

It started out as a good idea. It was completely ruined by a former federal Minister of Public Works, Mr. Walker, who is not now a member of the federal House, much less of the Cabinet. He wanted to turn the whole thing over to private enterprise. That was a ridiculous idea. But it ended up that Moss Park did not turn out to be what had been planned. It turned out to be a limited dividend housing project, which displaced a great many people with low incomes and did not provide any accommodation which was useful to them.

The failure of housing in this Metro area has affected, most severely, two groups of people—the poor and the elderly. I read an article in the Toronto Globe and Mail—I do not know if it is true, but it is close enough to be true so I think I will accept it—that rents in Metro Toronto are the highest in the whole of Canada, and they are particularly high for poor families.

I have seen statements to the effect that the poor are happier down in the slums; they get lower rents down there. Well, Mr. Chairman, that is a complete misconception. They do not get low rents down there. In the slum areas rents are the highest anywhere in the whole city in relation to what the people get. Slum landlords are growing fat, and have been growing fat for years, on the basis of the misery of people who simply cannot afford to get out of the slums. As a matter of fact, they have to pay so much for inadequate accommodation that it is impossible for them to save any money. Thus they cannot get a down payment on a house and escape from the slum environment. They are in it, and they get deeper and deeper in as time goes on.

Some of our urban development projects intensify the situation. They clear out some of the slum housing, which is desirable in itself, but the point is no provision is made for housing the people who are displaced, so that the demand for the stock of slum housing increases and the rents these people have to pay go up. So we have this vicious circle, in which the poor people are caught, of high rents for totally inadequate, in fact reprehensible, accommodation with very little escape for them. The failure of our public housing programme to provide housing units at rents they can afford, in the quantities needed, means that to date they have no apparent escape from this vicious circle.

The other group of people who have been seriously affected by the failure of our housing programme are the elderly. The hon. Minister quoted, I think it was, the commissioner of welfare and housing in the city of Toronto to the effect that when the Thistle-town project—and the one which I think is on the drawing boards right now, somewhere in the vicinity of Keele and Wilson—is completed, there is a possibility there will not be any demand for housing for senior citizens. I must say that is not the story I got from the commissioner of housing and welfare or from any of the other people involved in the housing problem in the city of Toronto.

The situation at the present time is that an elderly person who is a widow, a widower, or single, simply cannot get into any existing housing development. The only hope for them is on those rare occasions when a new development is built and there are some openings for those people. But as far as getting into an existing unit is concerned it is impossible, for a very obvious reason. The married couples in existing projects sooner or later lose one of their number, so there is a widow or a widower left. Naturally, the housing authorities have to give priority to a survivor, in a case like that, for whatever single units are available. The single units are filled up entirely from within the project and people on the outside stay on the outside for years.

I was working not long ago on the case of a lady who has been on the waiting list for over two years. She has at least another year to go until Thistle-town, or the project at Keele and Wilson, opens up; and to suggest that we seem to be within sight of solving the problems for the elderly, in my opinion, is a sheer delusion. It may be that when Thistle-town and Keele and Wilson open up, some of the people who have been waiting for years will be able to get in; but then we will have all the new accumulation of applications which will take place during the coming year and will continue in subsequent years. Unless something is done on a much larger scale than has ever been contemplated before, elderly citizens, especially those who are single or widowed, are just not going to be able to get into public housing developments.

The hon. Minister has mentioned that he is now working on a programme of spreading low rental housing units throughout the community. He is also interested in pushing ahead if he can get federal assistance, in taking over existing housing units, rehabilitating them and making them available for low-rent housing. All this is good, Mr. Chairman. I think it is a step forward. But at the same time I am doubtful if projects of that kind, by themselves, are going to meet the urgent housing problem we have had for years.

You know, a few years ago we were presented with a rent certificate plan which was going to be a bold new attack on the housing programme. I never was too enamoured of it but it was undertaken at any rate. I do not know what the present count is on the rent certificate plan, but the last I heard there were something in the neighbourhood of 200 to 250 units involved in the rent certificate plan in Metro Toronto. I do not think any were involved anywhere else, certainly very few.

This sort of nibbling at the problem, Mr. Chairman, is of some value but it is basically an evasion of the whole problem. Let us face it, we have in the city of Toronto, and to a lesser degree in other cities, a major problem of redevelopment. In fact, I read into the record, two or three years ago, an extract from one of the government's own publications, Ontario Housing. I do not happen to have the issue with me here now, but I can well remember the point I was interested in. It was estimated that in the city of Toronto alone there are approximately 1,000 acres that are ripe for redevelopment. That was two or three years ago. Some, but very little redevelopment has taken place in the ensuing period, and I have no doubt the blight has extended beyond that area.

We still have these major problems of slum clearance, of clearing out housing that is totally inadequate and is beyond rehabilitation. Picking up a housing unit here or putting in a low-rent unit there is not going to tackle the real problem of slum clearance. There is no use going in for slum clearance unless we have housing accommodation to which the displaced people can go. We have already had experience with limited slum clearance without adequate provision for the people displaced, and we find that all that does is to put more profits into the pockets of the slum landlords.

We cannot evade the overall problem of slum clearance and urban renewal. We can play around all we like with rent certificate plans, and with plans to buy up existing houses, and convert and improve them. We can play around with projects to place low-rent housing units in other developments, but we still have to face up to the problem of urban redevelopment. I cannot see anything in any of the plans the hon. Minister announced that indicates that the government is now even concerning itself with the problem, that it even cares about it. Yet we will never solve the housing problem until we head right into the problem of slum clearance.

I am going to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that housing cannot be separated from the whole problem of community development. Unfortunately, in the organization of government in this province, the two problems of housing and community planning are put under separate jurisdictions. This is an unfortunate consequence because they really cannot properly be separated. What is happening is that we are building new slums for tomorrow because of a lack of proper community planning and proper control over community development. We have a tremendous problem of slum clearance right now and yet, because we leave most housing in the hands of promoters, speculators and developers, we are building—and have been ever since World War II—potential new slums all around our city, rows upon rows of dog kennels in which human beings are asked to live without any individuality or identity, with the trees all knocked down and with very little in the way of community services. This has been our unfortunate experience in the past.

I am not saying that is true of all developments. There are some notable exceptions, but it is true of far too many. People are simply put into uniform compartments out in the suburbs. I have often heard it said, quite wrongly, that socialists want to pour all human beings into the same mould. This is a gross misunderstanding of the aims of socialism, which is to do the exact opposite—to liberate the individual so that he can develop his own individual talents. But I am always interested to note how capitalism keeps pouring people into the same mould in developments along the fringes of our cities, and not only that, Mr. Chairman, in the apartment developments in the downtown areas of our cities as well.

This has become the great new housing development in our cities—high-rise apartments in the downtown areas, most of them carrying quite high rents. They are faceless monsters, in which human beings are put into their individual little cells, all identical to the other. In fact, you can go into these apartment buildings and the design of the apartments is not only the same within the one apartment building, it is the same from apartment building to apartment building. They are all the same great ugly monstrosities on our horizon: square boxes with their little balconies jutting out. I do not know who it was who made the first plan for one of these new apartment developments, but if he gets royalties he must have made a fortune, because nearly all of them are made from the same pattern, they all come from exactly the same plan.

I was interested to note an article in Ontario Housing, the government's own publication, in February, 1964, by Paul Ringer of the Metro Toronto Housing Authority, entitled "The Case against the High Rise." I will not read the article but I will read a summary of it which appears at the beginning:

The fact of high-rise living is here and now. One is prepared to accept higher densities as being necessary for urban life and necessary perhaps to overcome urban sprawl. However, must these higher densities all be the same and look the same? Row after row of "vertical filing cabinets" are replacing row after row of single detached "strawberry boxes."

I called them dog kennels, Mr. Ringer calls them strawberry boxes.

It is difficult to understand how this process adds either to the appearance of a neighbourhood or even its efficiency. Despite planning platitudes about mixed developments and pleasant relationship in space of high- and low-rise buildings, these things occur very rarely. The high-rise apartment buildings are built by "merchant builders" who generally have a tendency to play one note, the one that will sell or rent most easily and return the greatest profit.

This has been the basic cause of our failure, Mr. Chairman. The housing has been turned over to speculators in the main, the government's efforts have been most inadequate, and there has been very little planning control of development by private developers. So we get the strawberry boxes in the suburbs and the vertical filing cabinets within the city core and very little is done for the people who have the most urgent need for housing, the low-income family.

Metro Toronto's great achievement under the chairmanship of Mr. Gardiner was in the field of public works, particularly in the field of expressways. A great many expressways were put on the drawing board and some of them were actually started and some of them are now nearing completion. We are also making some progress in subway construction, which in my opinion is more important than expressway construction, but I will recognize that both of them are necessary and desirable.

However, Mr. Chairman, I think it is time that we started to consider that a city is or should be a place, where people live, not merely a place where they move back and forth to work. Both Metro Toronto and the city of Toronto have failed dismally to develop the community in a way in which it will provide the sort of amenities that people need in order to have a proper place to live.

I would like to quote from another expert in this field, a gentleman called Nigel H. Richardson. In an article entitled, "Let's Stop Building Tomorrow's Slums," which appeared in the Community Planning Review of June, 1959, published by the Community Planning Association of Canada, Mr. Richardson said:

We must recognize that what we are dealing with is one of the most fundamental of human needs; that it involves not just the provision of shelter but the shaping of lives and ways of living; that, in many more senses than the merely physical, we are building tomorrow's Canada. The development and the subdivision just aren't good enough. If we continue to entrust the building of human communities to the ad man, the speculative subdivider, the real estate firm and the small private contractor, without any public control other than the primitive standards we use today, we are going to keep on building tomorrow's slums on a scale that will dwarf anything we know now. Surely, when our children and grandchildren have to deal with the heritage we are in process of leaving them, they are going to wonder if we were crazy.

Mr. Chairman, I put that sort of proposition before the hon. Minister as an indication of the magnitude of the challenge with which he is faced. It is all very well to say that we are now setting up a housing corporation. That undoubtedly will be a step forward.

But we are not going to make any real impression on the type of problem we face with a capital expenditure of $6 million, even assuming that the government will do what it has not done in the past; and that is to use all of the appropriation voted to it. A much more energetic approach has to be taken. We will await with interest the developments during the new year.

I think that the setting up of the housing corporation will be a step forward, but I sense that the hon. Minister has not really appreciated the magnitude of the task he is up against. He has inherited 20 years of total neglect by the present government and, one can say, even greater neglect prior to that because prior to World War II governments did not even consider that they had a significant responsibility in the housing field. Since World War II there has been a growing acknowledgment that there is some responsibility, but an almost total failure to accept this responsibility.

Mr. Chairman, we cannot blame this hon. Minister for what happened in the past; but I am going to suggest to him that the failures and neglect of the past make a herculean effort necessary in the future. I do not see evidence of a herculean effort in what he has placed before us in these estimates.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman, the torrent of words, like a brook, about housing in all its phases goes on together. I guess, like the brook, it is losing itself into some sort of a sea. But I would like to ask the hon. Minister a question. Has this department anything to do with the situation in Cobalt? I notice the headline says that "Cobalt tenants threaten gunfire". They are being forced to move off of mine land. An approach has been made by the mayor of Cobalt, Madam Cunningham, to the provincial government. Does the problem there have anything to do with this department?

Hon. Mr. Randall: No, it has nothing to do with us. That land is owned by the mining company.

Mr. Troy: Yes. Then she would not be seeing the hon. Minister. She would be seeing the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs

Hon. Mr. Randall: I would presume so.

Mr. Troy: Thank you.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, we have heard from the Toronto members and others about the problem of housing in Metro Toronto and its fringes, and the problem of public housing in general. I would like to deal with the problem as I see it in the city of Hamilton, and in particular in relation to a project we have there now. I might say I am glad to hear the hon. Minister saying that Hamilton was one of the projects that they expect will start this year.

I have been interested in this project and have had some doubts as to whether it was going to come to fruition because of the kind of a survey that was taken. In the last session of this House I raised, with the previous Minister of Economics and Development, what I thought was a problem in the Roxborough Park development in Hamilton, in regard to the type of formula established there—inasmuch as when the income went over a certain level the people were given notice to vacate. I had received several calls and letters from these people asking that something be done, that they would like to stay there, that they were willing to pay more rent because their roots had been there for the eight years the project had been in operation and their children were going to school there, and that they had developed a community spirit.

The Minister at that time gave me a very receptive reply inasmuch as he agreed with this kind of a problem and was in favour of changing the formula to one of geared income—which was being talked about much at that time—and that he would certainly support it and get some assistance from the federal Minister at that time.

I know that several of the residents of that project did contact the federal Minister with their problem to see if he could do anything; and they did receive an answer, to the effect that this was a provincial and municipal problem and that the initiative would have to come from the municipality. Well, this was fine. I was pleased that there was some recognition of that kind of a problem.

After several complaints had been raised at the Hamilton and District Labour Council about the lack of adequate housing and sub-standard housing, the council set up a public housing committee and we did approach the city council with our impression of the problem. At the meeting we had with the city council we were informed that they had requested a survey be taken in Hamilton to find out what the demands were for public housing, or more public housing, in the Hamilton area.

I did meet with the mayor myself prior to that meeting, in regard to the Roxborough Park project and the problems the people were facing there. He sympathized with the problem and promised me he would take it to the board of control to suggest an investigation to see if there could be a change made from the formula to the geared-to-income formula, or even as to whether or not the people could buy homes in this particular project.

I do not know what happened in the meantime. I could not get satisfaction to the point where it was taken to the board of control. I was convinced, because I was told that when this kind of a subject is raised in a municipality then right away the free enterprise real estate people get their machinery going. They have the ability to put the damper on public housing. But nevertheless, we did get the assurance that the provincial government, under the housing board, was going to make a survey. I did receive a copy of the letter that the director sent to the city clerk telling him they were pleased they were going to be able to start the survey and asking him to make certain advertisements. The advertisement was made, and within less than a month there was a press release to the effect that a public housing survey draws little response. This sort of agitated me and, particularly, the Hamilton labour council housing committee because it appeared that this kind of thing may bring about inaction in relation to a public housing project for Hamilton.

I was little surprised at that kind of response because the kind of ad that went into the newspaper was one that you would put there if you did not want anyone to recognize it. It is the kind of ad that went into the Hamilton Spectator on the second to last page, among all of the advertisements for bingo games, bazaars and city by-law regulations. It was hidden in one corner. And you can see the kind of response that would raise with people in need of housing. Of course, I found out later that the survey was being made on the basis of trying to find out what people wanted and not what they needed. This again gave me some feeling that a real analytic survey was not going to be made—the kind that should be made to really determine what we need in regard to public housing.

I am very pleased with the announcement that the establishment of a provincial housing corporation is now a fact. I must say that the man who has been appointed as chairman is one in whom I have a lot of faith, a public citizen, a person who is dedicated to do something for the community and I am sure that Mr. Soble will do his utmost to see that the proper kind of a job is done.

But I would suggest that the Roxborough Park project is one that could be gone into immediately. I think there is everything there to try the experiment of an integrated community. I know that most of the public housing planners are now in favour of geared-to-income projects and to the kind of project where they can buy homes and put the public housing into the general municipality's way of life. The Roxborough Park project is still under the old formula.

I have been called twice this week by families who are now in the fear of receiving their notice to vacate because they have now submitted their T-1 forms. They feel that because they may have gone $100 over the allowable level, they will get their notice to get out. I have talked to several families there about a change to a formula of geared-to-income or a formula that would allow them to buy. They are very pleased with this kind of an idea, even though they would have to pay, in some cases, substantially more rent. They would rather do that and feel they could live there until they decided to move themselves, and pay the extra rent, rather than be given their notice to vacate.

The Roxborough Park project is one that could be turned into a real community project. It has multiple family units. It has single detached units. It has attached units, semi-detached units. I think that here we could immediately get into this programme and take the fear of frustration off most of the people who are tenants in those units. They are all frustrated with the fear that the time will come when they receive their notice to vacate because they have gone over a certain amount of income.

As I said, there is generally a good community spirit in that project. But there is also a great degree of suspicion amongst the tenants, wondering if their wife gets a job to help supplement the need for income, the neighbour is going to squeal on them; whether they have to be careful about working overtime and not let anybody know it. In some cases, overtime income has brought about the notice to vacate in some particular instances. So I would hope that this project could be given immediate attention in the Hamilton area.

I had a meeting with the Hamilton labour council housing committee, with Mrs. Levine, in regard to the kind of survey being made. We were disappointed when we learned that to this kind of advertisement, and the subsequent press release, there was little response. As you know, the person who would be interested would either have to go to the city hall or write for a questionnaire, fill the questionnaire in—which was quite lengthy—and send it back, before the survey could be effective. We expressed our concern to Mrs. Levine and we felt that she should have more help in the field.

They should make a door-to-door canvass in some of the slum areas uptown, in the areas considered to be inadequate for housing, and find out just what is going on there. She told us very frankly that her job was not to analyze and make a survey as to the needs of people, but as to the wants of people. She was very frank in saying that, if you do otherwise, you get into the area of philosophy and not practical analytic survey.

But I think we have got to determine the needs, or we are not going to do the real job. I feel now, with the results of the survey up to date, even with the fact that we have a backlog of 300 applicants for admission into the Roxborough Park project and, up until a month ago, they had received 120 questionnaires in response indicating a desire for this type of public housing, that without any doubt there is justification for at least another 1,000-home project in the Hamilton area.

The main point I would like to make is that the present project should be changed to a geared-to-income project. I think it would develop a far better situation in that particular area.

There are a lot of things which arise from the type of project existing in Roxborough Park. It made me feel, when visiting many of the families, that there was sort of a "commissar" approach, inasmuch as the inspector—they felt anyway, although I told them it should not be the case—would walk in at any time. I had instances related to me where inspectors were doing just this, where the people could not paint their rooms unless the inspector came and looked it over and notified them some time later that they could purchase paint and paint their bathrooms or their kitchens. Other people complained that the inspector would come and tell them that men were coming at a certain time to paint. They had nothing to say about what time they would come. At three o'clock in the afternoon, if he said, "This is the time we are coming into your place to paint," he came then and he painted, whether they were ready for it or not.

I think there should be a real look at the formula of this existing project as to whether—I think it would be very simple—there were some people who were undecided as to whether the present tenants should pay the difference. I believe it was between $11 and $18 difference in rent, based on the year's income project, as to the present type; but I feel that it is very simple to take a survey in that particular project to ascertain whether they would be satisfied with the geared-to-income kind of a formula. I also think it is the kind of project where several would entertain the idea of buying their own property rather than sit there, undecided, and always expecting to get their notice to vacate.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 412 agreed to?

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I thought the hon. Minister was going to make some comments so I was holding back.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I would like to comment on what the hon. member for Wentworth East said.

In the first place, the survey of demand and need is still going on in Hamilton. We did not issue that press release; I do not know where it came from. I am glad you brought it to our attention that the ad was not very compelling. Perhaps what we should do is prepare these ads for the municipalities. It is the municipalities which place the ads so we will take a look at that and make sure that the ads get more attention. But the survey on need and demand is still on; we have not completed it yet.

I would like to point out about these homes in Roxborough: In view of the project which was established there we are in no position to offer those homes for sale to the people living in them. But certainly we think that if we had other projects in the area available on a purchase basis, they would get first opportunity to buy them.

Mr. Gisborn: What I would like to ask the hon. Minister is: Is it not permissible to change the formula to a geared-to-income formula?

Hon. Mr. Randall: We have that under study at the moment. It is one of the things we are talking about.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, there are two or three questions I would like to ask the hon. Minister before the vote is passed.

First of all, with regard to item four under vote 405, the hon. Minister is asking for $150,000 for the rent certificate scheme. I would like to ask him for up-to-date information on that project. How many units are now covered by the rent certificate plan and how many, is it envisaged, will be covered in this fiscal year?

Hon. Mr. Randall: At the present time there are 245 units, which cost the province $120,000 last year. We set up a budget of $150,000 this year because many of those units are now up for renewal of leases and the landlords all want more money. This is one of the problems we run into with a rental basis, which we hope again to solve in this new programme for housing.

Mr. Bryden: Would one be entitled to assume, from what the hon. Minister has just said, that it is not envisaged that the rent certificate plan will be expanded? I got the impression from what he said that any additional money provided is not to increase the number of units covered, but simply to cover the possible increased costs of rent. Is that a fair assumption?

Hon. Mr. Randall: This is a programme on which the provincial government went alone, as the federal government would not participate, and that is one of the reasons why we stopped when we did. I think the new programme we are talking about will supplement that—in this rental and purchase of homes we are talking about in our new programme—so we are looking at it. But I think we can find a better answer than we have had in that programme of 245 homes. We think that the new programme will replace that without too much difficulty and at a lot less cost.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, there is a question I would like to ask under vote 412, which covers the capital end of the programme.

Last year I think the amount voted was $4,370,000. I would like to ask how much of that appropriation was spent?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Approximately $2.3 million.

Mr. Bryden: Well, that is about the poorest year we have ever had, is it not?

Hon. Mr. Randall: No, I do not think so.

Mr. Bryden: We cut down the vote last year because the government was not spending. We did not cut down the vote; the hon. Minister cut down the vote, presumably because the government was not spending even what was appropriated for it. And here we have the smallest vote in years and only half of it spent.

Hon. Mr. Randall: We had the money available but could not get the projects underway, so we spent whatever we could spend on the programme. To go back on previous years: In 1960, we spent $2,465,750; 1960-61, $2,189,000; 1961-62, $1,000,814; 1962-63, $1,000,843; and 1963-64, $2.3 million.

I think the hon. member asked before, when he was on his feet, what are we going to do with $6 million? I would just like to suggest to you that I have not heard of any limits as far as the federal government is concerned. If they match that with a 90 per cent loan there is $66 million which can be spent on housing. And if we split that 10 per cent difference with the municipalities and they put up $6 million that is $12 million, as against $120 million we will have to spend on housing from the federal authorities.

Mr. Singer: Easier than making money on the market.

Hon. Mr. Randall: There is a limit. I presume there would be a limit as to how far Mr. Pearson would want to go. But so far, on a basis of 10 per cent, and them putting up 90 per cent, there is $120 million available. I do not know whether the federal Minister of Housing would spend that kind of money or not but, as I say, there is the possibility we will spend our $6 million.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, we have heard this sort of story before about all the things which are going to be done. However, the hon. Minister was speculating at this point—or “hypothesizing”, if I may use that word. I would suggest that this should become his objective. I do not see why he cannot persuade Mr. Pearson to go along. Maybe these hon. gentlemen on the Liberal benches would provide a little help in persuading him if he gets difficult. Why not make it an objective of $66 million?

I would also suggest that now that the federal government is thinking in terms of 90 per cent, perhaps the municipalities could be relieved of these capital expenditures altogether. Even the relatively small percentage they have been asked to put up is fairly burdensome for a municipal government. And if the federal and provincial governments can take over the whole cost—cover all of the capital expenditures—I think we might get something going—$66 million would be at least a start for this year. I would say anything less is not good enough in view of the size of the problem.

One last matter I would like to ask the hon. Minister about, Mr. Chairman, relates to the nature of the programmes he contemplates. He has given us some outline of that already. I am not asking him to repeat himself, but one of the unfortunate developments in the last few years, in my opinion, in the field of public housing, has been the almost exclusive emphasis on full recovery projects. The limited dividend sections of NHA have been used by municipalities to set up limited dividend housing corporations. Most of the projects they have constructed have been in the limited dividend field, the full recovery field. I am not saying that the projects they have constructed have not made a contribution. I have a couple of them in my riding which are very useful, particularly to young families in the middle income groups or the upper-lower income groups, those earning around $80-$100 a week. They get nice accommodation for substantially less than commercial rentals.

But this does not hit the real problem at all and that is the problem of housing the poor. The poor cannot even get into these projects; their incomes are not high enough. I have had several constituents who have been refused admission to limited dividend projects—the Donald Summerville Apartments and the Greenwood Park Apartments, to be specific—because their incomes were too low. It is a fine note when public housing is not available to people whose incomes are at the bottom of the level. That is where it should be mainly available.

I am going to ask the hon. Minister—perhaps it may be a rhetorical question but I am going to ask him anyway—if he has any plan in mind to restore the emphasis on subsidized low-rental housing as distinct from limited dividend, full recovery housing, because we are not really hitting the housing problem unless we do.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Chairman, answering the hon. member for Woodbine, all of our projects are on a rental-to-income basis—22 per cent of the income on a family basis considered for rent. There is no minimum income required for a family. There is a minimum rent of $37.50 a month. I do not think it is impossible for a family to be taken care of. Of course, as you appreciate, we do not have anything to do with the limited dividend companies. Ours is the rental-to-income project. We appreciate some of the things that you have just suggested are necessary and we will take a look at them in order to provide perhaps a better basis for more families to get the kind of accommodation they require. Again I say I think that is what we have in mind, that is our objective. In answer to your previous question, I am quite sure that we will spend the $6 million. It might not make the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) very happy but that is the goal.

Votes 405 and 412 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This concludes the estimates of The Department of Economics and Development.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Chairman, in rising to present the estimates of The Department of Education, I am fully conscious of the fact that I am asking the hon. members of this House to approve expenditures amounting to well over $400 million—just about four times the total Budget of Ontario over two decades ago and almost one third of the total Budget presented in this House some few weeks ago.

It would, in my view, be extremely unfortunate if such massive appropriations were not preceded by a full and thoroughgoing debate and followed by the most searching examination of the individual estimates. I am confident, Mr. Chairman, that we shall have such discussion, and I look forward to what I am certain will be very substantial and helpful contributions from my hon. friend, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Nixon), the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald), and others who will participate in this debate.

The hon. member for Brant is able to speak from knowledge gained from his experience as a teacher and as one who has from early youth taken a keen interest in public affairs. Since he entered this House in 1951, the hon. member for York South has demonstrated a keen interest and I would suggest, a wide knowledge of the affairs of this department. I would be surprised and perhaps somewhat disappointed if he did not have a great deal to say before we reach the final vote.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): In 1955, to keep the record straight.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am sorry.

Those hon. members will no doubt be critical—perhaps very critical. Let me say very frankly that I do not object to that, for after all, where there is no criticism there is no change, where there is no change there is no progress, and where there is no progress there is certain to be stagnation. In a word, Mr. Chairman, criticism is good for the soul and I may add that self-criticism is the law of growth.

But, sir, while it is the duty of my hon.

friends opposite to criticize, there is no doubt in my mind that their comments will be motivated not by narrow partisanship but rather by the desire to make Ontario's educational system one in which we can share a common pride and one that will be adequate to meet the problems and the challenges of the days ahead.

I trust, however, that our discussion will not be limited to a dialogue between myself and the hon. members of the Opposition. Since this session has been something of an "open season" for my Cabinet colleagues in the presentation of their own estimates, I have no doubt that private members, on the government side, will also want to speak freely, and if necessary critically, in the course of this discussion. That is as it should be, for I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that education is indeed everybody's business.

The magnitude of the task before us is reflected in the doubling of our school population in the past decade or so and in the estimate that by 1970 we shall reach, if not exceed, the two million mark—a veritable youth explosion. More than that, by 1970 it is now estimated that upwards of 100,000 young Ontarians will be entering the doors of the 17 or 18 universities we fully expect to have in operation by that time. From these institutions must come those young Canadians equipped with creative minds and skilled hands, possessing the intellectual, social and spiritual comprehension which will enable them to play their full part in leading Canada into her second century and forward to a greater future.

Mr. Chairman, such advances and developments and such exciting prospects as I have mentioned just did not enter the thinking of our people in the 1940s when we had only five institutions of higher learning.

Meantime, as the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. S. Lewis) brought so forcefully to our attention in his address of some weeks ago, automation continues to sweep on, creating ever new problems and challenges. It is suggested that the 30-hour week may not be such a distant prospect and that we must guard against the danger of becoming a nation faced with extensive leisure without knowing how to use it.

Such developments must, of course, be the concern of the government, but they are far too important to be left to the government alone; they must be the concern of every member of this Legislature and indeed every citizen of this province.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is quite clear that in the period ahead our problems are likely to grow rather than to diminish. Such problems as school construction, school finance and teacher supply which have occupied so much of our attention during the past 15 years will be with us for many years to come. And so, Mr. Chairman, let me deal with some of the immediate problems engaging the attention of the department.

Last September the department sponsored a two-day conference on school construction and design. This conference was well attended by trustees, teachers, architects, engineers, contractors, municipal officials and representatives of many other interested groups. This extremely successful venture illustrated very clearly that much more communication is necessary among those responsible for the financing, design and construction of school facilities, sir. Those in attendance at this conference strongly recommended that conferences of a similar nature be held from time to time to facilitate an exchange of views among all parties interested in school construction. The department received many letters of congratulation on its initiative in sponsoring this conference, from organizations and professional bodies, such as the Ontario Trustees Council, Ontario Teachers' Federation, the Association of Ontario Mayors and Reeves, the Ontario Association of Architects, Ontario Federation of Home and School Associations, the Association of Professional Engineers of Ontario, and the Association of School Business Officials.

It became obvious I believe, Mr. Chairman, at this conference, that because of changing educational needs and the impact of new teaching techniques and devices, school boards in this province need much more specific help in the planning of schools to meet present and future needs. It was felt further that more information was needed regarding materials and methods of construction and their effect on construction costs. The office of the technical adviser in the department has achieved a good deal in this field over the years through examination and approval of plans for grant purposes and through consultation with boards of trustees and their architects. It is now clear, as one of the results of the conference, that the investigative and informational service regarding school construction requires special attention by the department. The decision has been reached to establish an office of school planning and building research, and provision has been made, therefore, in the estimates of the department for this purpose.

As I acquainted the hon. members with the general basis of the Ontario Foundation

Tax Plan earlier, I shall not go into the details of this aspect of school financing at this time. For your information, however, I may say that payments on account of the 1964 legislative grants are again being made in four instalments this year, the first payment being made in February and the final payment being scheduled for November. I understand that boards of trustees found the payment of grants on a similar basis last year a distinct help in meeting their budget commitments.

Two steps have been taken during the past year to increase teacher supply: An agreement has been reached with the University of Western Ontario for the operation of an Ontario College of Education in London, in affiliation with the university, for the preparation of secondary school teachers; and a new teachers' college opened in Sudbury last September for the training of bilingual students preparing to teach in elementary schools attended by French-speaking pupils. Tenders have been called for the London college and its opening is planned for September, 1965. The Sudbury teachers' college now occupies temporary quarters in a secondary school, but it is the intention to erect a building for its use in the early future.

I am pleased to say that the establishment of this second teachers' college in the province for the training of teachers for French-speaking pupils has met with an encouraging response. A year ago, there were 302 bilingual student teachers attending the University of Ottawa teachers' college. Now the combined enrolments of that college and the one in Sudbury total 382, representing an increase of 26 per cent.

The overall enrolment in the teachers' colleges preparing elementary school teachers has also increased markedly, and now stands at 6,410, showing an increase of 896 over last year's total. The increase, fortunately, is principally in the one-year course which admits students with standing in eight grade 13 papers. The enrolment in that course is 3,755. When the enrolment in the one-year course is somewhat in excess of 5,000 it will be possible to consider the discontinuance of the two-year course for students from grade 12. This may be possible within a year or two.

The hon. members may recall that a committee was appointed three years ago to examine and report on the training of teachers for the secondary schools, and that its very useful report was submitted in 1962. The recommendations made therein are receiving careful attention in the department and have had a very substantial influence on the planning of both building and programme for the new college of education in London, which I have mentioned. Decision has now been reached to establish a similar study committee to report on the preparation of teachers for the elementary schools of the province. I may add that the Ontario Teachers' Federation has expressed strong interest in having such a study made. The personnel of the committee will include representation from teachers, trustees, parents' groups, and school administrators as well as university officials. The last survey of the training of teachers for the elementary schools was made by the Royal commission on education that reported in 1950. It is felt that the whole field should be reassessed in the light of the situation in the nineteen-sixties.

I might add, Mr. Chairman, that since I prepared the few remarks for the estimates that we have had a similar presentation made by a joint committee of the University of Toronto and the Toronto Board of Education, requesting a similar study be undertaken.

As far as the recruitment of secondary school teachers is concerned, I can report that in all courses—both winter and summer—the number of secondary school teachers taking first courses of training in 1963-64 totals 3,401, representing an increase of 695 over the figures of a year ago.

Pupil enrolment, teacher supply and the financing of school construction and operation are of great importance; but it is the qualitative aspect of education, of course, that will always concern us most as parents and citizens. It is the quality of our teachers, the wisdom of our curricula, and the enthusiasm and industry of our students upon which the effectiveness of our school system must be based. Bearing in mind the wide range in the mental and physical characteristics that must exist among more than a million and a half young people, we see that the responsibility of the schools to help each student to realize his own best self is very heavy indeed. We must recognize, too, the urgent and growing call for adult education, not only in the universities and other institutions for post-secondary education, but for the cultural and vocational development of persons no longer in school.

The curriculum branch of the department is busy completing the extensive revision of courses and the development of new courses for the reorganized programme in the secondary schools. In speaking of curricula, I should like to mention the interest of The Department of Education in the investigations being pursued independently by the recently organized Ontario Curriculum Institute. This institute was founded in November, 1962, and its sponsors include representatives from five groups or bodies: the Ontario Teachers' Federation, the Ontario Trustees' Council, the universities, school administrators, and The Department of Education. Last year it operated under a provisional board of governors, but this year the first board of governors appointed under its new constitution has taken over—a board of 30 members comprised of six representatives from each of the five groups I have named.

The curriculum institute operates independently and has for its purpose curricula study and research. Its first two studies, begun last summer, were concerned with the teaching of a second language and with the teaching of science. The Department of Education is a participating member of the institute and last year contributed $50,000 to its financial support. The institute is independent of the department, however, in its study programme. The department will give careful attention to the institute's findings and recommendations. I have asked that copies of the first two studies be made available for the hon. members so they too may study the results of the first studies made by the curriculum institute.

I have previously announced the establishment of a committee to inquire into and report upon the nature and function of the Grade 13 year, particularly in the light of the comments frequently heard that the Grade 13 year is a cram year and that it should constitute a more effective bridge from the secondary schools to the institutions of higher learning. The committee has had a number of meetings and I understand their deliberations are proceeding very satisfactorily.

In the field of curriculum we have become so accustomed to pinpointing new needs and questioning traditional practices that we may pause too seldom to take satisfaction in some substantial achievement. An example of progress that occurs to me, among a number, is the advance that has been made in the field of music instruction. Some thirty years ago, the first provincial supervisor of music was appointed for the schools of this province. Today, 1,000 music teachers, half of them with intensive training, direct instruction in this subject in elementary schools, and 450 continue the programme in the secondary school system. Of the latter, 250 have had special preparation in a university faculty of music or in departmental summer schools. At the Kiwanis music festival held in Toronto last month, 60 outstanding school bands, 40 choirs, and 20 orchestras demonstrated the musical quality that is being achieved throughout Ontario by our young people, much of it the result of instruction received in our publicly supported schools.

I mentioned a moment ago the growing call for adult education. This is being met in part by night classes held in secondary schools and technical institutes; by local library services; by courses offered by community organizations working with the department's community programmes branch, and by free correspondence courses, chiefly in academic subjects, provided by The Department of Education. I shall comment this afternoon on two of these agencies: the public libraries and our correspondence courses.

The development of public library service in the past ten years has been substantial. Expenditure by public library boards increased by 200 per cent during this period, and there has been a corresponding increase in the legislative vote for grants to libraries. Circulation of books, films, and other items increased by 100 per cent in the past ten years. Our policy has been to encourage the development of municipal and county libraries, and also regional library co-operatives, which serve to co-ordinate and supplement libraries within regions. With this development, the need for research into problems of library organization and service has become apparent. We have, therefore, agreed to pay the Ontario Library Association a grant of $10,000 this year and subsequently an annual grant of $5,000 until a library survey which it has projected has been completed. The work by the Ontario Library Association will be supplemented by studies undertaken by the staff of the provincial library service branch of this department.

The correspondence courses offered to students not enrolled in school were originally established by The Department of Education to serve boys and girls in remote areas not served by accessible schools. As the pioneer fringe of the province receded, the number of children requiring such courses decreased, but the number of adults desiring secondary school courses increased. Employed persons wishing to upgrade their academic education from Grades 7 to 13 find such courses a convenient and effective means of doing so. In 1963, more than a thousand students prepared in this way wrote Grade 13 examinations with a 70 per cent record of success. More than two thousand students are studying Grade 13 subjects by correspondence at the present time. Correspondence courses in the theoretical work of certain trades are also available but a charge of $10 is made for these subjects, which include motor mechanics, carpentry, radio repair, and machine shop operation.

Three special groups with particular needs are currently receiving attention in The Department of Education. Trainable retarded children; unemployed adults; and young people who have left school, often prematurely, and who have educational and recreational needs.

First, for the trainable retarded children, a new plan has been devised to eliminate the necessity of financing a portion of the operating costs of their schools through charity drives and voluntary donations. While the details of the new plan are outlined in the legislation I introduced a day or so ago and will be considered here in the House it may be helpful if I say something now regarding the development of the programme for retarded children in this province.

The Department of Education has been involved since 1948 in providing financial assistance and educational advice to local associations conducting training programmes for children whose mental capacity renders them unable to profit from attending a regular elementary school. An experimental project in this field was carried out in Kirkland Lake between 1948 and 1953. The success of this pioneer effort resulted in an amendment to The Department of Education Act to permit the Minister of Education to make grants towards the cost of education of trainable retarded children enrolled in classes conducted by parents' groups affiliated with the Ontario Association for Retarded Children.

In the ten years since that time, more than $5 million in provincial grants has been paid to local associations for retarded children to help with the cost of building and operating their schools. More than 45 associations have built new schools with advice and financial aid from The Department of Education. Last September, there were 2,759 children enrolled in these classes; and there are, at present, 84 associations in the province conducting a total of 87 schools.

The department has provided summer courses for the teachers of these schools, and it has on its staff two special services inspectors who visit the schools to assist the teachers with their school programmes. On behalf of the government I express to the leaders in the associations for retarded children sincere appreciation of their energy and devotion. Their efforts have paid rich dividends in better adjusted boys and girls, happier homes from which they come, and better understanding on the part of the public of the problems associated with the mentally handicapped. The movement has received enthusiastic backing from the citizens of the province, and there is general agreement that the time has arrived to take a further step in the development of a full programme for these children.

The second special group I have mentioned is the unemployed. One of the general objectives emphasized in the report of the select committee on manpower training was the provision for training unemployed workers who have obsolete skills or who are relatively unskilled. Such provision is made in the province under programme five of the federal-provincial technical and vocational training agreement. Through mayors' advisory committees and local boards of education, or secondary school boards, training has been provided for 21,000 unemployed persons during the past three years. In January, 1964, some 5,400 people were enrolled in such classes in 35 centres. It is estimated that approximately 83 per cent of the graduates from these courses proceed directly into gainful employment.

To date, the cost of such training has been met by the federal government paying 75 per cent of the operating costs and of the trainee allowances, but from now on the federal refund of trainee allowances will be on a 90 per cent basis, as the result of a recent change in the agreement. The balance of costs is met by the province. To qualify for refund at the percentages noted, Ontario must provide at least 286,000 training days per fiscal year, but this requirement is greatly exceeded in our current programme.

The third group to which I made special reference is the young people in the age group, let us say, from 16 to 25 years who have left school and are in their first years of employment. In part, the problem, in the words of the manpower training report, is "salvaging drop-outs and enhancing their employability", but I should like to go further than that in assisting this sizeable group to adjust themselves to happy useful living in our urban and rural communities. With this aim in view, I announced six months ago that a youth branch would be established in The Department of Education for the purpose of co-ordinating the ongoing programmes of voluntary agencies, the community, and government in the interests of this particular group. The services of an outstanding educator have been obtained on loan, during the current year, to assess the needs of these young people and to make suggestions as to policy and programme for the new branch.

The survey in this connection is already under way. It is clear that automation in business and industry has created problems other than those of employment. Linked with increased leisure time and the progress of urbanization, it has contributed to special problems among the youth of the community. The policy of the new branch will be directed towards fostering a co-operative approach among private, voluntary and governmental agencies in the endeavour to do something constructive towards meeting these problems.

I am informed by the director of the survey that the enthusiasm and the hope with which it is being met could hardly have been anticipated. More often than not there is the suggestion that if we would work with and for youth "to seek its purpose and pursue it" we would do well to find out what are the problems of youth right now and what, in general, will be the complexion of the very early tomorrow that youth will have to face. It has often been said that youth must be made responsible to the community. Has not the time come to find ways of making it possible for youth to share fully in responsibility for the community? This whole question will, I am sure, receive the close attention of the select committee on youth to be appointed during the session.

If we know the nature and extent of a problem there is a better chance that we can do something about it than if the problem is loosely defined, full of information gaps, and a mixture of truths, half-truths, and one or two distortions. The delinquency picture and the school drop-out problem are areas which come under scrutiny at once in this regard. Rumours about increases in the obsolescence of certain jobs are not helping our young people to develop the necessary courage and drive. At the same time, there is much said about new kinds of jobs growing out of the discarding of the old kinds. There is an air of uncertainty. If this new kind of world is to be an automated one, there will have to be borne in mind the implications of the comment that society is quick to be proud of its developments in the area of automation but is hesitant to accept the social consequences of such automation.

The youth branch may be able to give a real service by sharpening the uncertain edges of the economic trends of the very immediate future. It may be able to help the curriculum and course builders; it may be able to foresee certain trends. I am hopeful that the counsel it may be able to provide indirectly to concerned youth may contribute elements of stability in a situation which at present is somewhat vague and uneasy.

Perhaps the time has come to have other disciplines helping the educator to maintain a continuing sense of balance. Under the general heading of youth services there might be a blending of research co-ordination, experienced economist's insights, recreation specialist's point of view, and practical social worker's concern for the identity of the individual.

In the meantime, the Ontario-wide survey which I mentioned is under way. Within a few weeks contact will have been made with, we hope, all known services to youth on the part of governmental, public and private agencies. The analysis of this data should tell us what is going on, who is doing it, who is paying for it, and to what extent.

Reverting to trends in the established school system, I would emphasize, as I did a year ago, the growing movement towards the establishment of the centralized rural schools, served by bus lines to transport the children from a much larger district than the traditional rural school section. These schools have been built in township school areas which have closed up their one- and two-roomed rural schools and have replaced them by centrally located graded schools of from six to ten or 12 classrooms. In this way, rural children gain the advantages of a graded school education; special subjects may be taught by special teachers, and good teachers are obviously more easily recruited and held.

The central school has been the result of the formation of larger units of administration, and it is unnecessary for me to repeat at this time the comments I made upon this topic when legislation was recently introduced for the purpose of increasing the number of such units in rural Ontario. I would remind you, however, that in pioneer days the small school section with its three trustees was an admirable unit with which to get education under way in this province. But some 40 years ago, public opinion in favour of a larger unit of administration began to stir—a desire for a unit that, by reason of its very size, might offer rural children broader opportunities in education.

The idea of township school boards was first explored, but it was evident that the time for adopting such a unit had not yet arrived. Yet the situation that existed, with some 5,700 school sections operating independently, called for some action. Finally, in the 1930s, the township school area was adopted as a partial solution. It was a flexible unit—it could be as small as two sections or it could be as large as the municipal councils concerned should decide. Its formation and extent were determined by the people of the local community, through their municipal council or councils. And the township school area, when formed, could continue the operation of the existing schools if it so wished, or it could replace them, if desired, by a centrally located larger school, usually served by bus transportation. The trustee membership of the area board numbered five instead of three.

The township school area plan flourished in the 1930s and 1940s, but because of the economic depression and the war that succeeded it, the larger units did not do much school building. They did improve their educational programme, however, by bringing the physical plant of their group of schools to a higher standard, and by providing itinerant teachers of special subjects. In the 1950s, however, the explosion of school population made it necessary to build new schools, and then the attention of the township school area boards of trustees turned to the provision of central schools.

When the movement towards the township school area was begun, and when increased mileage in paved roads changed the travelling pattern in Ontario, it was not realized how much these two apparently unrelated activities would contribute to the rural central school movement in the 1950s and 1960s. In these recent years, the educational map of the province has changed rapidly in the townships and the benefits of the central school over the one-room rural school are increasingly recognized.

The township school area movement markedly reduced the number of school boards in the province, but in September, 1963, there were still 2,476 school boards in Ontario operating public schools. In years when school population is expanding rapidly, when school building is proceeding on an unprecedented scale, and when district high schools are well equipped to carry on the education of well prepared rural school children, it is important that the problems of rural education be approached in a broader way than is possible under the direction of so many local school boards, many of them responsible for only one school and one teacher. The organization of larger units of administration does not imply that all one-room schools will be eliminated in favour of central schools—local conditions in some cases may make such action neither practicable nor desirable—but it does make better planning possible.

Before leaving the field of elementary school education, I would report that the teaching of French to English-speaking pupils is becoming increasingly common. At the end of September 1963, French was being taught as a second language to English-speaking pupils in schools operated by 160 public and separate school boards. In the majority of cases, French is introduced at the Grade 5 level but in an increasing number of schools it is being introduced at earlier grades. There were 104,206 pupils in the elementary schools receiving this instruction in regular classroom grades, and 3,047 pupils in special classes. Special or itinerant teachers were employed by boards, and of 224 such teachers, 120 are reported to have French as their mother tongue. In addition, 185 regular classroom teachers carried on the teaching of this special subject.

While the scope of the programme in this field is broadening it is clear that a shortage of teachers who are fluent in French is still a limiting factor. The first summer course for teachers of this subject was held in 1963 and 134 teachers attended. Plans have been prepared for a second summer course to be held in 1964.

At the secondary-school level, I may report briefly on the progress being made in implementing the reorganized programme of studies in the secondary schools. The manpower training report made two observations which are closely linked with the objectives of this programme: First, that the "holding power" of our schools must be increased through the offering of a sufficient variety of courses to appeal to the differing interests, abilities and aptitudes of our student population; and second, that to ensure efficient utilization of our human resources, everything possible will have to be done to provide every student with as much education and training as he is capable of effectively absorbing.

The hon. members will be familiar with the reorganization of the secondary school programme in the three branches: arts and science; business and commerce; and science, technology and trades. In each of these there is a five-year programme completed in Grade 13, leading to institutions of higher learning, and a four-year programme which gives a good general education but does not lead to a university. There is also provision for one-year and two-year occupational courses for students who have limited academic abilities and interests and who are preparing for almost immediate employment. These diversified occupational programmes, I may say at this point, are meeting the learning pace of about 10,000 boys and girls this year; last year the number was around 5,000. It is predicted that in a few years it will be over 20,000. If we add to this the growing enrolments of special vocational schools, we find that the number in these occupational programmes will be well over 30,000 students.

When the three-branch reorganized programme was announced, concern was expressed in some quarters that there was little use in setting up the two vocational streams—business and commerce; and science, technology and trades—and in providing technical class accommodation in new buildings across the province under the federal-provincial agreement, because parents would be insistent that their children follow the traditional university preparatory course—arts and science. Happily, Mr. Chairman, this has not been the case. A survey last September, covering 22 representative high school districts, showed the situation to be as follows: Of pupils entering Grade 10 in September, 1963, 46 per cent were headed for the arts and science branch; 28 per cent planned to enter the business and commerce branch; and 26 per cent planned to enter the science, technology and trades branch.

Of the total enrolment in the secondary schools, approximately 40 per cent of the students are enrolled in vocational courses. Since many schools do not separate Grade 9 students into the various branches, but offer a more or less common course under the arts and science branch, the percentage who are actually and potentially vocational is likely somewhat higher than 40 per cent. This distribution of students is evidence that the variety of opportunity now being offered in the secondary schools of the province is being welcomed by parents and pupils alike. The fact that the vocational courses have a strong academic content, and that their pupils graduate with not only a marketable skill, but with a good general education, has contributed to this change in attitude towards vocational instruction.

With varied opportunities available in the secondary school, it is of importance that information regarding courses, occupations, and students' aptitudes and interests should be readily available to pupils and their parents. The role of guidance counselling in the school system has become, then, increasingly necessary. To give additional direction and assistance in this field the departmental staff of guidance inspectors was increased by one member last September, and another inspector will be added this year.

I am pleased to report that the attendance at our summer courses in guidance has doubled in the past three years. These courses were offered in Dryden, Toronto and Windsor in 1963. In 1964 they will be held in Morrisburg, Sault Ste. Marie, St. Catharines, and Toronto. The training thus available will work to the advantage of the pupils in both elementary and secondary schools. But this is a field in which there is still room for more specially trained teachers, and persistent effort to this end is still a necessity.

I should like to mention, in passing, that new courses in agriculture have been introduced, which place stress on basic scientific principles rather than the practical processes which may be learned better out of the classroom. The topics include the roles of chemistry, physics, biology and microbiology as they pertain to the production of food and to the nutrition of plants and animals. I mention these in particular because of the interest in rural areas that such courses be available for district high school students.

In the field of physical education I will comment upon only two aspects of what is quite an extensive programme: activities under the federal-provincial agreement of fitness and amateur sport, and the camps operated by The Department of Education. Under the agreement just mentioned, a grant of $5,000 has been made to each of the five Ontario universities offering courses in physical education, to be used to assist students taking such courses.

It is hoped that certain renovations at our camp properties and the installation of electricity at the Irondale camp will be accepted by the federal authorities as projects to be undertaken under the agreement. To date, some 23 projects have been approved with six more pending. Leadership clinics and seminars have been held in lacrosse, swimming, baseball, track-and-field, wrestling, hockey, basketball, skiing, badminton and field hockey. The new courses in recreation at Guelph have been granted $16,400.

The department owns and operates two camps—and for the benefit of the new hon. members I would invite you to attend either or both of these camps—one at Longford Mills and the other at Irondale. At Longford Mills last summer the two-week courses in leadership were attended by 768 Grade 11 students, and if any of the hon. members have any fears about a great bulk of the young people in this province at this time, I would invite them to attend with me. I was at both camps last summer. I am sure you would go away from these camps with the same impression that I had; that there are many young people in this province who are capable of performing tasks of a very useful nature.

The camp facilities there are also used by many organizations for conferences in such fields as home and school, school athletics, adult education, folk school council, and physical education. In 1963, the camp operated from May to November. At Irondale, three camp courses for leaders-in-training were attended by 280 secondary school students, and a camp directors' workshop was attended by 120 persons. The camp site at Irondale provides almost an ideal situation for the study of camp craft, conservation, and water safety.

Until less than a year ago, the post-secondary school programme in technology and trades, including trade schools and technical institutes, was the responsibility of the secondary branch in The Department of Education. The exceptional expansion of this aspect of education made a change imperative. Last April, therefore, all activities in this field were transferred to a new technological and trades training branch. This branch, under its own superintendent, will give leadership in the development of institutes of technology and institutes of trades or vocational centres as they are now being called, and will supervise the various programmes initiated under the federal-provincial training agreement.

In particular, the objective of this branch is to provide technical and trades training opportunities for anyone over sixteen years of age who is capable of benefiting from such training in full-time classes, evening classes, part-time classes, or in co-operation with industry and business. Part of this instruction takes place in the institutes of technology where three-year courses beyond Grade 12 prepare technologists in a number of fields, such as engineering, business administration, hotel and resort management, radio and television arts, and so on.

Other courses, usually requiring one or two years beyond Grade 12, are offered in the institutes of trades or vocational centres, and prepare students as technicians. The graduates of such courses find employment in positions that involve the installation, operation and maintenance of equipment and appliances; food handling and processing; or mechanical and architectural drafting. The third type of courses are those in apprenticeship. These are short courses usually not exceeding one year beyond Grade 10 in the institutes of trades or vocational centres. They involve from 70 to 90 per cent shop work and lead to qualifications as skilled craftsmen or journeymen in the trades.

The vocational centres will provide related and skill training for the groupings of apprentices as determined by The Department of Labour. In most cases the apprentice will be released by his employer for periods up to ten weeks twice during this apprenticeship to attend a vocational centre for related work and specialized training. Training combined with education will be provided in the vocational centres in all the designated trades and those other trades in which the apprentices are registered with The Department of Labour.

New vocational centres are under construction in Ottawa, London, and Sault Ste. Marie. Two more will be established, the centres selected for their location being Hamilton and Welland. New quarters are being constructed for the institute of technology in Ottawa, and an addition is being planned for the institute in Kirkland Lake.

At last year's session of the Legislature an Act was passed changing the name of the Ryerson Institute of Technology to the Ryerson Polytechnical Institute, and transferring its management from The Department of Education to its own board of governors. This institute was established in 1948 as a successor in the field of technological training to a re-establishment institute that had been set up in the old Toronto Normal School buildings to train veterans of World War II for civilian occupations. In the next fifteen years Ryerson's enrolment grew from 100 to 3,200. The faculty increased from 20 to 160. The number and variety of courses multiplied, and the school earned the reputation of doing a sound educational job, a reputation that stood its graduates in good stead when seeking employment.

Although the bill just mentioned passed in 1963, almost a year has been required to work out a plan to safeguard the pension interests of the institute's employees; to get the new buildings completed; to deal with capital, operational, and equipment budgets; and to realign arrangements within the federal-provincial training agreement. In these activities the department has worked with the group of persons who were named last September as an interim board of governors and who will become members of the first board to be appointed under the Act. I am pleased to state that the somewhat complicated arrangements for the transfer of authority are now completed and that on March 26, 1964, the Act was proclaimed.

Mr. Chairman: It being 6 o'clock, I will now leave the chair and we will resume at 8 o'clock.

It being 6.00 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, APRIL 28, 1964

The House resumed at 8 o'clock, p.m.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Chairman, I think before we recessed for supper, I was dealing with Ryerson and the bill that was passed dealing with the new polytechnical institute.

I now want to touch on another Act that was passed in the last session establishing the Ontario Council of the Arts to consider requests for, and to award grants to, artistic organizations operating within the province. Council members were named last autumn, and under its distinguished chairman, the hon. J. Keiller Mackay, the council during its first four months of existence has been active in the discharge of its duties. It has awarded grants to the National Ballet Guild, the Canadian Opera Company, Canadian Players, Stratford Shakespearean Festival, Crest Theatre, Toronto Workshop Productions, Canadian Music Centre, the Art Institute of Ontario, Toronto Symphony Orchestra, symphony orchestras in Windsor, London, the Lakehead, Brantford, Kitchener-Waterloo, St. Catharines, Richmond Hill and Deep River, and the International Symphony Orchestra of Sarnia and Port Huron. Other orchestras receiving grants were the York Concert Society, the Toronto Chamber Orchestra, and Pro Arte Orchestra. Awards were also given to the Dominion Drama Festival, the St. Catharines and District Arts Council, the Quetico Conference and Training Centre, the Canadian Guild of Potters and the Hawkesbury Valley School. The council has also inaugurated a student-aid programme with a series of bursaries to students from all over Ontario who require financial assistance to enable them to attend the National Theatre School.

The council, in co-operation with the community programmes branch of The Department of Education, has now embarked upon an intensive survey of the state of the arts throughout the length and breadth of the province. It is hoped that results of this survey will clarify the roles to be played by the Ontario Arts Council, the Community Programmes Branch, and the Canada Council, all of whom contribute financially to the development of the arts in this province.

A council of the arts on a provincial level is an innovation. I should like to mention another innovation which The Department of Education is interested in and which I hope will come into being. As Canada's leading industrial province, and as an area that has provided world leadership in many aspects of science, medicine, engineering, agriculture and transportation, Ontario has a proud technological story to tell—not only to those in the province, but to the hundreds of thousands who visit the province each year. It has a story that is a natural inspiration to its young people and a revelation even to the most sophisticated observer. This story is being told partly through small scattered museums, and annual fairs and exhibitions held throughout the province, including the Canadian National Exhibition.

But such messages are necessarily of a temporary nature and lack the effectiveness of continuity. As well, such displays are not designed for thoughtful research or exploration by students or the advanced scholar, and they cannot in their present form give the general public, including the 1.5 million school pupils in Ontario, a cohesive picture of the accomplishments of industry and science in this vast and varied province.

The scattered permanent museums and collections, such as the Bell Homestead at Brantford, while of great value in themselves, are of necessity specialized and are scattered about the province. The Royal Ontario Museum, though one of the world's great repositories of information, is essentially devoted to the passive sciences and arts and to archaeological subjects. Nowhere in Ontario and indeed nowhere in Canada is there a central point of reference on topics of contemporary science and industry. There is no show-window of Canadian technological accomplishments. The genius that went into developing and producing the Alouette satellite and such things as the cobalt bomb immediately come to mind.

With all this in mind, some months ago, I, on behalf of The Department of Education and the province, appointed a special committee to give active study to the feasibility of establishing in Ontario a permanent museum devoted to the display of industrial, scientific and technological accomplishments here in this province and here in Canada. This group is made up of representatives of industry, education, science and other interested citizens prominent in their own fields who are generously devoting their time to this study. It is my earnest hope that out of this will come the establishment of a permanent museum of science and industry in this province.

Educational television continues to receive attention in The Department of Education. Thus far, annual grants have been made to the Metropolitan Educational Television Association better known as META, to assist it in its pioneering activities in this medium in Ontario. In addition, schools have been encouraged to use the Tuesday and Thursday national telecasts for some years, and the facilities of Ryerson institute have been made available for educational television workshops sponsored by the Ontario Teachers' Federation. During the past year, officials of the audio-visual aids branch in the department have investigated the use of educational television in Great Britain and in several areas in the United States.

As a next step in the development of policy with respect to this new teaching aid, an Ontario Advisory Council on Educational Television has recently been established. This body is broadly representative, including among its members, in addition to departmental officials, persons from teacher and trustee organizations, from the home and school group and, of course, from broadcasting agencies. The purpose of the council is to advise the department on the development of educational television in the provincial school system, and to suggest specific telecasts in this connection, and also to encourage teacher education in the production, presentation, and utilization of ETV programmes.

In this partial review, Mr. Chairman, of educational activities in the province, it will be clear that The Department of Education has a heavy programme on its hands, a programme that requires careful planning and administration. The whole question of planning techniques is worthy of attention in these days when it is so important that accurate data be assembled and considered before decisions are reached.

In education, what are the major elements on which we require information, accurate and sufficiently up to date so that we may make valid decisions? The list is relatively short, as a matter of fact. We require information on the pupil, the teacher, instructional materials, school plant facilities, and school finance. In each of these, information is required at different levels—locally, provincially, and in some cases nationally. I am pleased to state that, recently, arrangements have been made in this province for discussion and co-operation among federal, provincial and university authorities in regard to the collection of data pertaining to students, staff and finance.

Already, in some U.S. states, educational data systems have been established through which a computation centre is set up in conjunction with a network of feeding installations, covering local educational units of administration. The plan is that information will be fed from the local agencies through to the central agency, and that most of the processing will be done on the central computer, with the results fed back to the state and local agencies for decision-making purposes.

I have given this type of innovation considerable attention in recent months. We have begun investigations in our own province to see what may be done in organization and working out forms and in setting up the necessary communication systems for the two-way feedback of raw information from local authorities to the centrally located computer; and processed information from the computer to the local authorities. As you are, no doubt, aware we have a computer in the department of educational research of the Ontario College of Education and several others are available which, in combination, are capable of handling any problem of processing and feedback that we may contemplate—certainly on a pilot project basis.

It is only fair to those who are working in the field of educational data processing in Ontario to point out that in many respects our province is at least abreast of what is being done in most educational jurisdictions. In some ways we are somewhat ahead. I would remind you, for instance, that all the information in the Minister's report is now processed by modern equipment, and that arrangements have been made to move from the slower type of machines to a computer as soon as possible. This step is well under way. It has, in fact, been under study for two years. I may also point out that the work on the Ontario Tax Foundation plan was done on computers during the past few months. In fact, for over ten years the principal part of the analysis of school grants and of the evaluation of existing and proposed grant systems has been done on modern data processing equipment.

I would point out, too, that for several years now we have been administering aptitude and achievement tests at the end of Grade 12. These are marked by machine and the results reported by machine. The speed with which these results can be processed is almost incredible. For instance, last year some 50,000 Grade 12 students sat for a high level scholastic aptitude test which required two hours to write. Within ten days of the receipt of the answer cards from the schools, the tests had all been marked, the norms or standards prepared, and the results for each individual student mailed back to the schools. I am assured that through the use of a new machine that has recently been announced this process can be speeded still further and that many of the present difficulties and possible sources of error can be removed.

We have already announced, as you know, that much of the work in regard to the Grade 13 examinations is now done by machine. Last year it was done on a trial basis, in parallel with hand-produced results, but this year the processing and reporting to schools, universities and individual students, including the printing of certificates, will be done by computer alone.

I do not wish to leave the impression that through the adoption of modern methods of data-processing, education will be de-humanized in any way. The educational process must remain an inter-personal one, and teachers and administrators are the means by which it may best be moved forward. It seems only common sense, however, to free these people from as much administrative detail as possible and from time-consuming assembly of reports and factual information, in order that they may have additional time and energy for guiding the instructional programme.

There is one other matter of which I should like to make brief mention. Hon. members will probably recall that at the beginning of the year there was widespread press comment about the 149th birthday of one Sir John A. Macdonald. A number of surveys by press and radio revealed considerable lack of knowledge of the old chieftain—even among upper grade students. For instance, one student said he was the first governor of Toronto; another that he tried to unite Canada with the United States; and still another that he had organized a rebellion against the government.

Now I felt that the matter, as an illustration of what concerns me, was important enough to take it up with the principals of our primary and secondary schools; to whom I addressed the following letter, to which was attached several of the press clippings:

Dear Principal:

The enclosed editorial and feature article from a number of Ontario newspapers of January 11 last, raises a number of questions that should be of interest and concern to all Canadians and, in particular, to our teachers.

Even though, in our view, the examples given of student ignorance of Sir John A. Macdonald and his role may be somewhat exaggerated, the fact still remains that there is a widespread, and to me, regrettable public disinterest in Canada's history and in the men who helped to make it.

Is this, as the article seems to suggest, the fault of our history text books? Is it due to our methods of teaching? Is it in part the fault of our newspapers and other mass media in failing to deal more frequently with historical subjects? Or, is it simply a case of people being so absorbed in the life and problems around them that they have little or no time left to concern themselves with the past? If this is so, then we must pay heed to the closing sentence of the editorial—"a nation that forgets its past is likely to have a short future."

In any case, may I suggest that you discuss the editorials with your staff and let me have the benefit of your reactions. I should also be very pleased to receive any suggestions you may care to make on how our Ontario schools could best participate in the province-wide observance of the 150th anniversary of Sir John A. Macdonald announced in the Speech from the Throne.

Looking forward to hearing from you, and with every good wish.

Up to now, Mr. Chairman, I have received over a thousand replies to this particular letter. There appears to be a rather widespread agreement that we should look into the whole question of history as it is taught in our schools.

These letters, which grow in volume from day to day, are being very carefully studied by our officials and will, I am sure, be of great assistance to us in our preparations for observing the hundred and fiftieth anniversary of Sir John A. Macdonald's birth. Since I have not yet had the opportunity to acknowledge many of these communications, I take this opportunity of thanking our principals, their staffs and the school boards for the interest they have shown in the matter.

I should like to make it very clear, however, that our concern in this area extends beyond Canada's first Prime Minister, and as was stated in the Speech from the Throne, we are working on plans to see to it that other great figures in our history receive the attention due them; George Brown, whose great contribution to Confederation in the view of many historians equals that of Sir John A. Macdonald; Sir Oliver Mowat, Egerton Ryerson, who I would gather would be a non-political, non-controversial figure, and many others who helped to lay the foundations of our province and of our country.

I believe it was the late President Kennedy who said just before his own tragic death:

A nation reveals itself not only in the men it produces, but also in the men it honours, the men it remembers.

Or as one of our leading newspapers put it:

A nation which forgets its past is likely to have a short future.

And if I may borrow some words used a few days ago by Mr. Bascom St. John, let us not make the fatal mistake of letting history "go out of style."

In concluding my remarks, I would be remiss if I did not pay tribute to the practical help which the department receives from the many organizations in this province that are sufficiently interested in educational problems to submit briefs and resolutions and to visit the department in delegations to place their views before the Minister and his officials.

I would mention, in particular, such organizations as: the Ontario Teachers' Federation, the Ontario School Trustees' Council, the Ontario Educational Association, the Ontario Association of School Business Officials, the Ontario Federation of Home and School Associations and the Catholic Parent-Teachers' Association.

These I believe are just representative of a larger number of groups whose activities deserve our warmest commendation and gratitude.

The Department of Education, in my view, must not be a cloister relying solely on paper directives. It must at all times be outward-looking, giving leadership and inspiration to our school boards, to our teachers and the many voluntary organizations who play such a vital role in the educational process.

In line with that concept I have made it a point to visit as many sections of the province as other duties will permit and I have found these personal contacts to be most rewarding.

It is my hope that in the coming period we shall be able to devise even more effective means of exchanging views with our boards and teachers on our common problems.

I know that we shall always derive great benefit from drawing on the knowledge and rich experience of the devoted men and women who share the field of education with us.

On vote 501:

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister was at his disarming best this afternoon and this evening. In discussing his opening remarks with the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald), who is almost my seat-mate, we came to the conclusion that perhaps we should let the estimates go by without further comment. But then, of course, on second thought, it is obvious that we, as members of the Legislature and as citizens of Ontario, are called upon to discuss and I suppose eventually approve the expenditure of an amount in excess of $422 million being asked for by this department. Of course, the policies and regulations of the department administer far more money than that. All of us who have to accept responsibility as taxpayers on the local level know that a full 50 per cent of the funds we contribute to the municipalities are again spent on education, and certainly there are tremendous sums and funds coming from the federal Treasury, not only for the support of our vocational programme but in the university level as well.

Therefore, I would like to begin by talking about the topic that is most difficult, and that is educational finance. Over the past year we have been much concerned with this, naturally, and very interested in the policy of the present government in the introduction of what has been called the Foundation Tax Plan 1964. It has received a quiet reception across the province, probably because of the intricacies of the plan itself. The hon. Minister has already told the House that it requires the services of a computer to apply it. I am warning him that these computers can sometimes be programmed to the point that some Monday morning when he comes into the office there will be a message from the computer telling him that even he is no longer necessary.

Certainly the citizens of the province and those directly associated with education have adopted a wait-and-see policy as far as the government's foundation plan is concerned. We do know that the plan administers $190 million for primary education alone, and we have only the government's assurance, as spoken by the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) and the hon. Minister of Education, that the extra money involved in this plan which will be directed to the support of the separate school system, will in fact produce the equality of opportunity that is the intention of the plan and its supporters in the province and on all sides of this House.

One item in the report of the hon. Minister of Education with regard to the supply of teachers would indicate that there is still a shortage of teachers in the separate school system. Eventually I would like the hon. Minister to tell the House whether this is in any way associated with a shortage of funds available for the separate school educational programme.

In examining the foundation plan as carefully as I could, and with some advice, I believe it is saying that the government has judged that the supporters of the separate schools cannot call on a share of the industrial assessment beyond that which is indicated by the actual Catholic ownership in this assessment. In order to make up for this drawback, special grants are made available by this new foundation plan from government funds, and which are allocated on a ratio similar to the ratio of the assessment in the community and not associated with the ratio of students involved. It is interesting to see that this has been accepted by all areas so far in the educational community, and of course all of us will keep a sharp lookout to see to it that equality of opportunity is in fact achieved.

All hon. members of the Legislature were presented with a copy of a very interesting book by Franklin Walker entitled, Catholic Education and Politics in Ontario. I do not know whether all the hon. members, Mr. Chairman, have had an opportunity to read this—I certainly have not read it all—but having a special interest in the period beginning about 1934 I did notice this part very carefully. It is interesting to read this academic and historic account of what went on in this chamber at that time, when one of the previous "final solutions" to the separate school problem was debated and actually for a time effected in this House. Without trying to recall any of the animosities that were certainly very strongly expressed at that time, I would once again recommend to all the hon. members that this part of our history is one of the most important parts that those of us as party members should be well aware of. The reference of the hon. Minister to the importance of history might be taken as very important in this very connection.

But certainly the root problem in the financing of education persists, and that is that there simply is not enough money to do everything that is required, and the distribution of the funds for educational finance leaves much to be desired. The hon. Minister and many other hon. members of the House realize that this shortage of funds is the biggest stumbling block to even the legislation that the hon. Minister himself has presented to this House. I am referring specifically to the bill which would amalgamate the school sections into the townships school areas. This has already been debated here and at one of the few education committee meetings that have been held up until now.

The big objection, of course, is not to the plan per se, but to the fact that the introduction of the plan is going to work economic hardship in many of the school sections concerned. Representatives of the school sections were present at the education committee meeting where they were able to prove in chapter and verse and dollars and cents precisely what this hardship would be. I was glad to hear from the hon. Minister on another occasion that the government is seriously considering some amendments to this enactment, which will at least ease this burden that has to do with the financial difficulties at the local level.

All of us are aware of the fact that the financial burden of education at the local level has reached the point beyond which it cannot be increased. No one feels that it should be rolled back to any great degree, but I am sure that the government will take definite, carefully planned steps to see to it that the ever-increasing cost of education will be met from sources of revenue other than those directly on the municipal taxpayer. This is of immediate importance. Certainly the announcement of the solution to the present federal-provincial problems having to do with pensions and the whole area of finances will make available additional sums, which it is my fervent hope will be allocated in large measure to the support of this very important responsibility of the province.

In continuing, Mr. Chairman, I would like to make some remarks about curriculum development and its ramifications in many areas of the education system. Certainly we were very pleased to receive this afternoon reports from the hon. Minister on the work in the development of the curriculum as far as science and French as a second language by the Ontario Curriculum Institute, which is heavily supported by the province of Ontario.

Certainly all of us wish this new institute the greatest success in their deliberations. But we must also be aware of the fact that their deliberations are in no way directed by the government, nor the hon. Minister of Education, and their researches take place on a rather broad spectrum. It will be some time before their specific findings can be enacted into the regulations governing the school system as it applies in this province.

With this in mind, we would bring again to the attention of the hon. Minister of Education the words of the Deutsch report of the committee of university presidents. I will not bother looking up the very words, but he would find on page 47 the reference made by the committee to the effect that without an efficient curriculum in the schools, the money and planning that is being and will be spent on our university system is largely wasted.

Efficiency, then, at the two basic levels is paramount. We would urge the government to take every step and bend every effort to bring our curriculum into line with modern and efficient needs. Specifically, I would refer to the announcement again in the hon. Minister's report that a hard, careful look is going to be taken of the curriculum in the area in Grades 1 to 6. I have heard this before, twice, and it is about time that definite action is taken so that this area of the education system will be toned up to meet the needs of the whole system, which must be viewed as a unit.

Once again referring to the university presidents' report, in which they felt that they could range in their considerations out of their own field and concentrate in the area of the schools rather than in the universities, they have criticized the department for a tendency to fragment the system and examine it in sections and pieces. This is true, not only of the curriculum, but of the problem of teacher training, which we will deal with a little later.

We have waited a long time for The Department of Education to have an overall look at the curriculum. It is time certainly that the following things should be examined closely.

First, the need for uniformity in this system. I hesitate to use the word because I know that the hon. Minister opposite is offended by the suggestion that the same thing should be taught in a rigorously uniform manner in all our schools. I do not mean to imply that by the use of uniformity, I mean the rigorous uniformity that he is liable to throw back at me.

Nevertheless, there is much virtue, surely in seeing to it that a basic core curriculum, amounting to 85 or 90 per cent of the work given in the schools, is presented uniformly in the schools of the province of Ontario.

Specifically, I think of the confusion over the presentation of physics and chemistry in Grade 11 or Grade 12; the fact that a course of study in one particular area has so many optional topics involved that the teacher can select the areas in which he has certain interests to the detriment of others. The result is that the product of our school system lacks the uniformity that is essential, surely, in this day and age. The curriculum, then, must be modified in an overall view to present a core of basic subjects which will be taught uniformly in the schools of this province.

As well as this, I feel that the time has come when a hard look must be taken at the material included in the courses at every level. There is a tendency, particularly in the senior grades, to add new material without excising the superfluous material that has developed over the years. This is true, certainly, in the Grade 13 courses and I understand and know that they are in the process of being revamped. We expect great things from these new programmes.

But I am convinced that it is possible to present a curriculum beginning with Grade one and ending with Grade 13 which would allow the average academic student, or a student with reasonable academic ability, to achieve his matriculation standing in 12 years. I want to stress this to the House and I want to state it carefully, so that my words do not indicate the abolition of Grade 13. This is under study now—not its abolition, particularly, but making it more effective. It is true that 40 per cent of the students who do go through our system achieve senior matriculation in 12 years, and, of course, they eventually graduate from Grade 13.

It is also true that there is no uniformity in the system whereby this acceleration can be offered to students of average and above average academic ability. It is also true that in many parts of the system such acceleration is not possible. The result is that our best students have to tread water or mark time somewhere through the system. I would urge the government and the hon. Minister of Education to examine this carefully and come up with a policy that the various jurisdictions in education throughout the province can follow so that there will be uniformity in the system in this regard as well.

Mr. Chairman, I was most interested in the hon. Minister's comment about the specific area in the curriculum relating to the teaching of history. As a matter of fact, in preparation for this debate I myself had selected this area as one which would bear special study. Certainly everybody considers himself an expert in the curriculum. But although I admit to limited teaching experience, I in no way consider myself an expert in this line, or any other educational line for all that matter. I want to make that clear.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Most parents consider themselves expert.

Mr. Nixon: That is true, and as one reads the various articles in papers and magazines one has seen the styles of criticism change. To begin with, our science was in a terrible mess. The Russians had orbited an earth satellite and we really could not get off the ground. Finally, this area was abandoned and we went on to discussing mathematics and "why Johnny don't read good", and a number of things of this nature.

But it seems to me that the area of history teaching in the province of Ontario, and the curriculum as it applies to history, is certainly in need of revamping. Of course we tie in many things with the coming centennial and, surely, our thoughts are directed to the teaching of history because of this.

Then I think of the series of small articles that is running in the Toronto Daily Star and in papers across the province involving quite a well done sketch of one of the historical figures having to do with Confederation and a brief write-up about these individuals. I suppose that many of the hon. members would agree with me that as we see these day after day and realize that we have never heard of some of these people before, that either we were very inadequate as students or the teaching of history at the time we were exposed to it left something to be desired. It is certainly true, as well, that what has been expressed as historical fact is really in question in many special interest groups, and minorities in the province of Ontario.

If you would permit me, Mr. Chairman, I would think of the reaction in my own area to the announcement by the government of the fact that Fort Ste. Marie in the Midland area was going to be excavated and rebuilt as an historic site and as a tourist attraction. You might remember that this was the fortified centre from which the Jesuits undertook to Christianize the area in the very earliest times of the province of Ontario. Of course the people that were being proselytized were the Indians. We all know the fact that the Jesuits were the forerunners in the bringing of the Gospel and the Christian word to this part of the world. Their success was probably the beginning of Christianity in the province as we know it.

On the other hand, it is interesting to know that some of my constituents, the Six Nation Indians, feel that there is another side to this story. From their point of view these were strange people invading their own land with a strange faith, establishing it in an area with warlike fortifications.

The Indians claim their icons, if I can call them that, were destroyed by the white man, who came with great power. They say that their only way of fighting back in those days was in warlike measures. We all know of the tragic martyrdom that the Jesuits suffered in those days. They feel that there is another side to the story. Now that we are so remote historically from the time of the occurrence; here is a minority whose tale has never been told.

The French population in the province of Ontario has often complained that their part in the historical development of the province has not been properly put to our students. And there is another minority that has complained down through the years, and my hon. colleagues and I in the Liberal party belong to that. We have heard the hon. members of this House extoll the great John A. at length—

An hon. member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nixon: —at sickening length, and we certainly would not contest for a moment that this great statesman was one of the prime builders of this nation. But, as the hon. Minister himself has said, it is a sad lack in the history teaching of the hon. members of this House that certainly the hon. George Brown was at least on a par as an architect of Confederation. It was political selflessness on the part of Mr. Brown, whose fine portrait is just to the right outside the doors of this chamber, that enabled the Legislature of the day to carry the first resolution leading to Confederation.

So the Indians and the French and other minorities want their voice heard in modern history.

There is a solution to this, I submit, Mr. Chairman, and it goes along the lines of so many solutions that have been offered in the past few weeks because it takes the form of a centennial project. But I hope it is a project that appeals to the hon. Minister. I am suggesting that he commission, through The Department of Education, a new history of the province of Ontario, and that this history—

An hon. member: Who do you suggest writes it? Anything would be better than the first one.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): How about the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrope)?

Mr. Nixon: —be acceptable by modern critical standards, that it be prepared in an excellent binding and have incorporated in it the very best colour reproductions amplifying not only our history but also our culture. I am not suggesting that this should be inserted into the schools as a mandatory text but if it were put in the hands of the students as a centennial project, it would find its way into the libraries of every home across the province and be most worthwhile. I am sure that the hon. Minister is quite capable of refraining from having his own handsome picture in the frontispiece but even if he were to insist on this, I suppose we would have to accept it.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would have George Brown's as well.

Mr. Nixon: All right. So this is a suggestion that the hon. Minister might take into consideration. Through such a book the development of our free institution based on the British model, but adapted to the Canadian circumstance over the past 100 years and more, could very effectively be taught.

Certainly the teaching of the history of the province itself has tended to be reduced in importance in some of our school systems and in fact left to the good teacher to see to it that it is properly handled. The curriculum must be put in a modern cast so that the history of this province is presented in an acceptable way.

Leading out of the references to curriculum development, of course, comes the place of Grade 13, which is under investigation by a committee that the hon. Minister appointed, and which I understand has been directed to report in June of this year. Is that correct?

Hon. Mr. Davis: We have asked for a report as early as possible and I am told it may have an interim report in June. Whether this will be a conclusive report at this point I would say would be doubtful but we hope it will have some information to guide us as early as June. It has been working very hard.

Mr. Nixon: I want to say a word or two about the curriculum as it presently applies at this level. I think it is true that the number of senior matriculants is increasing faster than the increase in the number of places in the universities and in other post-secondary fields of education, particularly universities anyway. This means that the pressure on the Grade 13 student not only to succeed in his exams but to be in the upper section of the class is increasing year by year. It is true as well that the course has expanded, particularly in science and mathematics, as new material is inserted into them without proper revision so that the material that gradually passes out of date is removed.

This means then that our students at the Grade 13 level are subjected, as the hon. Minister suggested in his report, to a "cram year" experience. They do not get the advantage of a meaningful year of education, in which their participation in the work in the laboratory, or the exchange between the individual student and the teacher is at a level which is most useful. All of us, of course, sense the great value of this pressure, and the students, parents and the teachers know that the moment of intellectual truth that is embodied in the external departmental examination is a hurdle which may be good for the soul.

On the other hand, it is true that the university entrance, which is based almost entirely on this, might be more effective if The Department of Education were to undertake some sort of college-board entrance-examination type of programme which could be viewed by the university registrars as well as the recommendations of the teachers concerned, so that the departmental examinations would not be a one-shot ordeal. Certainly the hon. Minister's committee will have recommendations along these lines but I felt that this was an opportunity when we could urge such a move on the hon. Minister.

I would like also, in connection with curriculum reform, to say something in general about technical education. There is no doubt that the Robarts plan is gradually assuming another name but this is one way to refer to it. As it is developing across the province, it is working a great change in the educational system. We have seen this government, with the participation of the federal government, direct tremendous building programmes centred on vocational expansion.

There has been a great deal of apprehension about this. For one thing, there is the massive commitment of public money along the single line of vocational expansion. The hon. Minister has drawn attention to the practice of pointing to the fact that many of these courses may be teaching obsolete skills, and that the students coming out of such a programme will perhaps be in a position where after four or five years of pretty intensive training, they will have a skill which is either not immediately saleable, or they will be in a position where expensive retraining will be required before they will be able to take a proper place in the industrial community.

There is also the apprehension that there is not enough academic content in the vocational courses that are provided. This is a matter of opinion. We have the assurances of the hon. Minister that this is not so. Nevertheless, in talking to teachers associated with the curriculum there is a feeling that further emphasis on English and history, particularly, might be in order so that these students who do have the benefits of a vocational education will also have a broader background to better enable them to take their place in the society, that certainly they must do.

There is certainly the apprehension as well, that although there is no doubt a large staff concerned with this, the constant upgrading of a curriculum so that it is as nearly up to date as possible is perhaps not taking place. The programme is relatively new. It will be another four or five years before this sort of criticism can be more pointed, but it is a great responsibility for the hon. Minister and those working under him to see to it that this is kept as much up to date as possible.

Certainly then, the programme needs careful and constant course revision. It needs an overall programme permitting practical participation of those taking part in the vocational courses. Some schools do this now. In the education committee a few days ago, we were discussing an enactment that would permit insurance for students who do take part in factory experience while they are taking the vocational course. But it seems to me that this practical participation is essential.

In general, under technical education, we have our vocational schools and the trade schools which evidently are now called vocational centres. We have the schools of technology at the top of which is the Ryerson institute, and then of course beyond that, the technological field at the university level. There is a suspicion on the part of those viewing the educational programmes in general, that this whole area of technical and vocational training requires integration and more overall planning than it is presently receiving. For example, I understand that because of lack of facilities and space at Ryerson, the Toronto Board of Education, and perhaps the London board as well, is presently presenting and paying on its own for the teaching staff and facilities to teach the first year, or what is equivalent to the first year, of the Ryerson course out of Ryerson, that is in the schools of the city of Toronto and some other centres.

I want to know if this is going to be a continuing government policy, because it may be a good one. The vocational institutions that are found in every part of the province, and frequently two or three of them in every city, might very well be integrated in such a way so that the first year of the Ryerson course could be given at the local level.

It is also true that there is an outcry on the part of many municipalities that have been passed over in the distribution of the trade school plums. I think of one near my own constituency, Brantford, an industrial area which has not been in receipt of this. In this connection, I was quite surprised this afternoon when you referred to the one that was going to be built in Welland, that my friend, the hon. member for that area (Mr. Morningstar), did not take part in the general round of applause. There is one in Hamilton, one in Welland and I would urge on the hon. Minister that there could very well be an establishment of one in Brantford as well. It is a long way between Hamilton and London.

Hon. Mr. Davis: How far is it from Brantford to Hamilton?

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, my point is this. It is possible for you to give the first year of the Ryerson course in the vocational schools of the city of Toronto. I submit it would be possible for you to give the first year of this course in many other centres of the province. It is also true that some of the trades training that is given at the present or the developing trades institutes, might also be incorporated in the vocational training schools that are found in such numbers across this province.

This is what I mean by the need for integration and overall planning. These expensive facilities might be put to use for more than just the third stream in the high school system. I would like the hon. Minister's comment on this at some later date, perhaps this evening.

In connection with technical education, I would draw the attention of the House once again to the comments in the report of the university presidents, which admittedly are about a year out of date now, in which they said their closest scrutiny of the government's plans for expansion in technical education would indicate there would be about 6,000 places in schools of technology by 1970. They said that the government should be thinking in terms not of 6,000 places, but 18,000 places. Certainly we want to hear the comments of the hon. Minister in this connection.

I understand there are presently in schools of technology 4,500 students and so it appears that the goal as predicted by the university presidents of 6,000 will in fact be surpassed. But it is a question in my mind, whether the present plans of the government would provide the necessary 18,000 places in time for the tremendous need of these students in the next six years.

In general then, post-secondary education is an area of most important concern as far as the government's line of thinking is concerned, and we are going to discuss the universities and the special problems there on a separate occasion. But in general, extensive post-secondary education is, I would say, a relatively new thing in Ontario. There was a time when students who achieved their entrance would be sent some distance from home to go on to high school, and certainly the churches led the way in the establishment of these schools at the secondary level. But we now take for granted extensive secondary facilities in every community.

It is also true that in most communities, once a student reaches the level of matriculation he must then leave town for further education. For training in nursing and for advanced technical education—certainly to attend the teachers' colleges, as I mentioned, this is necessary.

The technological institutes are not distributed in a way that would do too much to alleviate this problem. Certainly the planning of these expanding facilities is a great responsibility so that in each area there is some measure of post-secondary education. It may well be when we are discussing the development of universities into the proposed community colleges that there will be some word from the hon. Minister in this connection.

Now, as far as the curriculum is concerned, it is a great responsibility, not only for the government but for all citizens. I well remember some months ago when the hon. Minister was reported as saying that he would hope that this could be kept out of the realm of politics. Before his supporters got too interested in that particular statement, I hope that his conception of politics is different than mine, because I believe in the same speech he also announced something to do with text book grants and the announcement of a conference having to do with the planning of school architecture. He took very dramatic steps indeed to introduce education into politics in the pre-September 25 period of time. However, I would now like to make some reference to teacher training.

The hon. Minister announced in his remarks this afternoon that he was going to constitute a committee to look into the problem of teacher-training at the primary level. Of course this is greatly needed and we will look forward to the report of this committee with much interest.

Once again, we would say to the hon. Minister that his decision to study the training of teachers at the secondary level, separate from the primary level, was an error in judgment and that this contributed more than ever to the separation of these parts of education, where no separation is needed. In looking at the statistics that were given to us in the report of the hon. Minister, it was interesting to note that in the area of secondary school teacher training, there were, I believe, 464 students enrolled in the full-year winter course at the College of Education, but well over 3,000 taking advantage of the summer course in education. Yet we have these facilities for the training of secondary school teachers at the present College of Education, and at the expanded facilities that are under construction in London and contemplated in Kingston.

It may be that the report that the hon. Minister referred to in such glowing terms is already a bit out of date. It appears that those who wish to go into secondary school teaching, practically all of whom have a university degree, feel that they do not need to subject themselves to the full-year course and are definitely taking great advantage of the summer courses offered. It certainly is time, in my view, that the government took a new look at the whole problem of teacher training, particularly for those applicants who hold a university degree.

The hon. Minister knows that we have discussed this before, but the report of his committee gave only passing reference to the suggestion that these people, who in fact are undergoing post-graduate training, might be put directly into the schools from university on an intern basis, if I can use that phrase, and in fact take their training as assistant teachers. The plan has much to recommend it. These people have already undergone a course of instruction at the academic level which has given them a Bachelor degree. They are then quite capable of taking part in the instruction in the classroom under the supervision of a teacher with some experience.

I do not want to belabour the point—as I say, we have discussed it in the House before. But he would not only observe the experienced teacher, he would have an opportunity to teach the lessons himself under the direction of the experienced teacher. He would not have a passive role to play in the classroom; he would be able to assist in the many chores having to do with the setting of tests, the marking of tests, setting up the laboratory apparatus, and doing any number of jobs around the classroom and the school. This experience could be in several types of schools. In this way surely there is an alternative to the present system, which is really getting seriously out of date, with such a tremendous majority of applicants making use of what was supposed to be just a stopgap project to provide the teachers needed and hardly any making use of the full year course so heavily recommended by the hon. Minister and his committee.

In conjunction with this plan, there is also the suggestion that the topics of educational value themselves, which every teacher in training must be exposed to at least, might well be given at the university level as he is taking his undergraduate work. It would not be for me to suggest that the full training of the teacher should take place there because the valuable time which would be used in the teaching of the educational subjects would be lost as far as the academic instruction of the candidate would be concerned. But certainly the basic subjects of educational philosophy and psychology could very well be covered at the undergraduate level, permitting such a plan to be effectively introduced in Ontario. I am convinced it will work and surely it is time we gave it a try.

The hon. Minister has also been kind enough to mention, Mr. Chairman, my great interest in educational television. In reading the report of the hon. Minister to see what happened to last year's $50,000, I must say I was deeply disappointed in what has been accomplished or not accomplished. It appears to me that the money was spent in support of the Metropolitan Educational Television Association—and I am not just sure how much it got—and in sending someone to observe what is done in educational television in other jurisdictions. The hon. Minister has announced that an advisory committee would be set up for this. I submit to him, Mr. Chairman, that this is not in the realm of experimental departure now. It is time we had educational television in the province of Ontario, and not on a scale where every third Thursday some programme is beamed out across the province through the generosity of the owners of the present stations so that the schools may tune in if they choose.

It would require an earmarking, I would say, of one per cent of the educational budget so that a system of educational television could be set up in the province of Ontario, giving regular courses in many fields whereby equality of opportunity in all parts of the province would be a fact. I would never for a moment suggest that educational television would be a replacement of the teacher, but surely in the teaching of science, languages and in many other fields, it would be a most useful addition to the present tools used in education.

To continue on a favourite theme of mine, the report of the department would indicate that the thing that is holding up the extension of teaching of French on a conversational basis in the public school system is that there are not enough qualified teachers. Television surely is a solution to this problem.

The qualifications for a teacher like this are twofold. Not only must the teacher of conversational French have a good working knowledge of the language and a proper accent, but the teacher must have a personality so that he can get it across to these young people, probably beginning in Grade 3, Grade 4 and Grade 5. People with these qualifications are few in number, but surely the hon. Minister could select some who would be able to deliver a course of French language instruction, perhaps on a basis of 20 minutes a day, that would be received in the classrooms across the province. In this way we could give a programme of French instruction which would fit in wonderfully well with the present programme that begins at the Grade 9 level. The graduates from Grade 13 then would come out of our system with a working knowledge, not only of a second language, but of the background and the culture associated with it.

I cannot urge this programme on the hon. Minister too strongly. He feels, I am convinced, that educational television is an expensive gimmick and in my opinion he is wrong in this. The province is falling behind in its use.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I have said it is expensive but have never used the word "gimmick".

Mr. Nixon: Just in closing this section of my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I would also like to say that another thing very much in favour of the introduction of a real educational television network in the province of Ontario is the fact that by the year 1970, the best laid plans of the government are going to leave them in an embarrassing situation where their facilities at the post-secondary level are going to be inadequate, to say the least. It was suggested in the Deutsch report that a useful safety valve might be found in educational television, whereby a course for university credit could be given to any student with basic qualifications who cannot gain admittance to an institution of higher learning. I have seen similar courses offered in the United States. They are effective and certainly within the realm not only of possibility but of great usefulness. It is in this connection as well that I would recommend the introduction of a programme of educational television.

Mr. Chairman, as we know, the government is introducing a system of grants and legislation whereby the school boards in the province of Ontario are required to provide textbooks for all students to the end of Grade 10. The grants will largely assist with the provision of the textbooks, but I understand there will still be reasonably heavy burdens on the local school boards in this connection. Let us say a burden will be on school boards in this connection, and the government is not footing the entire bill.

Hon. Mr. Davis: It will be a very minor burden.

Mr. Nixon: You supply one adjective and I will supply another.

As I have already mentioned, the announcement of this was made at a politically opportune time. Nevertheless, the citizens of the province welcome it.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Is there any other time but a politically opportune time?

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): For once, education needs rather than political considerations might get first consideration some time.

Mr. Nixon: It is interesting to note that these new regulations and new grants did not go hand in hand with any particular change in the policy regarding the production of textbooks themselves. They are still produced in large numbers, authorized and put on a selective list; and the hon. Minister has an argument, and I say a good argument, to support this process. Nevertheless, as we get into the realm where the people of Ontario, through their tax monies, are required to provide the text books, it is time that a new policy was evolved with regard to this very expensive procedure.

In this connection I would recommend heartily to the government that they introduce a plan whereby, with the co-operation of the teachers' professional organizations, a yearly book—which I hesitate to call a text book, but a work book associated with the various subjects—be introduced and printed in paperback form by the Queen's Printer. These would be supplied free of charge, I would say free of direct charge, to the students across the province.

These books, admittedly, would be cheaply produced. They would not have within them, and they would not pretend to contain within them, all of the excellent material presently contained in the good textbooks which are available on the authorized list. This would not be their purpose. They would parallel the core curriculum which the revised curriculum will eventually produce in the province of Ontario. The money saved in this way would be used to greatly expand the library facilities in the individual schools.

The students would be urged—as a matter of fact, it would be required of them—that while they would use the material provided in the paperback book for their day-to-day course work, sir, background and project work and further information on all of these subjects would be obtained through the use of the school library. So often these expensive library facilities are provided with a trained librarian and good facilities and a very small percentage of the students make use of them.

In this way, we could train the students to get away from their reliance on a single textbook, which they clutch under their arm and memorize for examination purposes. We would broaden their whole view of education, and we would improve the system immeasurably in this regard.

I would say that this is a personal suggestion. I favour it personally and very strongly, but certainly the whole question of the development of libraries in this province is one of great concern to all of us. This is certainly true of libraries at the university level. I have a report here prepared by Edwin E. Williams, which is a report of a survey for the national conference of Canadian universities, in which he did examine the state of the libraries in Canada, particularly at the university level.

In that report, he said that the best university library in Canada—I particularly want to mention this, because it was mentioned previously in debates and questioned by the hon. Minister—is that of the University of Toronto. It ranks not 14th, but 13th, in North America.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Does he not include the graduate library facilities in his assessment?

Mr. Nixon: Yes, the library facilities at the University of Toronto for the whole university and all the colleges—everything taken together.

But I believe it is true that the support of the libraries in this province is not what it should be. In another place in the report he says that the library systems in all of Canada are falling behind, with the exception of the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta. I am afraid I cannot extend that into any of the other western provinces, but the implication is clear; that the province of Ontario is not keeping up the level of library facilities, which are so much an important part of the educational requirements in the 20th century.

It may be that the library facilities of Ontario are good, by the absolute standards we are used to, but when compared with facilities in other jurisdictions we are lagging behind. I would say that the beginning of a new plan of library development might very well be based on a new and improved and efficient textbook policy, which could be introduced at the school level, and the training of the young people in the use of these facilities.

Mr. Chairman, it is not possible in the capacity at my disposal to give a criticism of all areas of education. It is true, and we are all aware of it, that the problems are many and almost overpowering, but it is also true that the goodwill of the public is extremely great for this government department. They are most anxious for leadership. They applaud any move which is construed as an improvement in the educational system. The money spent for education is perhaps begrudged less than any other, and it is certainly in this department that we have our best chance to improve the world as we know it, and the part of civilization which really lies within our responsibility. We must concentrate very heavily on it.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, my first words would be words of warm commendation to the hon. Minister.

After that outburst, I wonder if the Tory backbenchers are capable of responding to constructive criticism, rather than just praise. I do not want to qualify my praise of the hon. Minister of Education and I will not, in spite of their intervention. What I wanted to say was that I think that he and his predecessor before him, the hon. Prime Minister, have rescued The Department of Education from a process of ossification, which was little short of terrifying in its later stages.
